INSTITUTE OF PACIFIC RELATIONS

WEDNESDAY, JULY 25, 1951

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE TO INVESTIGATE THE ADMINISTRATION
OF THE INTERNAL SECURITY ACT AND OTHER INTERNAL SECURITY LAWS, OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
Washington, D. C.

The subcommittee met at 10:30 a. m., pursuant to call, in room 424 Senate Office Building, Hon. Pat McCarran (chairman) presiding.

Present: Senators McCarran, Eastland, O'Conor, Smith, Wiley, Watkins, and Ferguson.

Also present: Senator McCarthy.

J. G. Sourwine, committee counsel; Robert Morris, subcommittee counsel; Benjamin Mandel, director of research.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will come to order.

Will one of the members of the staff please see to it that the door is open so that the public may come in? If there is a sign outside "Executive session," it should be taken off.

We regret that perhaps this room may be too small to accommodate the public, but we will accommodate as many as we can. It is the only room available today.

The Internal Security Subcommittee of the Senate Judiciary Committee was empowered on December 21, 1950, under the terms of Senate Resolution 366 of the Eighty-first Congress to—make a complete and continuing study and investigation of (1) the administration, operation, and enforcement of the Internal Security Act of 1950; (2) the administration, operation, and enforcement of other laws relating to espionage, sabotage, and the protection of the internal security of the United States; and (3) the extent, nature, and effects of subversive activities in the United States; its territories and possessions, including, but not limited to, espionage, sabotage, and infiltration by persons who are or may be under the domination of the foreign government or organizations controlling the world Communist movement or any other movement seeking to overthrow the Government of the United States by force and violence.

This authority was subsequently extended under Senate Resolution 7 of the Eighty-second Congress, until December 31, 1952. I think it would be well to place these two resolutions in the record at this point.

(The resolutions referred to follow:)

[S. Res. 366, 81st Cong., 2d sess.]

RESOLUTION

Whereas the Congress from time to time has enacted laws designed to protect the internal security of the United States from acts of espionage and sabotage and from infiltration by persons who seek to overthrow the Government of the United States by force and violence; and

Whereas those who seek to evade such laws or to violate them with impunity constantly seek to devise and do devise clever and evasive means and tactics for such purposes; and

Whereas agents and dupes of the world Communist conspiracy have been and are engaged in activities (including the origination and dissemination of propaganda) designed and intended to bring such protective laws into disrepute or disfavor and to hamper or prevent effective administration and enforcement thereof; and

Whereas it is vital to the internal security of the United States that the Congress maintain a continuous surveillance over the problems presented by such activity and threatened activity and over the administration and enforcement of such laws: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized and directed to make a complete and continuing study and investigation of (1) the administration, operation, and enforcement of the Internal Security Act of 1950; (2) the administration, operation, and enforcement of other laws relating to espionage, sabotage, and the protection of the internal security of the United States; and (3) the extent, nature, and effects of subversive activities in the United States, its Territories and possessions, including, but not limited to, espionage, sabotage, and infiltration by persons who are or may be under the domination of the foreign government or organizations controlling the world Communist movement or any other movement seeking to overthrow the Government of the United States by force and violence.

SEC. 2. The committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to sit and act at such places and times during the sessions, recesses, and adjourned periods of the Senate, to hold such hearings, to require by subpenas or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths, to take such testimony, to procure such printing and binding, and, within the amount appropriated therefor, to make such expenditures as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic services to report hearings of the committee or subcommittee shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. Subpenas shall be issued by the chairman of the committee or the subcommittee, and may be served by any person designated by such chairman.

A majority of the members of the committee, or duly authorized subcommittee thereof, shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business, except that a lesser number to be fixed by the committee, or by such subcommittee, shall constitute a quorum for the purpose of administering oaths and taking sworn testimony.

SEC. 3. The committee, or duly authorized subcommittee, shall have power to employ and fix the compensation of such officers, experts, and employees as it deems necessary in the performance of its duties, and is authorized to utilize the services, information, facilities, and personnel of the various departments and agencies of the Government to the extent that such services, information, facilities, and personnel, in the opinion of the heads of such departments and agencies, can be furnished without undue interference with the performance of the work and duties of such departments and agencies.

SEC. 4. The expenses of the committee, which shall not exceed $10,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee on or before January 31, 1951.

[S. Res. 7, 82d Cong., 1st sess.]

RESOLUTION

Resolved, That the limitation of expenditures under S. Res. 366, Eighty-first Congress, relating to the internal security of the United States, agreed to December 21, 1950, is hereby increased by $75,000, and such sum together with any unexpended balance of the sum previously authorized to be expended under such resolution shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee and covering obligations incurred under such resolution on or before January 31, 1952.

The CHAIRMAN. One of the lines of inquiry undertaken by the Internal Security Subcommittee concerned the extent to which subversive forces may have influenced or sought to influence the formulation and execution of our Far Eastern policy.

In this connection, the committee, acting on advice that certain files of the Institute of Pacific Relations had been removed to a barn in Lee, Mass., and that these files contained information bearing on matters of concern to the committee, took possession of the files in question, under subpena, and relegated to its staff, under close supervision, the lengthy and arduous task of sifting those files.

The committee was aware, at the time, of the fact that the board of trustees of the institute had been studded with personalities of such respectability, and of such preeminence of capitalistic achievement, that the very presence of their names on a letterhead might have put at rest all suspicion of intrigue or subversive influence. The committee was also aware of the possibility that this aggregation of prominent individuals may have been used as a facade for Communists operating shrewdly behind the scenes. It has been done before. The committee knew that it is not possible to identify a Communist by his appearance or by his attire or by his station in life, or even by the size of his bank account.

The committee's staff was instructed to maintain, and the committee sought to maintain, a high standard of evidence, and to proceed with a truly objective approach. The committee did not want first impressions. It wanted facts.

It is virtually impossible to define fully and accurately, in the abstract, the components of disloyalty or subversion. The inner currents of the human mind are at best difficult to gage. Motives are often so obscure that sometimes one does not fully comprehend his own impelling urges, and may completely misjudge the motives of an associate. Successful conspirators usually are consummate dissemblers; and thus the acts of such persons are often shrouded in the darkness of stealth, accompanied by acts of misdirection, or clouded by ambiguity of meaning. The measurement of men's motives, the assessment of the strands of thought and the elements of pressures which may have influenced another's behavior, is not a task to be sought. And yet if we are to do our full part to save our country and our way of life from subversion and erosion, we must make the effort. But we must withhold our judgment in all respects until the proper time. We must first make the record, so that the facts will be known.

In such an investigation as this, where a possible conspiracy is being examined, very often the only evidence obtainable derives from persons who once participated in the conspiracy. Only eyes that witnessed the deeds, and ears that heard the words, of intrigue can attest thereto. Thus, ex-Communists, and agents of the Government who posed as Communists, often are the only sources of evidence of what transpired behind doors closed to the non-Communist world. Government agencies do not readily yield up their concealed agents. Fortunately, it is possible to verify the loyalty of an ex-Communist, in large part, by the very extent of his willingness to give full and frank testimony against the Communist Party. Many ex-Communists have labored loyally and valiantly to expose the intrigues of their former associates. They often have no illusions about the Communist Party and its purposes, and have developed antibodies against further infection.

"Once a Communist, always a Communist" has become, in effect, a Communist slogan; but no one who professes to comprehend the significance of transgression and repentance, of wrongdoing and contrition, can subscribe to such a shibboleth. These facts must be borne in mind as, later in these hearings, the testimony of ex-Communists is used to supplement the evidence found in the files.

It should be made clear that the committee was mindful at the outset that we had under subpena only some of the files of the institute, and that we might for that reason run the risk of getting a distorted view of the workings of the organization. We, therefore, extended our subpena and brought all the records of the institute under our scrutiny. We have, further, repeatedly asked the secretary general of the institute to be sure that everything that should be seen by us is made available to us.

The press and the public, as well as the committee, should bear in mind that the mere fact that a person is shown during the course of these hearings to have been associated with the Institute of Pacific Relations or to have been mentioned in certain letters which may be placed in evidence should give rise to no conclusions. Each bit of documentary evidence will speak with its own voice, but no such evidence should be weighed alone and without reference to the whole body of evidence which ultimately will comprise the record of these hearings. Neither should the testimony of any witness, standing alone and uncorroborated, be given undue weight, but, rather, the testimony of all witnesses should be weighed one against the other, after the record has been made, in an effort to sift the wheat from the chaff and arrive at the truth. Undoubtedly many good men will be mentioned in the course of these hearings, and it is in the interest of such men so mentioned that I make this statement.

We begin these hearings making no charges. We propose to let the evidence precede our conclusions. We shall hear the witnesses and read letters and other documents. We shall strive to be fair. The first witnesses will be persons long associated with the institute and undeniably competent to testify from the standpoint of the institute itself. The first witness, Edward C. Carter, was secretary general of the IPR for some 16 years and is still a member of its executive board. He will tell us what the institute is. The next witness, Frederick V. Field, was national secretary for many years and is a former member of the executive committee of the institute.

Before we proceed with the first witness I want to say a word or two about the future conduct of these hearings.

First, it should be known that we propose to continue public hearings probably 2 days a week for a number of weeks to come. The 2 days will probably be Tuesday and Thursday, in most weeks, although we are opening these hearings on a Wednesday and expect to continue tomorrow.

The question has arisen with regard to television, radio, and news pictures. The committee has specifically discussed these matters, and the ruling of the committee is that none of the proceedings of the committee will be televised and that no direct radio coverage of the proceedings of the committee will be permitted. News pictures may be permitted before and after the actual hearing sessions of the committee, but the taking of news pictures during the actual conduct of the hearings will not be allowed.

Neither will the committee permit the photographing of witnesses with members of the committee in the hearing room, nor the photographing of witnesses in the hearing room without the permission of the witnesses.

The committee has made these decisions because we are seeking facts, not publicity. We want to make a record, not to make headlines. Furthermore, we want to make it clear that no witness who is called here will be subjected to undue publicity against his will.

The committee has also discussed the matter of the submission of questions by Senators who are not members of the Internal Security Subcommittee. It is the order of the committee that any such questions should be submitted in writing to the chairman presiding at the hearing, to be asked by him at his direction.

Any witness called here may have the privilege of being accompanied and advised by counsel of his choice; but witnesses' counsel will not be permitted to testify nor to ask questions. This is not a trial, but an inquiry, and we intend to proceed in an orderly way. In the interests of expediting these hearings, members of the committee have agreed to refrain from filling the record with their own observations; and witnesses will be asked to limit their testimony to responsive answers to questions. However, after the conclusion of his testimony, any witness may file, for the record, any such supplementary statement as he may desire to make; and a reasonable time limit will be allowed, in any case, for the submission of such a statement.

The committee will proceed. Mr. Morris, you may proceed with the witness. The witness will be sworn.

You do solemnly swear that the testimony you are about to give before the subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary of the United States, will be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, so help you God?

TESTIMONY OF EDWARD C. CARTER, NEW YORK, N. Y.

Mr. CARTER. I do.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you give your name and address to the reporter?

Mr. CARTER. Edward C. Carter, 215 East Seventy-second Street, New York.

Mr. MORRIS. What is your present occupation?

Mr. CARTER. Retired. I am an educator retired, teaching part time at the New School at 66 West Twelfth Street.

Mr. MORRIS. You hold no position other than that of a teacher?

Mr. CARTER. No.

Mr. MORRIS. Did you ever hold a Government position or a position with the United Nations?

Mr. CARTER. I have held no position with the United States Government. For 2½ months I served as a senior consultant to a United Nations organization in the Far East. It is called the Economic Commission for Asia and the Far East. That was a consultancy for about 10 weeks with reference to technical training of industrial workers in the underdeveloped countries of Asia and the Far East.

Mr. MORRIS. You say that was in 1948?

Mr. CARTER. I think it was in 1948.

Mr. MORRIS. Are you now associated with the Institute of Pacific Relations?

Mr. CARTER. I am one of its roughly 50 board of directors of the American section of the Institute of Pacific Relations.

Mr. MORRIS. What position have you held with the Institute of Pacific Relations in the past?

Mr. CARTER. Shortly after it was founded in 1925 I served for a year or two as honorary secretary of the American IPR. Then I became an executive secretary. Then in 1933 I think it was I became secretary general of what was called the Pacific Council, namely, the governing body of 10 or 12 national councils in the Pacific countries, similar to, in a general way, the American section.

Then in 1946 I retired as secretary general of the international organization and became executive vice chairman of the American section, the American IPR, which position I held until roughly, 2½ years ago when I retired. Since then I have been one of 50 trustees of American IPR.

Mr. MORRIS. Do you still maintain an active interest in IPR work?

Mr. CARTER. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. Attend the board meetings?

Mr. CARTER. So far as possible, if I was in the country.

Mr. MORRIS. I wonder if you would give us very briefly in paragraph or so the construction or function of the Institute of Pacific Relations.

Mr. CARTER. It would have to be a long paragraph, Senator, but I will do my best.

Mr. MORRIS. As briefly as you can.

Mr. CARTER. The institute, as I have said a moment ago, is a loose federation of some 10 or 12 national institutes devoted to the study of the problems of the Pacific—economic, social, political, and so on. To take as a sample of those 10 or 12 councils, I will mention the structure of the American IPR which has grown from rather small beginnings in Hawaii in 1925 into an organization in a way you might compare it with the American Geographical Society or the Brookings Institution, of some fluctuating twelve to sixteen or eighteen hundred members, businessmen, journalists, academic people, a few labor, and so on, researchers, and the aim of the American IPR being to carry on competent research and discussion on America's interest in the Pacific and the whole of southern and eastern Asia. Its principal channels are publications. It might pretty nearly fill one of those larger cases over there, four or five hundred volumes over the years, and then two or three periodicals—the Far Eastern Survey, et cetera.

Then every 2 or 3 years years the American IPR participates in international conferences which the Chinese, Japanese, Filipinos, and the Europeans who have an interest in the Pacific meet, not for a week end but for 12 to 14 full days, living together, eating together, in an attempt to get some integration of the various points of view for people who have interests in the Pacific area.

The American IPR has maintained a research staff of varying size over the years, and similarly the international secretariat has had a staff over the years, being unofficial and not endowed with great funds. It has had nothing the size of the personnel of, say, the United Nation. We have tried always, except in wartime, to keep Japanese, Chinese, Filipinos, Australians, New Zealanders, Frenchmen on the staff, but we never have had the money. We have always had people of several nationalities on the staff so as to get as many points of view as possible and serve all the member councils impartially.

Our principal failures have been our inability to get sufficient funds to do as good a job as we would have liked to do.

Mr. MORRIS. What was your annual budget?

Mr. CARTER. It varied from around $90,000 to $150,000 for the American IPR, and there was a similar spread for the international secretariat.

Then the Royal Institute in London, which was the British chapter, has its own budget.

The China IPR was one of the most generous supporters and had its budgets, and so on around the different countries. I think the figures probably have been made available to the committee. I suppose altogether the IPR internationally and the various national councils have raised and expended $2 million or $3 million over the whole period, a very small budget compared with the budgets we hear about these days, Senator.

Mr. MORRIS. We have heard a great deal about the fact that Mr. Field, Frederick V. Field, was a large contributor to the institute. I wonder if you could tell us the extent to which he did contribute to the financing of the IPR.

Mr. CARTER. The IRP could give you the exact details. I looked over the figures some time ago and gathered from the figures in the New York office that it totaled around $60,000 during the whole period of his active connection. In one or two publications a considerably larger sum has been mentioned, but I think the sum of around $60,000 would stand up.

Mr. MORRIS. Was it his practice to make up the deficit for certain years?

Mr. CARTER. I am not quite certain that he made up the deficit for the American section for several years. You would have to consult the New York office as to which years and how much. That was not over the whole period.

I remember a similar case where a partner of the bank firm of Lee, Higginson & Co. made up a deficit of around $17,000 or $19,000. So Mr. Field was not the only such person.

Mr. MORRIS. I would like to offer you a carbon copy of a letter, sent reportedly by you, to Mr. W. L. Holland. I would like in particular to call your attention to the third paragraph from the end which reads:

> It is impossible for Field to go on paying each year's deficit. I think he now feels that contraction should have been effected 2 years ago.

I offer you this and ask you if you can recall sending that letter, Mr. Carter.

Mr. CARTER. The third of June 1940—which paragraph is that?

Mr. MORRIS. The third from the end on the second page.

Mr. CARTER (reading):

> It is impossible for Field to go on paying each year's deficit. I think he now feels that contraction should have been effected 2 years ago.

Senator, this clearly is a letter I wrote in 1940. Clearly we were in the midst of one of our periodic doldrums when we were short of money, and Mr. Field had helped out as others had. Apparently from this he had told me that he just couldn't be sugar daddy for year after year and unless we got money from other sources we would have to contract. Happily, we did find other sources. I have forgotten, in what amount, and survived.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the expression you used?

Mr. CARTER. Sugar daddy. I was afraid you would pick me up on that.

Mr. MORRIS. I would like to offer this in evidence, and have it marked as "Exhibit 1."

(Document referred to was marked "Exhibit No. 1," and is as follows:)

EXHIBIT No. 1

[Private and confidential]

129 EAST FIFTY-SECOND STREET,
New York, N. Y., June 3, 1940.

W. L. HOLLAND, Esq.
Care Giannini Foundation,
University of California, Berkeley, Calif.

DEAR BILL: With the unsettlement in the minds of potential contributors and the May 10 news from the Carnegie Endowment that it would not renew its contribution to Amco and the news a few days later that the Carnegie Corp. could not respond favorably to Amco's appeal, Field decided that, in addition to the salary cuts which I have already reported to you, very radical reductions should be made in rent, library purchases, and staff.

Field and the whole American council staff has been going through a terribly painful 10 days of group self-examination and reduction. Half a dozen plans have been proposed. The latest plan which was, I believe adopted at a meeting of the union on Friday afternoon, called, among other things, for giving notice and paying severance pay to Lasker's secretary, Shiman's secretary, Miss Taylor's secretary, and in addition Lasker, Mrs. Barnes, and Helen Wiss. About half the office space is to be given up. About half of the library is to be stored. Catherine Porter is to become field secretary and is to be responsible for regional conferences. She is also to be office manager. The number of pages of the Far Eastern Survey is to be reduced and Kurt Bloch will probably be added to the staff in order that Amco may have someone who can cover a half a dozen fields at the same time.

The present thought, I believe, is to cut the American Council contribution from $10,000 to $5,000 a year; to look for a successor to Fred; and to ask all of the research staff to do their own typing and recondition the entire staff so that in the future they will cooperate in membership and financial work and public relations generally.

This letter to you is unofficial and off the record. It is intended for you alone and nothing that is herein contained should be passed on to Alsberg, Wilbur, Oakie, or anyone else. In due season Field will be communicating, I assume, to all of these people in their American Council capacity and it would be unfortunate if any of them got the slightest hint of the reorganization that is taking place from you or me.

At this juncture I simply wanted you to know that after the 15th of June Lasker and Mrs. Barnes would presumably be open for university appointments. Lasker is, I think, entitled to 6 months' severance pay and Mrs. Barnes 3 months. I haven't the faintest idea what their plans for the future are.

It may be that it will be much sounder for the American council and for the institute as a whole if these two gifted staff members find their future careers entirely outside the framework of the IPR. Thus, though for humanitarian reasons I would like to propose one or two minor temporary international secretariat assignments to Lasker and Mrs. Barnes, my thought at the moment is that such proposals might be a disservice to both of them in that it would postpone just by so many weeks or months their facing up to the realities of the new situation that they unfortunately have to face. My present thought is that the biggest service we can do them is by commending them to other societies and to universities where their qualifications would be of very special value.

Would you write me privately your reaction to what I have written.

I need hardly say that practically the whole staff of the American council at the moment has been in a state of pretty nearly complete collapse. Everyone has suffered fearfully all along the line. It is impossible for Field to go on paying each year's deficit. I think he now feels that contraction should have been effected 2 years ago.

In connection with my future responsibility as pro tem part-time secretary of the American council, I have been more concerned with a study of the failure of the staff to secure the necessary income. I would have preferred to see the staff reorient itself completely to the problem of public relations and income production rather than engage in drastic curtailment of expenditure. I feel confident that the present plight could have been avoided if the entire staff had cooperated intelligently and loyally with those responsible for income production. However, there is no use in crying over spilt milk, and my objectives on this point can better be contributed orally rather than in writing.

Please send me your best thought on all these matters at the earliest possible moment.

Sincerely yours,

EDWARD C. CARTER.

Mr. MORRIS. Did Frederick Field write for IPR publications?

Mr. CARTER. Yes. He wrote several articles for the Far Eastern Survey, the fortnightly of the American IPR. He may have written for the International Quarterly, Pacific Affairs. I can't remember specifically, but the office could tell you and he did two major research volumes, one on American participation in the Chinese consortium. We had the late Thomas W. Lamont read that carefully and he felt that it was an exceedingly competent piece of work. Then Mr. Field edited a very large volume, the Economic Handbook of the Pacific, and Chinese, Japanese, and others worked on it. That was a standard economic handbook for several years.

Mr. Newton D. Baker has studied it and wrote the foreword.

As I remember it, those were the only two books, in addition to the other articles you have inquired about.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Carter, while you were secretary general and executive vice chairman, did you know Frederick Field was a member of the Communist Party?

Mr. CARTER. I did not, no.

Mr. MORRIS. When did you first learn that?

Mr. CARTER. In the Saturday Evening Post a few years ago. I knew that while he was active in the IPR he wrote for the New Masses and Daily Worker, and when I inquired I was told that those two militant Communist publications frequently asked nonparty members to write.

I checked up on it and found that was true, and so I did not at the time think that his writing for his publications, later I think he served on the editorial board of one, constituted him as a party member.

The CHAIRMAN. That expression "later"—I did not catch what you said after the word "later." You said "Later he served," on something.

Mr. CARTER. My impression, Senator, is he contributed an occasional article to either New Masses or Daily Worker before he went on the masthead as a member of the editorial board of one or the other. I can't from memory give you the exact dates.

Mr MORRIS. When you say you checked, exactly how would you check on this affiliation?

Mr. CARTER. I didn't do it very scientifically the way the Senator would have, but I, in talking to people about the country, asked a good many of my friends, "Here is the New Masses. Are all of these people Communists?" Several people said to the best of their knowledge and belief they were not all Communists. I haven't any doubt whatsoever but what the Daily Worker and New Masses were 100 percent Communist lines as far as their management was concerned, but I also got the idea at a certain period that they did invite non-Communists to contribute.

Senator EASTLAND. Then he was a member of the editorial board of one of the publications?

Mr. CARTER. As I said, at a later time.

Senator EASTLAND. You did not believe then he was a Communist; is that your testimony?

Mr. CARTER. My testimony is that he was aiding the Communist cause.

Senator EASTLAND. That was not enough to open your eyes that he was a Communist when he went on the editorial board?

Mr. CARTER. I had my eyes open for a considerable time, Senator, and I was never able to actually prove that he was a Communist Party member in a way an authoritative Government agency would. I assumed that he was someone who should be watched.

I would like to, if I may, ask counsel, Mr. Morris, who must have all these dates at his fingertips, whether Mr. Field was an executive officer of the IPR concurrently with being on the editorial board.

Mr. MORRIS. He certainly was a member of the executive board of trustees right up until 1948.

Mr. CARTER. That is a little different. I would like to comment on that, if I may, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well. You made the remark that you were going to ask counsel. You may confer with counsel but counsel is not going to testify.

Mr. CARTER. I meant your counsel, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. I beg your pardon.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Crossman, at this time I think for your sake we should have the record show precisely in what capacity you are here. I know, Mr. Crossman, I am acting now in response to your letter in which you objected to our listing you as having been present for Mr. Carter at the various hearings, the executive hearings to date. Will you notify the chairman exactly in what capacity you are here?

Mr. CROSSMAN. I will be glad to do that, Mr. Chairman. I am a partner in the firm of Davis, Polk, Wardwell, Sunderland & Kiendl. We represent the Institute of Pacific Relations, the American council of the institute to be technically accurate, and do not represent any individual witness just because we appear here. We are representing the institute.

I realize I am not supposed to testify, but I thought I had the privilege of conferring, or rather the witness had the privilege of conferring with me. May I do that for a second now?

The CHAIRMAN. I rather take it you have put yourself out of that category now. You are here now representing the Institute of Pacific Relations. The witness is testifying. You are not here representing the witness; is that correct?

Mr. CROSSMAN. I am not representing the witness as an individual, that is correct, sir; but I think in my representation of the institute

I should like to have the privilege of having witnesses who have been connected with the institute confer with me. I will make it very brief.

The CHAIRMAN. You will not be permitted to testify, nor will you be permitted to interrogate. You have the same privilege as anyone else who comes here. You are representing the Institute of Pacific Relations. When the question arises as to the questions you may propound to any one witness, or what your attitude will be, the Chair will rule on it at that time.

Mr. CROSSMAN. I did not want to ask questions of the witness; I merely wanted to say something to him.

Mr. MORRIS. You have already stated he is not your client.

Mr. CROSSMAN. He is a witness for the institute.

The CHAIRMAN. That settles it. Proceed.

Mr. MORRIS. Is it not a fact you tried to assist Mr. Field to get an Army intelligence commission in 1942?

Mr. CARTER. When Mr. Field was seeking an Army commission I am sure that I wrote to someone in the War Department speaking of his intellectual qualifications for such a job.

Mr. MORRIS. You do recall that?

Mr. CARTER. I just don't remember the way that a letter I probably wrote looks.

Senator EASTLAND. You did recommend him for a commission?

Mr. CARTER. I am sure I did recommend him.

Mr. MORRIS. Is that consistent with your testimony about your knowledge of Mr. Field and your being suspicious of him and checking with certain authorities about his Communist membership?

Mr. CARTER. I thought so at the time.

Mr. MORRIS. Do you think so now?

Mr. CARTER. It looks a little fishy now.

Mr. MORRIS. Have you ever knowingly employed or used in the IPR in your official capacity which you described people you knew to be Communists?

Mr. CARTER. I don't remember ever employing in a paid position anyone whom I knew to be a Communist. I did, Senator, seek the cooperation of Communists in the Soviet Union and Communists from the Soviet Union because in the early days of the IPR, before I was active in it, the leaders in Hawaii felt that the only way to understand the total picture in the Pacific was to learn as much as we could of the activities, good or bad, of the Russians in the Far East in relation to China and Japan. And so following the visits of people sent by the committee in Hawaii in the early days—Mr. Merle Davis, C. F. Loomis, and J. B. Condliffe—I went with Roland Boyd, Jerome Greene, and others to Moscow on our way to the Kyoto conference in 1929 and sought contact with Russian scholars who were specializing in the Far East, urging them to participate and to form a national council of the IPR in the Soviet Union. I backed them. I tried to get money for them. I tried to get publications. We tried to get them to write articles because we thought the only way to look objectively at the whole picture was to try and understand every conflicting point of view whether we liked it or not.

We sometimes felt the points of view we did not like were more important than those we did.

Mr. MORRIS. Are you drawing distinction now that you consulted with and worked with Russian Communists rather than American Communists and Chinese Communists?

Mr. CARTER. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORRIS. May I rephrase my question, then: Did you while you were secretary general and executive vice president of the IPR ever knowingly use or employ in your organization people you knew to be American Communists, Chinese Communists, German Communists, or any other than Russian Communists?

Mr. CARTER. We employed two or three people whom we knew definitely had been Communists and had repudiated communism.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not the question exactly. The question is, Did you employ those whom you knew to be Communists? I think you had better listen to the question.

Mr. CARTER. Thank you.

Save for this debatable question of Mr. Frederick V. Field, who had been employed long before he began writing for New Masses, and so on, I don't remember employing anyone who I knew at the time to be a Communist. I did employ one or more who subsequently I seemed to be very certain if they had not become party members were playing the party line 100 percent.

Mr. MORRIS. Who were they?

Mr. CARTER. Dr. Chao-ting Chi, a Chinese Communist, a graduate of Columbia had been recommended to us highly by the people who had given him his Ph. D. at Columbia on Chinese economic history who subsequently became secretary general of an international monetary stabilization board—British, American, and Chinese—to aid T. V. Soong, Chiang Kai-shek, and H. H. Kung, in establishing the Chinese currency.

Then he served under Dr. Kung as head of the Research Department of the Central Bank of China and then subsequently about the time the Chinese Communists took over Peking he made a trip to Peking and in an incredibly short time transferred himself from being an employee of the Kuomintang to the apparently much trusted employee of the Mao-tse Tung government.

Mr. MORRIS. When did you first realize that Dr. Chi was a member of the Communist Party?

Mr. CARTER. I first realized he was playing the Communist game when I received word that he had moved from Kuomintang employ in Shanghai to Chinese Communist employment in Peking. I can't give the date of that.

Mr. MORRIS. Did you not know back in 1945 or 1946 that he wrote under a pseudonym for a Communist-controlled publication China Today?

Mr. CARTER. I didn't know it at that time. I only learned that very recently.

Mr. MORRIS. When did you learn it?

Mr. CARTER. You brought it out at a hearing here 2 or 3 weeks ago.

Mr. MORRIS. When you say "brought it out," what do you mean?

Mr. CARTER. I have forgotten whether you had a document or a copy of China Today.

Mr. MORRIS. Is it not the case that you brought Mr. Holland in here with you, who was your successor as secretary general and vice chairman and you were willing to state for the aspects of the testimony you could not recall and you would assent to his testimony? Remember, you brought Mr. Holland in here to supplement your testimony and you said that his testimony would be your testimony as far as it was consistent with your recollection?

Mr. CARTER. Yes. He had much greater familiarity with the whole research and publication program, as he had been my international research officer, and as Dr. Chi had been employed on a research project which was under Mr. Holland——

Mr. MORRIS. When was that?

Mr. CARTER. Well——

Mr. MORRIS. Was that in 1940?

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Holland was international research secretary in 1940.

Mr. MORRIS. Do you not recall he conceded at that time he knew some time around 1945 that Dr. Chi had been writing in China Today under the pseudonym of Han-su Chan?

Mr. CARTER. I don't just remember that part of a very long session, but if you have the record there, or later wish to check on it, I am sure I said nothing at that time apropos of confirming Mr. Holland's statement that I would want to withdraw now.

Mr. MORRIS. When did you or the IPR first feel that Dr. Chi was no longer a person to be trusted by the IPR?

Mr. CARTER. It didn't come up while he was with us.

Mr. MORRIS. You trusted him at all times?

Mr. CARTER. Well, as much as you trust a temporary employee whom you think is competent to do a good job. You naturally want to give them every facility for doing the job you hired him for.

At that time I had trust in his competence, and we had always the validation right up to very recently when he quipped to the Communist side that he was in the good graces of the Kuomintang government. I met him when I went to the home of Dr. H. H. Kung's house in Chunking. Dr. Chi was there as one of his intimate friends and in view of the way Dr. Kung liked Communists, I thought that was good enough for me. They were fellow Chinese.

Mr. MORRIS. Do you testify at 1945 that the institute maintained friendly relations with Dr. Chi?

Mr. CARTER. I remember in 1948—you referred, Senator, to my short service with the United Nations Economic Commission for Asia—a part of my duty there was to attend to a Far East United Nations Conference at Ootacamund and Dr. Chi was one of the principal members of the Kuomintang delegation.

Mr. MORRIS. What about Mr. Holland's knowledge of 1945 when he knew Dr. Chi had been writing under the name Han-su Chan for a Communist-controlled publication called China Today in New York City?

Mr. CARTER. I prefer to have you ask that of Mr. Holland if you will later on, or if he is in the room now, because I would say my memory is not perfect. I thought in a previous executive session here Mr. Holland said that he did not know of Chi's writing under a pen name until the last year or so. But that I would like to have in the record—as I say, my memory may be faulty and it may be Mr. Holland testified that in 1945.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to offer in evidence at this time the excutive session testimony of Mr. Carter. At the request of Mr. Carter and at the request of Mr. Crossman, I believe we allowed Mr. Holland to participate in Mr. Carter's testimony in executive session. Mr. Carter has been out of the institute, at least in his official capacity, for a year or so now.

Mr. CARTER. Two and a half years.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Holland is more familiar with more of the details. So at his request we allowed Mr. Holland to participate.

The CHAIRMAN. At Mr. Carter's request?

Mr. MORRIS. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. He just stated so a few minutes ago. He has already stated—and I want him to correct me if I am wrong—he knows nothing in Mr. Holland's testimony he would now withdraw or repudiate.

Mr. CARTER. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. On page 44 of the executive session testimony I would like to read the colloquy:

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Carter, or Mr. Holland, did you know, or is it a fact, that Dr. Chi was one of the editors of China Today?

I addressed my question to both you and Mr. Holland, and Mr. Holland answered:

Speaking for myself, I have since learned this fact; at the time Chi worked in the IPR office, I was not aware of that. I understand, having heard it since, that he used another name when he was an editor.

Mr. MORRIS. Was that the name of Han-su Chan?

Mr. HOLLAND. I can't identify that name. My recollection is that it was something different. I can't say that I ever troubled to find out what his pseudonym or alibi was, but I do remember that—I think I first had it drawn to my attention after the Amerasia case broke into the news—

I might mention that that was in 1945—that Chi under another name, had previously been on this magazine China Today.

Mr. MORRIS. Well, Mr. Holland, Mr. Field was the editor in chief of that publication, was he not?

Mr. HOLLAND. Of which publication?

Mr. MORRIS. China Today?

Mr. HOLLAND. This was also something which I heard after, heard told the first time, because I understand he also used another name.

Do you remember hearing that testimony?

Mr. CARTER. As I said, my memory was a little vague and clearly Mr. Holland stated that he learned this in 1945, and I would fully subscribe to Mr. Holland's memory, which is usually better than my own.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have that portion of the executive session testimony introduced into the public session testimony.

The CHAIRMAN. It may go in. I think it is already in. You have inserted it already.

Mr. CARTER. Could it also be an extension of that, because either Mr. Holland or I indicated that Dr. Chi had left the employment of the IPR considerably in advance of 1945. You said in your opening statement you wanted to get the full rounded picture, and I think that would be appropriate.

The CHAIRMAN. If that is in the record it may go in with it.
(Portion of the testimony referred to follows:)

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Frederick Spencer.

Mr. HOLLAND. This is one of the names that I heard, but I also heard other people say it was not the one he used, and I don't pretend to know.

Mr. MORRIS. Is it your understanding that China Today is a Communist publication, Mr. Holland?

Mr. HOLLAND. I myself have never studied it, and certainly I have never accepted it as a Communist publication in the sense that I have always accepted, say, the New Masses or the Daily Worker.

It seemed to me occasionally, when I heard of it, to have articles that were critical of the Nationalist Government and sympathetic to communism, from what I heard of it. But I have no personal recollection of saying it was a Communist publication.

Mr. MORRIS. But the fact that the principal editors chose to use pseudonyms, is it not an unusual fact, don't you think, Mr. Holland?

Mr. HOLLAND. I think so now, but at the time I was not aware that they used pseudonyms.

Mr. MORRIS. And I should think that the fact that Dr. Chi used a pseudonym and was one of the editors of China Today, that that would be a factor in aiding you to come to the conclusion that Dr. Chi, all during this period prior to 1949, rather than being a loyal supporter of the Nationalist Government was secretly a Communist working against the Government.

Mr. HOLLAND. Well, Mr. Morris, you are entitled to your opinion. I don't wish to argue on it.

Mr. CROSSMAN. Wait a minute. The way the question is put, it seems to me a little difficult for Mr. Holland to answer. You assume that he knew that these people were writing under a pseudonym. At least that is how I get it.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Holland said he knew.

Mr. HOLLAND. At that time I said I was not aware of that they were writing under pseudonyms.

Mr. CROSSMAN. When did you learn that?

Mr. HOLLAND. After the Amerasia case broke, which was sometime in 1945. In fact, even later than that, because at that time I was in China and didn't come back here until about November 1945.

So it was only then that, chiefly because I was curious to know what happened about this and troubled to read some of the reports.

But I want to be perfectly frank, and I recognize Mr. Morris here is asking a reasonable question, and certainly if, in the light of today's developments, what has happened, say, over the past few years, what we know about Soviet and Communist espionage, if I were today for the first time learn that these people were writing under pseudonyms in a magazine which had this general complexion, I would certainly be suspicious.

On the other hand, I have to report, in all honesty, that I saw this man's work, when he worked for the IPR, very closely. He gave no evidence of being Communist or biased. He was competent enough to report on wartime economic developments in China.

And I know enough from the people, Chinese bankers like Dr. K. P. Chen, and the British and American officials who served on this Exchange Stabilization Board, to know that they, too, were able and well-informed people.

And all I can say is that if he was at that time secretly a Communist he concealed it very successfully.

And even more remarkable is that he managed apparently to conceal it from so high an official as Dr. H. H. Kung, and many other top Nationalist Government officials right throughout the war period, including the Chinese secret police, who certainly must have been on the look-out for such people.

Mr. MORRIS. You were testifying in 1948 you were maintaining friendly relations to Dr. Chi?

Mr. CARTER. I met him at the Ootacamund conference. I met him at Dr. H. H. Kung's house. I tried to be friendly with people from all countries who were at that conference.

Mr. MORRIS. What is the present attitude of the IPR toward Dr. Chi? That is, as you know it.

Mr. CARTER. I think a clear recognition of the fact that Dr. Chi had a distinguished record at Columbia; that he served satisfactorily a very influential American-British-Chinese stabilization committee. He represented Dr. H. H. Kung in highly important relationships and then he slipped. Whether he slipped, whether he saw the way the tide was going, or whether he had always at heart been a Communist, your guess is just as good as mine.

The CHAIRMAN. I do not think your answer is responsive to the question.

Mr. CARTER. Thank you. I accept your rebuke and will try to mend my ways.

The CHAIRMAN. I do not mean it as a rebuke. I mean you did not address your answer to the question.

Mr. MORRIS. You do know he was the proposed Chinese Communist delegate to UNESCO?

Mr. CARTER. Oh, yes; I learned that after he had gone over to the other side.

Mr. MORRIS. Do you testify that after you learned that you were no longer friendly with Dr. Chi?

Mr. CARTER. I never saw him; never wrote him.

Mr. MORRIS. What is your outlook toward Chi now? Or the outlook of the institute now?

Mr. CARTER. I can only speak for myself.

Mr. MORRIS. Speak for yourself.

Mr. CARTER. The institute does not take a position either on ideas or personalities. My own position is that he is a brilliant young Chinese that I think has gone wrong by throwing in his lot with the Communists.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I had not anticipated introducing this letter at this time, but I think it is appropriate that I introduce a photostatic copy of a letter which bears the date of February 10, 1950. It is a copy of a letter from Mr. Holland, secretary general of the IPR, to Mr. Ivison Macadam in London.

The CHAIRMAN. I think you might well identify the letter unless you have already identified it.

Mr. MORRIS. I would like to bring out this one paragraph first.

Mr. Mandel, will you vouch for the authenticity of this document?

I think, Mr. Chairman, from time to time we will have to swear in Mr. Mandel to verify the authenticity of documents.

The CHAIRMAN. You do solemnly swear the testimony you are about to give before the subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary of the United States will be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, so help you God?

Mr. MANDEL. I do.

Mr. MORRIS. What is your name and address?

Mr. MANDEL. Benjamin Mandel, 3101 Pennsylvania Avenue SE.

Mr. MORRIS. What is your present occupation, Mr. Mandel?

Mr. MANDEL. I am the research director of the Internal Security Subcommittee.

Mr. MORRIS. How long have you had that position?

Mr. MANDEL. Since March 1, 1951.

Mr. MORRIS. Prior to that time did you ever hold any similar position?

Mr. MANDEL. I was with the Committee on Un-American Activities, on its research staff, since 1939 until the end of 1944.

Then I was for 2 years with the State Department in 1945 and 1946. From 1947 until I took the position with the present committee, I was research director of the House Committee on Un-American Activities.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you testify that photostatic copy is of a letter that was in the file of the Institute of Pacific Relations that was in your custody?

Mr. MANDEL. I do.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to read the last paragraph of this letter.

> If Loudon goes to Shanghai I hope he will see Chi Chao-ting, vice president of the Bank of China, who has been recently named Chinese delegate to the Economic and Social Council of the UN. You may remember that Chi was attached to the IPR international secretariat in 1940 and wrote one of the inquiry reports on China's wartime economic development (distributed only in brief form because it was incomplete).

This is the sentence I want to call your attention to:

> Chi may well prove to be one of our more influential friends in China.

This is Mr. Holland writing about Chi after he had assumed this position as proposed Chinese delegate to UNESCO. Will you comment on that?

Mr. CARTER. May I have the privilege of looking at that?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly. I think the question should be read back to you.

(The question was read by the reporter.)

Mr. CARTER. I am very happy to do so, although I am handicapped in that this was a letter from my successor, Mr. Holland, to Mr. Ivison Macadam of the World Institute in London, and just from internal evidence I note that I remember this man Loudon was a high official of the British-American Tobacco Co. in London who apparently had been commended to Mr. Holland, and Mr. Holland thought Mr. Loudon, if he was going out to Communist China, would find a Chinese who had been trained in a democratic country useful in getting a picture.

But I would much prefer, Senator, as this is a letter from Mr. Holland to Mr. Macadam, to have the committee interrogate Mr. Holland at the appropriate time.

The CHAIRMAN. That is a matter the committee will have to decide on. I think you have answered the question.

Mr. MORRIS. Thank you.

Mr. CARTER. Senator, may I have your permission just to go back to an item earlier regarding Mr. Field? I did not quite get the point of one of Mr. Morris' questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you remember the question?

Mr. CARTER. The point I wanted to clear up was whether the committee's records show that Mr. Field wrote for the New Masses or the Daily Worker before 1940 and the date he went on the board of New Masses and the relationship of the date of his withdrawal from the secretaryship of the institute.

The CHAIRMAN. Let me ask you something, Mr. Carter. Are you asking that question yourself, or is your attorney asking that question?

Mr. CARTER. My attorney, as you noted, reminded me to follow up and clarify a question that I thought at the time I was speaking was left hanging in the air.

The CHAIRMAN. I do not propose to let you have anything hanging in the air. The Chair will see that you have an opportunity to clarify anything you wish to clarify. I wish to say to the attorney, if you violate the rule of this committee we will remove you to the audience, and we will do it very fast.

Mr. CROSSMAN. May I have——

The CHAIRMAN. That is all; I have said the last word and that is all there is to it.

Mr. CROSSMAN. May I have an opportunity to discuss that question?

The CHAIRMAN. No, sir. I said no and that settles it.

Mr. MORRIS. I would like to offer into evidence that letter from Mr. Holland to Mr. Macadam as exhibit 1–A.

(Document referred to was marked "Exhibit 1–A" and is as follows:)

EXHIBIT No. 1–A

INSTITUTE OF PACIFIC RELATIONS,
1 EAST FIFTY-FOURTH STREET,
New York, N. Y., February 10, 1950.

IVISON S. MACADAM, Esq.,
Royal Institute of International Affairs,
Chatham House, St. James' Square, London, South Wales 1.

DEAR IVISON: Many thinks for your note of February 7 about Loudon's visit to the Far East. I shall certainly be grateful for anything he can do to get in touch with leading members of the Chinese IPR. The senior man is the research chairman, L. K. Tao, 15 Shao San Tiao, Pei Shin Chiao, Peking. Other members concerned with IPR research projects are Prof. Chien Tuan-sheng, department of political science, Peking National University, author of the forthcoming book on Chinese government and politics now being printed for the IPR by the Harvard University Press. Another is Prof. Chen Chen-han, economics department, Peking National University, who is working on a study of the rise of the modern Chinese business class, on the progress of which I would appreciate having some news. Another is Prof. Fei Hsiao-tung, sociological department, Tsinghua University, and his colleague, Prof. Quentin Pan who have been doing some work on an IPR study of the Chinese gentry.

I spoke to C. P. Fitsgerald about these people in Hongkong last November just before he left for Shanghai, but I have heard nothing from him as yet. If Loudon gets a chance to talk privately to Tao and to Chien, I hope, of course, that he will stress our desire to have a qualified group of professors and journalists come from China to the IPR conference in India (probably at Lucknow, starting during the last week in September and dealing mainly with the subject of nationalism in the Far East and its consequence for the Western World). I also hope that he will convey my hope that they reorganize the Chinese IPR or establish a new Council of International Affairs which would participate as a national council in the international IPR. Finally I would like him to assure them that the Indian Council of World Affairs as host, and Pandit Nehru personally, are eager to have Chinese delegates or observers at the conference and will do everything possible to facilitate their travel.

Loudon may also have an opportunity to talk to such Chinese IPR members as K. P. Chen (of the Shanghai Commercial Bank in Hongkong). Impossible as it seems now, I have an idea that K. P. will later go to Shanghai, and even before then may perhaps be disposed to make a token contribution to the Pacific Council budget.

If Loudon goes to Shanghai, I hope he will see Chi Chao-ting, vice president of the Bank of China, who has recently been named as Chinese Communist delegate to the Economic and Social Council of the UN. You may remember that Chi was attached to the IPR international secretariat in 1940 and wrote one of the inquiry reports on China's economic development (distributed only in brief form because it was incomplete). He may well prove to be one of our more influential friends in China.

Yours,

WILLIAM L. HOLLAND, Secretary-General.

(W. L. Holland, Correspondence 1950, Royal Institute: Macadam.)

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Carter, approximately how many members of the IPR would have been employed in an average year during these years of your tenure?

Mr. CARTER. The American IPR would have employed anywhere from 4 to 5 to perhaps 15 or 20 of all grades. I couldn't give the exact figures.

The CHAIRMAN. I want to go back, if you please. You wanted to clarify something. I do not want to deprive you of that privilege.

Mr. CARTER. Thank you very much. What I wanted to know was from the records of the Senate committee the date when Mr. Field went on the board of New Masses and the relationship of that date to his resignation as an executive officer of the American IPR. Just for my own knowledge I would like to know for how long a period, if any, he served jointly as an executive officer of our organization and on the editorial board of New Masses.

The CHAIRMAN. Can you give that clarification from your records?

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, that is a fact that we will present in due time. If Mr. Carter will be patient, he will see we will bring that out.

Senator EASTLAND. You testified you recommended Mr. Frederick V. Field for a commission in Army Intelligence. I would like to ask you if, to your knowledge, Mr. Owen Lattimore or Mr. Lauchlin Currie also recommended him for a commission?

Mr. CARTER. I would trust the committee's files on that.

Senator EASTLAND. I want you to answer my question now. Do you know whether or not they did that?

Mr. CARTER. I can't remember. They may or may not. If you could refresh my memory, I could give you a less equivocal answer.

Senator EASTLAND. Here is a letter dated February 18, 1942, Mr. Edward C. Carter, Institute of Pacific Relations, 129 East Fifty-second Street, New York City:

DEAR MR. CARTER: Someone suggested the other day that Merion Cooper, our friend John Cooper's brother, was fairly high up in the Army Air Intelligence. This information was not definite but sufficient so as to warrant checking. Am I not right in believing that you met him in Hollywood through a letter from his brother? If so, do you know whether he actually is in Air Intelligence and do you know him well enough to bring my case to his attention?

I am enclosing a confidential account of my attempt to get into Army to serve as a sort of aide mémoire to anyone loking into it. I am also enclosing a copy of my original Who's Who on the basis of what is regarded as sufficiently qualified for the job. Nothing new to report. I had a good talk with Justine Wise Polier and her husband. Both are working on the matter. Presumably Owen is taking it up with Currie. Again many thanks.

Sincerely,

FRED.

Does that refresh your recollection?

Mr. CARTER. May I look at it?

Senator EASTLAND. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you identify the people in that letter as much as possible, Mr. Carter.

Mr. CARTER. John Cooper was at that time vice president of Pan American Airways. I think he was Juan Trippe's legal adviser.

Merion Cooper, according to this letter, is John Cooper's brother. I knew John Cooper very well when he was in Pan American. I don't remember ever meeting Merion Cooper, his brother. Field says am I right in believing that I know the brother, that I met him in Hollywood. I don't remember.

Mr. MORRIS. I direct your attention to Owen and Currie. That is Owen Lattimore, is it not?

Mr. CARTER. Presumably.

Mr. MORRIS. That is who it is, is it not?

Mr. CARTER. Yes. Presumably Owen is taking it up with Currie.

Mr. MORRIS. That is Lauchlin Currie, an assistant to President Roosevelt?

Mr. CARTER. I believe he was one of the five or six executive assistants to President Roosevelt.

Here Mr. Field is telling me that presumably Owen Lattimore is taking it up with Lauchlin Currie.

Mr. MORRIS. Do you have any knowledge of that?

Mr. CARTER. Beyond this letter I remember nothing.

Mr. MORRIS. You testified that all you did to assist Mr. Field was to write a letter and outline his intellectual attainments. That was your testimony, was it not?

Mr. CARTER. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. Why is it that you were in correspondence with him over a period of time if all you did was write a letter and outline his intellectual attainments?

Mr. CARTER. Here was a man who apparently wanted to serve his country. At that time I think he would have been an asset.

Mr. MORRIS. Wasn't your testimony wrong when you said you just wrote a letter and outlined his intellectual attainments?

Mr. CARTER. I think what I meant, Senator, was that I didn't go down to the Pentagon or go and see Senators or did not pull wires through Mr. Hull, or whoever was Secretary of State, but I wrote a letter. Beyond that I don't remember today going out in a campaign.

Senator EASTLAND. I would like to read you another letter. This is May 4, 1942, signed Edward C. Carter, and I quote part of it: It begins "Dear Fred."

> I am very sorry that my efforts on behalf of you and also on behalf of Uncle Sam have not as yet yielded any substantial results.

The CHAIRMAN. Who is Fred?

Senator EASTLAND. That is Frederick V. Field. That was a letter you wrote.

Senator SMITH. What date was that?

Senator EASTLAND. May 4, 1942.

Mr. CARTER. I remember distinctly saying earlier this morning that I must have written a letter commending Mr. Field and that was presumably considerably earlier than May 4, 1942, and that I was sorry that my effort—maybe there was something besides that letter. I don't remember any personal campaign of buttonholing to get Mr. Field——

Senator EASTLAND. What else did you do beside write that letter?

Mr. CARTER. Well, I received a letter from Mr. Field that I have already referred to and read it.

Senator EASTLAND. What did you do beside write that letter to get Mr. Field a commission? I want to have you answer that question.

Mr. CARTER. I don't remember anything else, but if you or Mr. Morris or Senator McCarran could refresh my memory——

The CHAIRMAN. Would not this record that you just read, these 2 letters, refresh your memory?

Mr. CARTER. Well, the record is made to Justine Wise Polier. On seeing this letter, it is the first time I ever knew that Mr. Field knew Justine Polier, or her husband.

Senator SMITH. Mr. Chairman, may I ask one question there?

Mr. Carter, at or about the time that you were making this effort to get Mr. Field a commission in the Intelligence, did you have a conference with either or both Owen Lattimore or Lauchlin Currie?

Mr. CARTER. I remember no such conference.

Senator SMITH. Were you acquainted with those two gentlemen?

Mr. CARTER. Yes; I had known Mr. Lattimore since I recruited him as editor of Pacific Affairs in late 1933.

I had occasion to call on Lauchlin Currie when he was one of the President's executive assistants in connection with China relief, of which I was the director, and in connection with a visit to Chungking when Mr. T. V. Soong told me that Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek wished me to come out and make a visit.

I remember very distinctly a contact with Mr. Currie at that time. I had not known him before he went into the President's office.

Senator SMITH. You had no contact with Mr. Currie about this proposal to get Mr. Field in the Intelligence Service?

Mr. CARTER. I don't remember.

Senator EASTLAND. But you knew that Mr. Currie and Mr. Lattimore were attempting to get Mr. Field a commission in the Army Intelligence, did you not?

Mr. CARTER. I had it on Mr. Field's say-so from this letter.

Senator EASTLAND. And you knew that that was in 1942?

Mr. CARTER. 1942.

Senator EASTLAND. And you knew at that time that Mr. Field was on the editorial board of either New Masses or the Daily Worker, did you not?

Mr. CARTER. One reason that I wanted to get these dates straightened out——

The CHAIRMAN. Answer the question, if you can. There was a direct question put to you, Mr. Carter.

Mr. CARTER. I must have known that he had contributed articles to one or the other.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, Mr. Carter, you and I will get along fine if you will just listen to the question and answer it, if you please.

Mr. CARTER. I am afraid I am trying to think of the answers too fast.

There is one question that "buggles" me in that I was asked 10 minutes ago to get dates.

Senator EASTLAND. Answer the question, please, sir.

Mr. CARTER. I don't remember.

Senator EASTLAND. You do not remember, then, whether or not you attempted to get a commission in Army Air Force Intelligence for a member of the editorial board of either the Daily Worker or the New Masses?

Mr. CARTER. I don't remember.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Carter, you do recall that Mr. Field took a position as chairman of the American Peace Mobilization, do you not?

Mr. CARTER. That I knew.

Mr. MORRIS. Do you know that the American Peace Mobilization was a Communist-controlled organization?

Mr. CARTER. I knew it was very definitely cited as that, and I came to the conclusion that the Commies took it over.

Senator EASTLAND. When did he take that position with the Peace Mobilization?

Mr. MORRIS. In 1940, was it not, Mr. Carter?

Mr. CARTER. It was the autumn of 1940, at the time that the Quakers, pacifists, and Reds were trying to keep us out of what was described as the Chamberlain-Daladier world.

Senator EASTLAND. Yes, but you knew that Field was a Communist, did you not?

Mr. CARTER. I know at that time he was behaving like a Communist.

Senator EASTLAND. You knew at that time that he was a Communist, did you not?

Mr. CARTER. I didn't deduce, as I said earlier, Senator, that because a man wrote for a Communist paper that accepted articles from non-Communists, that Mr. Field was a Communist.

Senator EASTLAND. That they have non-Communists on the board of editors?

Mr. CARTER. I am speaking of the earlier period when he was a contributor, not on the board of editors.

Senator EASTLAND. He was on the board of editors before 1940, was he not?

Mr. CARTER. That was the question that I challenge and beseech and beg Mr. Morris to produce for me.

Senator WATKINS. I would like to know what his memory is on it.

Mr. MORRIS. Excuse me, Senator.

You do know that he was executive secretary of the American Peace Mobilization in 1940, do you not?

Mr. CARTER. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. And you do admit now that the American Peace Mobilization was a Communist-controlled organization. Did you know it then?

Mr. CARTER. No.

Mr. MORRIS. When did you learn it?

Mr. CARTER. When they began picketing the White House.

Mr. MORRIS. When was that?

Mr. CARTER. In the following spring.

Senator EASTLAND. In 1941.

Mr. MORRIS. It certainly must have been before June 22, 1941, is that not so, Mr. Carter?

Mr. CARTER. Definitely.

Mr. MORRIS. And is not any date in 1940, a date preceding this 1942 date in which you helped to get Mr. Field a commission in the Intelligence?

Mr. CARTER. That is logical.

Senator EASTLAND. Is it not? Answer the question.

The CHAIRMAN. I think you had better be frank with the committee.

Mr. CARTER. I am trying to be. I am trying to understand the question.

Senator EASTLAND. So you knew, in 1942, that he was a Communist, did you not?

Mr. CARTER. I knew that he was playing the Communist line.

Senator EASTLAND. You knew that he was executive secretary of the American Peace Mobilization in 1940, that you say that you knew was a Communist organization?

Mr. CARTER. That I learned in 1941 was a Communist organization.

Senator EASTLAND. And then the following year, the following year there, you attempted to get that man a commission in Army Intelligence?

Mr. CARTER. I did.

Senator O'CONOR. Mr. Carter, did you make those facts known to the Army that you were possessed of?

Mr. CARTER. If I had the letter here, I am pretty sure that I mentioned his left-wing interests.

Senator O'CONOR. You have no recollection of it, or just what facts you did make known to the Army?

Mr. CARTER. No; but I believe Mr. Morris has the letter, and I would like to refresh my memory.

If I may explain that, Senator O'Conor, I felt here was a fellow who was torn between the left and 100 percent Americanism. I had the feeling that when we entered the war, and the issues were perfectly clear, that we were out on a democratic campaign, that he would, because of his very profound—he is a scholarly guy, I mean, everyone admits that.

Senator O'CONOR. Of course, a lot of Communists are who are un-American.

Mr. CARTER. Yes, sir. That he would throw himself in as a loyal servant of Uncle Sam, and could use his great knowledge to aid the United States in winning the war with Japan.

Senator O'CONOR. Did you really believe that he was so disposed?

Mr. CARTER. I did, frankly. I did.

Subsequent history would imply that I was wrong. But, at the time, I sincerely believed he could be switched over and made an asset on our side.

The CHAIRMAN. In other words, you thought he might be switched over after he went into the Intelligence Department of the Army?

Mr. CARTER. No; I thought that he realized already that he had made some mistakes, and that he was ready to come clean and serve our Government.

Senator O'CONOR. Mr. Carter, my question is, though, how much of that information you imparted to the Army, how much you told them as to your knowledge of his identification with Communist movements.

Mr. CARTER. Well, if I could get the letter, which undoubtedly Mr. Morris has——

Senator O'CONOR. I was really testing your memory, and wanted to get from you just what you recalled as to the extent of information that you gave to the Army on which you based your recommendation for his commission in the Intelligence.

Mr. CARTER. I think there are two factors, if I may, in answer to your questions. One was a positive statement that he had assets that might be used. The other side was I felt sure that even in those days Government security would check up, and if they found out things that I didn't know, or interpreted the items in a different way, that they would have the final say, that I wasn't sufficiently a big guy with Army Intelligence for them to take him on my say so, because even then there was a good deal of checking.

Senator O'CONOR. But you have not any further knowledge as to how much you revealed and how much you told the Government about your personal knowledge?

Mr. CARTER. No. I, presumably, didn't say as much as I would now, because my convictions now are quite different from what they were then.

Senator O'CONOR. How much do you know as to Owen Lattimore's connection with Frederick Field and as to his knowledge of Field's identification with these movements?

Mr. CARTER. Contrarily, Lattimore and Field were employees of the IPR, Lattimore of the international body, the Pacific Council; Field as secretary of the American IPR.

Field was considerably junior to Lattimore in years and in intelligence; though Field was very intelligent, I considered Lattimore a far better informed man. I think they met at conferences. I don't think they were buddies or pals.

Senator EASTLAND. Did you have information then that Lattimore followed the Communist Party line?

Mr. CARTER. No.

Senator EASTLAND. Is that your testimony?

Mr. CARTER. That is my testimony.

Senator EASTLAND. Then you had no information that Lattimore followed the Communist Party line?

Mr. CARTER. I made up my own mind, and I was quite convinced at that time that Lattimore did not follow the party line. If you want me to extend my remarks, I still believe that Lattimore is completely opposed to communism and to the imperialistic Russian expression of communism at the present time.

Senator SMITH. I was going to ask a question.

As I recall, that letter said something about your efforts in behalf of getting Mr. Field a commission in Intelligence.

Now, what other efforts did you make; what were those efforts other than a letter that you wrote?

Mr. CARTER. I don't remember.

Senator SMITH. You do not remember talking to anybody about that, anybody connected with the Army or with the Government?

Mr. CARTER. I don't remember to this day. It is some years ago; but if Mr. Morris has something that will be refreshing to my memory——

Senator SMITH. You do not recall any talk, conference, or conversation with Mr. Currie, who was then at the White House, as I understand it?

Mr. CARTER. I don't remember. It may be.

Senator WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I have a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well. Proceed.

Senator WATKINS. Before you wrote this letter in behalf of Field, did you discuss the matter with him?

Mr. CARTER. Undoubtedly.

Senator WATKINS. What is your memory about what he told you, about what he wanted to do?

Mr. CARTER. That he wanted to serve Uncle Sam. I was convinced that he did. I had no thought at that time that he would use a position in Intelligence to serve any enemies, though, of course, at that time, our allies were somewhat different than what they are at the present time.

Senator WATKINS. Did you call to his attention, then, his left-wing activities?

Mr. CARTER. I think, undoubtedly, I said that I think, "You were very questionable to picket the White House," and I probably reminded him that I had told him that I thought it was a great mistake for him to join the American Peace Mobilization, that it would hurt his usefulness, but that if that really was attaining the task, that he might be a very useful intelligence officer.

Senator EASTLAND. How can you testify now that all you did was write a letter, call his intellectual attainments to the attention of the Government, when, in the light of this letter—and I hand you a letter dated December 15, 1941, addressed to Frederick V. Field, and signed Edward C. Carter.

Did you write that letter? Answer my question, sir. Did you write that letter?

Mr. CARTER. It clearly is my letter.

Senator EASTLAND. Now, let me have it, please. [Reading:]

DEAR FRED: I was all set to talk to two or three people in Washington when I got your letter of the 10th at the Mayflower, with Stone's rather surprising reaction. I wonder if this reflects his attitude or merely that of his colleague. I am anxious to talk the whole situation over with you before I make the next move. I want very much to see your unusual gifts utilized to the fullest extent during the emergency. We can discuss this fully when you come to see me at the IPR Tuesday morning, at 9:45.

Now, explain that letter.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the date of that letter?

Senator EASTLAND. That is December 15, 1941.

The CHAIRMAN. Who is Mr. Stone?

Mr. MORRIS. Will you identify Mr. Stone, Mr. Carter?

Mr. CARTER. I can't for certain, but I believe it is William T. Stone, who was formerly Washington representative of the Foreign Policy Association, who was then in some Government agency job. I don't know which.

Senator EASTLAND. What do you mean by "I was all set to talk to two or three people in Washington"?

The CHAIRMAN. Now, about this letter, do you want it inserted in the record?

We are getting some letters here that have not been inserted in the record. I would like to keep the record as straight as I can.

Senator EASTLAND. He has identified this.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be marked for identification and inserted in the record.

DEAR FRED: I was all set to talk to two or three people in Washington when I got your letter of the 10th at the Mayflower, with Stone's rather surprising reaction. I wonder whether this reflects his attitude or merely that of his colleagues.

I am anxious to talk the whole situation over with you before I make the next move. I want very much to see your unusual gifts utilized to the fullest extent during the emergency. We can discuss this fully when you come to see me at the IPR Tuesday morning at 9:45.

Sincerely yours,

EDWARD C. CARTER.

Mr. SOURWINE. Might the other two previous letters go in the record ahead of this one?

The CHAIRMAN. There are a couple of other letters here that have been referred to that should go in the record, or at least be identified.

Mr. SOURWINE. They have been identified in the record, sir, but not for the record.

Mr. MORRIS. We will call one of them 3–A, another one 3–B, and this one 3–C. Those will be entered in the record as 3–B, 3–C, and 3–A.

MR. EDWARD C. CARTER,
Institute of Pacific Relations,
129 East Fifty-second Street, New York City.

DEAR MR. CARTER: Someone suggested the other day that Merian Cooper, our friend John Cooper's brother, was fairly high up in the Army Air Intelligence. This information was not definite, but sufficiently so to warrant checking. Am I not right in believing that you know him, that you met him in Hollywood through a letter from his brother? If so, do you know whether he actually is in Air Intelligence? And, do you know him well enough to bring my case to his attention?

I am enclosing a confidential account of my attempt to get into the Army to serve as a sort of aide memoire to anyone looking into it. I am also enclosing a copy of my original who's who on the basis of which I was regarded as sufficiently qualified for the job.

Nothing new to report. I had a good talk with Justine Wise Polier and her husband. Both are working on the matter. Presumably Owen is taking it up with Curry.

Again, many thanks,

Sincerely,

/S/ FRED.

MR. FREDERICK V. FIELD,
16 West Twelfth Street, New York City.

DEAR FRED: This is a belated acknowledgment of your letter of April 16 enclosing copies of the interchange of correspondence with Pollard.

I am terribly sorry that my efforts on behalf of you and also on behalf of Uncle Sam have not as yet yielded any substantial result.

I certainly hope that the situation will change in the near future.

May I congratulate you on the great value of the last issue of Amerasia.

With kindest regards,

Sincerely yours,

EDWARD C. CARTER.

DEAR MR. CARTER: The enclosed copies of an exchange of correspondence with Mr. Pollard of the Office of Coordinator of Information speak for themselves.

I propose devoting a large part of the next few months to baseball games and New Hartford.

Thank you again for your efforts.

Sincerely yours,

APRIL 16, 1942.

Mr. JOHN A. POLLARD,
Coordinator of Information,
270 Madison Avenue, New York City.

DEAR MR POLLARD: This will acknowledge receipt of your letter informing me that in the light of an FBI report your office could, or would, no longer consider me for a job.

This came as a great disappointment to me for I have been most anxious to serve the Government in some capacity that might be useful. It did not, however, come as a surprise. For I have yet to hear of a single person alleged by the FBI of having engaged in radical or liberal activities being assisted in obtaining a fair and open examination of the charges against him. I had also just learned of Mr. Gilmore's being fired by the Office of the Coordinator of Information.

One cannot help but be disturbed at the power which a small clique in the Government seems to have in judging the fitness of individuals for Government service without right of trial or defense. I am also disturbed at the apparent fear of those in charge of Federal offices to take any steps whatsoever to terminate this witch hunt against those whose entire record is that of being anti-Fascist.

I am, nevertheless, far more interested in seeing the war won than in creating any disturbance over this issue. At this particular period I fear that the latter course would be divisive. I shall, therefore, take no further steps to engage in war service so long as the present system of personnel selection prevails.

May I thank you most sincerely for your personal kindness in this matter.

Sincerely yours,

FREDERICK V. FIELD.

[Confidential]

COORDINATOR OF INFORMATION,
270 Madison Avenue, New York, April 14, 1942.

Mr. FREDERICK V. FIELD,
16 West Twelfth Street, New York City.

DEAR MR. FIELD: There seems to be nothing at all which can be done by this division to clarify your standing in the light of the Federal Bureau of Investigation report.

I am extremely sorry to have to advise that this is so, but the fact stands and there seems to be no conclusion to draw from it except that we could not go further in considering your availability for and expressed interest in the work of our division.

I wish you luck in finding war service which will be open to you.

Cordially yours,

JOHN A. POLLARD,
Special Reports Division.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well. They have been referred to in the testimony by the witness.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, I wonder, attached to that short letter that I just identified was another letter which I didn't look at. May I have the privilege of looking at that?

Senator EASTLAND. I just asked you to identify the letter so I could question you about it.

What were those activities that you say you were about to make?

Mr. CARTER. I thought I could give you a more satisfactory answer.

Senator EASTLAND. No, sir. I want you to answer what those activities were. That other letter was not to you, you know that.

Mr. CARTER. I haven't seen it. We have established, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MORRIS. Have you identified Mr. Stone? You mentioned William Stone. What does Mr. Stone do?

Mr. CARTER. Well, at the time, I remember these facts: He had been president of the Foreign Policy Association, had been Washington representative of the Foreign Policy Association. Then, at the time of the war, he went into some Government agency. I do not know what.

Mr. MORRIS. Do you know what he is doing now?

Mr. CARTER. He is in some Government agency. I haven't seen him for several years.

Senator EASTLAND. I want him to answer my question now.

What is it that you were going to talk about, and who was it that you were going to talk to?

Mr. CARTER. We have established, Senator Eastland, the fact that I wrote a letter commending him. This letter clearly indicates that from this man Stone, presumably W. T. Stone, Mr. Field received something very discouraging about the chance of his getting a commission, and that I was inclined to do something further. But it was suggested that we get together to talk over what the instructions were.

Senator EASTLAND. You said here a very plain statement. I want you to answer the question. You are dodging the question, Mr. Carter.

Mr. CARTER. I am sorry.

Senator EASTLAND [reading]:

> I was all set to talk to two or three people in Washington when I got your letter of the 10th at the Mayflower.

Now, who are those people, and what were you going to talk to them about?

Mr. CARTER. For the first question, I haven't the faintest idea now who were the two or three people he was going to talk to.

The second thing is that I felt that the matter should be pressed forward, and that I would talk to two or three people following up the letter.

Senator EASTLAND. You had intended, now, making some contacts?

Mr. CARTER. I certainly did.

Senator EASTLAND. To get Field a commission in Army Intelligence; had you not?

Mr. CARTER. Absolutely.

The CHAIRMAN. Now you just told us a little while ago that you did not propose to enter into any wire-pulling or seeing Senators, or anything of that kind.

Mr. CARTER. This has refreshed my memory and given me a more adequate basis for answering the question.

Senator SMITH. Mr. Carter, Mr. Stone is now in the State Department; is he not?

Mr. CARTER. William T. Stone is, presumably the same man.

Senator SMITH. He has been for several years; has he not?

Mr. CARTER. I think so.

Senator SMITH. You knew that. Is he one of the men that you intended to see to assist in getting Field a commission in the Intelligence?

Mr. CARTER. I can't answer. It would be quite likely because I had known him in New York long before the war.

Senator SMITH. Now, do you know whether or not Mr. Stone, Mr. Currie, and Mr. Lattimore were friends or acquaintances?

Mr. CARTER. Well, I know that Mr. Lattimore knew Mr. Lauchlin Currie because it was through the President's, I think Mr. Currie, executive assistant to the President, executive assistant who handled a number of the President's negotiations with Chiang Kai-shek; and, that in connection with the invitation from Chiang Kai-shek for Lattimore to go out as his political adviser——

Senator SMITH. That is not what I asked you, Mr. Carter. We have heard that.

I am asking you whether or not you knew Mr. Stone, Lattimore, and Currie were all friends at that time, at the time you were trying to get Field a commission in the Intelligence.

Mr. CARTER. I didn't picture them as a special group.

The CHAIRMAN. In fairness to yourself, you should answer the question, Mr. Carter.

Mr. MORRIS. May I supplement the question?

The CHAIRMAN. No.

I think in fairness to yourself, you should answer the question. The question was: Did you know that they were all friends at the time?

Mr. CARTER. I knew they were acquaintances.

Senator SMITH. You knew they were interested in one capacity or another in the foreign affairs and foreign relations of the Government?

Mr. CARTER. Absolutely.

Senaor SMITH. And did you know whether or not each of the three knew Field?

Mr. CARTER. I knew that Lattimore did. I don't remember about Currie. I am certain that Stone knew Field, because they were in the same general foreign affairs gang when Stone was in the AIPR and Field was in the IPR.

Senator SMITH. Mr. Carter, after having your memory refreshed by these letters and conversations, will you tell us now whether or not you aimed at Lattimore, Mr. Currie, and Mr. Stone to participate in securing a commission in the Intelligence for Mr. Field?

Mr. CARTER. Certainly, it points that way very definitely, and whether I had other people in mind, I don't know.

Senator SMITH. And you realized that each of those three gentlemen were in strategic positions to assist in that effort?

Mr. CARTER. That is quite clear.

Senator SMITH. Yes.

Senator O'CONOR. Mr. Carter, just on that point, and to clear up something that you have left in doubt, I have a letter before me addressed to you from Frederick V. Field, dated December 10, 1941, on the letterhead of Amerasia, and it shows that on the editorial board Frederick V. Field was chairman, and members of the board were Owen Lattimore and William T. Stone.

Mr. CARTER. Thank you very much for refreshing my memory.

Senator O'CONOR. How could you indicate any doubt as to the association among those men when the very letter addressed to you shows it on the letterhead, that they are all associated?

Mr. CARTER. Well, I wasn't always carrying a letterhead of Amerasia around with me.

Senator O'CONOR. Yes, but here was a letter which came to you and from Field. I will read it to you, one or two sentences, to indicate that you were put on notice of something very serious, that a man whom you had recommended for a commission in the Army Intelligence, knowing that he was a Communist, had already met with resistance.

Let me read you a line or two to indicate that it was not just a passing thing, that you would not have to regain in your memory a letterhead, but it was a serious thing, that you were doing something detrimental to the interests of your country. Let me just read it to you. It is from Field to you.

> I have just had a conversation with Bill Stone over long distance. He was speaking from the office of the Economic Defense Board and indicated that we should go into the problem of my getting a job more fully in personal conversation. Nevertheless we had enough of a talk to convey a pretty clear picture. Bill said that there would be very formidable obstacles indeed to my getting a Washington job.

Now, do you recall that?

Mr. CARTER. Have I seen that before, Mr. Morris?

Mr. MORRIS. I have not shown it to you, Mr. Carter.

Senator O'CONOR. It is a letter to you, addressed to you, and, ostensibly, was received. Do you need to see it to remember that that important development occurred?

Mr. CARTER. Yes; I don't need to see it. I take it from you that I wrote it.

Senator O'CONOR. No; that you received it.

The CHAIRMAN. Identify that, Senator, if you will.

Senator O'CONOR. Yes; this is a letter on the stationery of Amerasia, dated December 10, 1941, addressed to Edward C. Carter, Hotel Mayflower, Washington, D. C. It is signed Fred. It is on the stationery of Amerasia, and the editorial board has Frederick V. Field, chairman. I would be very glad to have you examine it.

Mr. CARTER. I identify it as having been received, and with the members of the editorial board, including Kenneth Colegrove, who is with Northwestern University.

Senator O'CONOR. I refer, Mr. Carter, to the point in answer to your question to the Senator from North Carolina, where you indicated some doubt as to William T. Stone's identification with these other persons, Frederick V. Field and Owen Lattimore.

My question is: Did that, in any sense, clarify it?

Mr. CARTER. Very greatly.

Senator O'CONOR. Very greatly. Now, having been clarified, what is your response to it, and what do you say now?

Mr. CARTER. Well, that Stone indicated that Field hadn't had a chance of a Government job.

Senator O'CONOR. Does it? In the very next sentence, he says he believed, referring to Stone, that these difficulties might disappear in time. Does that not indicate that there was still a chance, and that you all were still hoping for the day when Field would get by and get a commission in Army Intelligence?

Mr. CARTER. Speaking for myself, I was in that position.

The CHAIRMAN. I would like to get that cleared up. He said, "Speaking for myself, I was in that position."

Just what did you mean by that, please?

Mr. CARTER. Well, I am not presuming to tell what 8 or 10 years ago the position of other people was. I felt it was only fair for me to state that I clearly, at that time, saw there were difficulties, I anticipated them, I had talked to Field and said his Peace Mobilization and his picketing the White House were pretty lousy, and that this was confirmation from this man Stone that there were difficulties, and that Stone thought they might be surmounted.

The CHAIRMAN. You yourself thought they might be surmounted? Did you mean that as a part of your answer?

Mr. CARTER. And still, at that time, I did feel that, on balance with the checks and balances of security checking up on him, and so on, that if he passed all the hurdles, that he would be a good officer.

The CHAIRMAN. And he might get in?

Mr. CARTER. Might get in.

Senator SMITH. Mr. Carter, at that time, then, you were possessed with at least some degree of determination to get Mr. Field into that Intelligence job, if you could, even in spite of the fact that you knew there were questionable circumstances about his career up to that point?

Mr. CARTER. Yes.

Senator SMITH. You were still determined to try to get him into Government service?

Mr. CARTER. Yes. All the evidence points that out.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the answer.

Mr. CARTER. That was my honest conviction, with all of these provisos and hedges, and so on.

Senator WATKINS. During that time that this conversation was going on, and at the time you had been requested to aid him, he was the financial angel for IPR, was he not?

Mr. CARTER. Not financial agent.

Senator WATKINS. Angel. He was helping all the time.

The CHAIRMAN. You may use your own term, if you wish.

Mr. CARTER. He was a minor cherub. The main support came from the Rockefeller Foundation and Carnegie Foundation and large American business corporations.

The CHAIRMAN. But he was picking up the deficit?

Mr. CARTER. He picked up several deficits very handsomely.

Senator EASTLAND. Did the Institute of Pacific Relations follow the Communist Party far-eastern program?

Mr. CARTER. I would say definitely not.

Senator EASTLAND. You did not?

Mr. CARTER. If anyone has read the 400 volumes and the periodicals, rather than simply a letter here and there, I think they would become convinced.

Senator EASTLAND. I would like to ask you this question, Sir: Did the institute, or did you as an official of the institute, recommend people to the State Department of the United States for employment?

Mr. CARTER. Several times we had requests from various agencies of the Government to suggest a man for this or that job.

Senator EASTLAND. I asked you about the State Department. We will get to the others later.

Mr. CARTER. A number of our people, more of our junior people, were employed by the State Department during the war and since.

Senator EASTLAND. Who were those people?

Mr. CARTER. I think more of the people who went into the Army. Of the State Department, Robert W. Barnett is in the State Department at the present time. He went from us, however, to General Chennault's staff in Kunming. There must have been others.

Mr. MORRIS. Were you instrumental in having Mr. Jessup go into the State Department?

Mr. CARTER. No. We regarded him as a competent man.

Mr. MORRIS. Well, he was chairman of your board of trustees, was he not?

Mr. CARTER. He was chairman of the Pacific Council for some time, and we found him very useful.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Was he chairman of your board of trustees? Will you answer that question yes or no, please?

Mr. CARTER. Yes.

Senator EASTLAND. Let him tell who else. Let him tell who else they placed in the State Department.

Mr. CARTER. Jessup was chairman of the American IPR in 1939 and 1940.

The CHAIRMAN. Chairman of what?

Mr. CARTER. Chairman of the American IPR.

The CHAIRMAN. The American IPR is the Institute of Pacific Relations?

Mr. CARTER. Of the American Institute of Pacific Relations, and he was chairman of the Pacific council from 1939 to 1942.

I may have something here, Senator, that refreshes my memory on what other members of the IPR staff were employed in the State Department.

The CHAIRMAN. My recollection is, and perhaps the record would correct me, that Senator Eastland's question was, Who did you recommend for employment in the State Department?

Senator EASTLAND. That is right.

Mr. CARTER. The one that I referred to, he went on to General Chennault's staff in Kunming, on intelligence work, and from there went into the State Department.

Senator EASTLAND. You testified to that. Now, who else was there?

Mr. CARTER. I would like to give the most complete answer. My memory is a blank. I don't know whether it would be permissible for me to consult Mr. Holland, who is in the room or not. I am anxious to give every name.

Senator EASTLAND. Will you give us that information?

Senator WATKINS. Did you recommend anybody to the State Department?

Senator EASTLAND. He testified they did.

Senator WATKINS. I did not get that, if he did.

Mr. CARTER. I think you are right. If the State Department consulted us on men like Barnett, I am very certain that they did in good character, because I don't remember anyone that we had who, at the time, would have hesitated to recommend. Maybe there was.

The CHAIRMAN. Your answer stands thus: The only one whom you recommended was a man by the name of Barnett.

Mr. CARTER. I think we must have given him a letter to OSS, if he was in OSS with Chennault.

The CHAIRMAN. The question by Senator Watkins is: Did you recommend anybody?

Mr. CARTER. That, I prefer, with a little time, to look up. Perhaps if we had an intermission shortly this afternoon, I could do it.

Senator WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, there is one matter I started a while ago, but it was overcome by a lot of other questions.

The CHAIRMAN. All right. You may proceed.

Senator WATKINS. I would like to have the witness finish the conversation that he had with Mr. Field about helping him get the commission in the Air Force Intelligence.

You detailed some, but I want to give the full conversation as you remember it, what you said, and what Mr. Field said.

Mr. CARTER. One of the American Peace Mobilization picketing the White House, and the relation to New Masses, very likely to hit him in the eye and throw him out, that I personally at that time thought he could be useful.

Senator WATKINS. What was his reply when you made that statement to him?

Mr. CARTER. That he had done these things for conscience's sake, because he didn't want to get into a Chamberlain-Daladier war. If it was a real war, to fight for democracy, he would go into it with both feet.

Senator WATKINS. Did he show any signs of repentance?

Mr. CARTER. A little sheepish.

Senator WATKINS. What did he say? Let us judge whether it was sheepish or not by what he said.

Mr. CARTER. I wish my memory was photographic. I can only remember the impression, not the exact words.

Senator WATKINS. Did he tell you the people that he thought could help him?

Mr. CARTER. You mean in getting——

Senator WATKINS. Yes; did he discuss the matter of who to help him get that commission?

Mr. CARTER. He may have mentioned Gen. Frank McCoy and Admiral Yarnell, both of whom he knew and who had been very useful in the IPR. Both of them had been members of the board, General McCoy and Admiral Harry E. Yarnell.

Senator WATKINS. You say he may have done it. Actually, did he mention those?

Mr. CARTER. Yes.

Senator WATKINS. He did mention those. Did he mention any others who could help him? How about Mr. Lauchlin Currie?

Mr. CARTER. I can't remember any more.

Senator O'CONOR. I have just one point along the line of what Senator Watkins was asking you about.

To clear up and finish this letter, Mr. Carter, was there any other position under discussion which Mr. Field thought he might get?

Mr. CARTER. I remember none.

Senator O'CONOR. I see. Well, now, I read just two additional passages from this letter.

The CHAIRMAN. Identify the letter.

Senator O'CONOR. Yes. It is the same letter of December 10, 1941, addressed by Mr. Field to Mr. Carter, on the letterhead of Amerasia.

After saying that he believed that the difficulties against him might disappear, he said, "I told him," that is, Bill Stone, "that I thought it would be a great mistake for me to get officially turned down, that is, that I should make no formal attempt until the way had been cleared."

Then, dropping down, it says, "Bill entirely agreed with this view."

After stating that, in the light of that, he sees no reason for him to come to Washington, he makes this statement, "I recognize that one of the difficulties of employing a person in my position, perhaps the chief difficulty, is not in the attitude of the directors of these Government agencies * * ." Apparently he thought that was pretty easy to get past. Do you think so? " * * but in their desire to avoid criticism from Congress or other sources."

He mentions about newspapers.

Now, here is the important thing that I would like to ask you about, all of this difficulty about his getting this particular position of the Army Intelligence, "Perhaps, however, it would not apply to the other form of Government work which you yourself suggested."

Now, I would like to ask you what other form of Government work you, Mr. Carter, suggested to Frederick Field that he could get, knowing that he was a Communist or had Communist sympathies.

Mr. CARTER. I think the obvious ones; I don't remember in detail, would have been OWI or OSS, or, because of his knowledge of the economics of both China and Japan, the Board of Economic Warfare, where he had already shown himself very competent as an economist on the whole far-eastern area.

Senator EASTLAND. What about the State Department, Mr. Carter?

Mr. CARTER. I don't remember. It might have been.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Morris has a question.

Mr. MORRIS. In connection with Senator Eastland's question about the Communist Party line, I would like to introduce one letter into evidence, and I would like to ask Mr. Carter to comment on it.

The CHAIRMAN. Identify the letter.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Carter, I am going to read to you from the photostatic copy of a letter addressed to Mr. E. C. Carter.

The CHAIRMAN. Before you go on with that, the letter that Senator O'Conor used in interrogating the witness, perhaps, should be introduced to the record.

Senator O'CONOR. Yes; I would like to offer it in evidence. It has not been offered, and I would like to do so.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be offered and inserted in the record.

EDITORIAL BOARD

Frederick V. Field, Chairman — Philip J. Jaffe, Managing Editor

T. A. Bisson, Ch'ao-ting Chi, Kenneth W. Colegrove, Owen Lattimore, Kate Mitchell, Cyrus H. Peake, David H. Popper, William T. Stone

NEW YORK, December 10, 1941.

MR. EDWARD C. CARTER,
Hotel Mayflower, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. CARTER: I have just had a conversation with Bill Stone over long distance. He was speaking from the Office of the Economic Defense Board and indicated that we could go into the problem of my getting a job more fully in personal conversation. Nevertheless we had enough of a talk to convey a pretty clear picture.

Bill said that there would be very formidable obstacles indeed to my getting a Washington job, and that that included the Economic Defense Board which was quite liberal. He believed that these difficulties might disappear in time. I told him that I thought it would be a great mistake for me to get officially turned down, that is that I should make no formal attempt until the way had been cleared. A turn-down would be a most unfortunate precedent not only for myself but also for a large number of other liberals. It would be particularly unfortunate for the Government itself, for it would indicate that they don't mean to carry out the President's plea for unity. No one is now interested in putting them, or ourselves in that position. Bill entirely agreed with this view.

In the light of that conversation, he and I agreed that there was little point in my coming to Washington this week. Instead we arranged to meet in New York next week.

I recognize that one of the difficulties of employing a person in my position—perhaps the chief difficulty—lies not in the attitude of the directors of these Government agencies, but in their desire to avoid criticism from Congress or other sources (e. g., certain newspapers, the Reader's Digest, those willing to print articles by unqualified liars). This is obviously a legitimate reason.

Perhaps, however, it would not apply to the other form of Government work which you yourself suggested. It might not apply because the very nature of that work, as I understand it, implies avoidance of personnel publicity.

I would, therefore, be most grateful to you if, on your return to New York, you could suggest that I be considered for that type of work. This assuming that the attitude you find regarding a Washington job is similar to Bill Stone's information.

Many thanks for your help, and apologies for adding one more incidental to your many preoccupations.

Best regards.

FRED.

The CHAIRMAN. This letter that you are now working on should be identified in some way.

Mr. MORRIS. Yes, sir. Mr. Chairman, this is a letter on the letterhead of Pacific Affairs. It is dated Independence, Calif., July 10, 1938. It is addressed to Mr. E. C. Carter. It is signed by Mr. Owen Lattimore. It is a two-and-one-half-page letter.

I am going to ask Mr. Mandel if he will testify to the authenticity of this document.

Mr. MANDEL. I do.

Mr. MORRIS. I would like to read, before offering this into evidence, Mr. Chairman, two paragraphs from this letter.

Senator EASTLAND. Who is the letter from or to?

Mr. MORRIS. It is from Mr. Owen Lattimore to Mr. E. C. Carter, dated July 10, 1938.

The CHAIRMAN. I think the witness should do it.

Senator WATKINS. He probably can identify it better than anyone.

Mr. CARTER. I would like to read it later, but identify it as having been written by Lattimore to me; that I received it.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Carter, I would like to read two paragraphs from this, and ask your comments on them. This is Mr. Lattimore writing to you.

Senator WATKINS. What is the date of the letter?

Mr. MORRIS. It is July 10, 1938. [Reading:]

I think that you are pretty cagey in turning over so much of the China section of the inquiry to Asiaticus, Han-seng, and Chi. They will bring out the absolutely essential radical aspects, but can be depended on to do it with the right touch.

Continuing:

For the general purposes of this inquiry, it seems to me that the good scoring position for the IPR differs with different countries. For China, my hunch is that it will pay to keep behind the official Chinese Communist position, far enough not to be covered by the same label, but enough ahead of the active Chinese liberals to be noticeable. For Japan, on the other hand, hang back so as not to be inconveniently ahead of the Japanese liberals who cannot keep up whereas the Chinese liberals can.

I am skipping a sentence here:

For the U. S. S. R.—

that is, for the Soviet Republic—

back their international policy in general, but without using their slogans and, above all, without giving them or anybody else an impression of subservience.

I stop reading at that point.

Now, I would like to ask you a few questions, Mr. Carter, on those two points.

What was the inquiry that you referred to in this letter?

Mr. CARTER. The inquiry was a research financed to the extent of $90,000 by the Rockefeller Foundation, an inquiry into the issues of the Sino-Japanese War.

I was in Peking in 1937 when the Japanese came in and took Tientsin and Peking at the time of the famous Marco Polo Gate incident.

It was clear that the Japanese were on the march for aggression throughout China and further afield. It seemed to me that here we had an opportunity, while their major war was starting, to get people from different points of view to analyze the various features.

As a matter of fact, though Lattimore implies it, neither Asiaticus, Chi, nor Han-seng were major contributors to this study.

A number of other scholars—British, American, Australian, and so on—did contribute. For some reason or other, these three men did not make major contributions.

Mr. MORRIS. I think the letter, in that Mr. Lattimore said:

I think you are pretty cagey in turning over so much of the China inquiry to Asiaticus, Han-seng, and Chi.

Mr. CARTER. Presumably Mr. Lattimore was uninformed, or maybe I talked about it and didn't go through with it.

Senator EASTLAND. What did he mean by "cagey"?

Mr. CARTER. Did I use the word?

Senator EASTLAND. No; he said that in his letter. What did he mean by "cagey"; that you were cagey to turn it over to some Communists? That is what they were.

Mr. CARTER. He was attributing a skill or motive that I did not implement and carry out. I think he probably was trying to pay me a compliment.

Senator EASTLAND. Pay you a compliment to turn over that China section there to Communists, noted Communists?

Mr. CARTER. First of all, they were not noted Communists at that time.

Senator EASTLAND. They are noted Communists; are they not?

Mr. CARTER. They are today.

Senator EASTLAND. Yes, and they were then; were they not?

Mr. CARTER. I didn't know they were.

Senator EASTLAND. Are you a Communist?

Mr. CARTER. No. I have never been, am not now, and I plan never to be.

Senator EASTLAND. Now, he told you there that he recommended you to follow the Russian line without the appearance of subservience; did he not?

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Lattimore's letter, and I received it. I haven't followed the party line.

The CHAIRMAN. This expression here says: "I think that you are pretty cagey in turning over so much of the China section of the inquiry to Asiaticus." That "you are pretty cagey."

You had evidently done something that he was commending as being "cagey."

Mr. CARTER. The facts are, Senator, that I didn't actually do it.

Senator EASTLAND. Who was Asiaticus?

Mr. CARTER. He was a man who personally I never met, who was long on the China coast, who wrote for continental——

Senator EASTLAND. What was his name, sir?

Mr. CARTER. I haven't the slightest memory.

Senator EASTLAND. But you know he is a Communist?

Mr. CARTER. I now know that.

Senator EASTLAND. Yes. He wrote for Communist publications; did he not?

Mr. CARTER. I now know that.

Senator EASTLAND. Yes, sir.

Mr. CARTER. And for capitalists as well.

Senator O'CONOR. Mr. Carter, you answered Senator McCarran's question that you did not entirely adopt this Owen Lattimore's suggestion in following the party line. Would you say that Owen Lattimore was following the Communist Party line?

Mr. CARTER. No; I said that earlier, and I reaffirm it now.

Senator O'CONOR. Have you any other explanation to make as to why he would propose, in these words, "My hunch is that it will pay to keep behind the official Chinese Communist position?"

Senator EASTLAND. Wait a minute: "* * * far enough not to be covered by the same label."

Senator O'CONOR. Can you give any further explanation of that, if he was not following the Communist Party line?

Mr. CARTER. Here, if I may take your time, Senator, I don't think it will take long.

The CHAIRMAN. You are going to answer the question?

Mr. CARTER. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

Mr. CARTER. I said earlier that the Institute of Pacific Relations was made up of 10 or 12 national scientific academies—England, Japan, Australia, and the U. S. S. R. That was our biggest headache, to get cooperation.

We sincerely wanted cooperation on two theories, either that they were devils, and we should know the worst, or that their Oriental scholars had something to contribute.

One of the most active councils was the China IPR, which was made up of people who were friendly to Chiang Kai-shek and the Comintern. Then, until Pearl Harbor, the Japanese were in.

If you take the tensions of the British Council, the Dutch Council, and so on, along with Japanese and Russians, we were walking a tightrope. Maybe we were fools to think that people in Russia could ever find a meeting ground for cooperating with scholars in a democratic world. But we made that attempt in good faith. I am inclined to think that, thinking of this balancing act of our 10 or 12 national councils, Lattimore was thinking more in institute terms than in general political terms, and that we were using such as Sir George Sansom, and a whole kaleidoscope of people of different points of view, and trying to keep a reasonably united group of scholars, aiming to find a basic path of the Far East countries.

The CHAIRMAN. Now let me go back to the question. Reading the language of this letter—that is, of July 10, 1938—which you say is from Mr. Lattimore to you, I read again:

> I think that you are pretty cagey in turning over so much of the China section of the inquiry to Asiaticus, Han-seng, and Chi.

I draw your attention to this:

> They will bring out the absolutely essential radical aspects, but can be depended on to do it with the right touch.

Does that draw your attention to anything at the time you received it?

Mr. CARTER. It clearly must have. It was within this framework of getting all tints of view.

The CHAIRMAN. Were you intent on bringing out and assisting the absolutely radical aspect of the U. S. S. R.?

Mr. CARTER. We were intent on bringing out this complex of contending forces with different national groups having different ends, and we could only serve the American public and the wider international public if we had spokesmen for all substantial points of view. That, Mr. Chairman, was my aim for a great many years.

The CHAIRMAN. That would indicate to you that Mr. Lattimore was pretty conversant with conditions in the radical line; is that not true?

Mr. CARTER. I think in his later years he spent a good deal of time——

The CHAIRMAN. No, when you received that. Would that not arouse your interest immediately to Mr. Lattimore?

Mr. CARTER. What is the date of that?

The CHAIRMAN. I am dwelling on the language again: "They will bring out the absolutely essential radical aspects." He must have known what they would bring out. He must have been familiar with them; must he not?

Mr. CARTER. He must certainly have been convinced that it was important to get radical, conservative, all points of view.

The CHAIRMAN. And did that not immediately arouse your attention as to Mr. Lattimore?

Mr. CARTER. It didn't, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

Senator WATKINS. I wanted to ask one question. I understood you to say, Mr. Carter, that you did not know Asiaticus.

Mr. CARTER. I don't remember ever having met him, nor do I remember what names or name this was a nom de plume for.

Senator WATKINS. How about Han-seng?

Mr. CARTER. I knew Dr. Han-seng for several years.

Senator WATKINS. And Chi?

Mr. CARTER. I knew him for several years.

Senator WATKINS. How did it come about that you would recommend a man to take over this section of the inquiry that you did not know?

Mr. CARTER. I testified earlier, Senator Watkins, that I did not hand over major sections of the inquiry to Asiaticus, Han-seng, or Dr. Chi. Lattimore seemed under the impression that I had, or was about to. Lattimore was in error in that assumption.

Senator WATKINS. This letter itself was in answer to correspondence you had with him?

Mr. CARTER. Presumably, yes.

Senator WATKINS. I know he mentioned the letter from Wellington about the paper bombs and so forth.

Mr. CARTER. Well, Wellington was secretary of the China IPR, and was still an official of the National government.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, if you are adjourning now, in the afternoon session I would like to introduce the evidence that we have compiled on Asiaticus, Han-seng, and Chi. But, at the same time, I would like for this to be inserted in the record as exhibit No. 4.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be inserted in the record.

(Document referred to was marked "Exhibit No. 4," and is as follows:)

EXHIBIT NO. 4

PACIFIC AFFAIRS,
Independence, Calif., July, 10, 1938.

Mr. E. C. CARTER.

DEAR CARTER: For a fortnight I have been without a stenographer, and things have piled up on me so that I must have a whack, in my own bad typing, at trying to clear the accumulation a bit.

The letter from Wellington about the paper bombs was illuminating. I was interested to hear about the Mr. Kuo who had spent 20 years in Japan. The Japanese have some first-class experts whose finesse in dealing with warlords and crooked politicians is extraordinary. Their weakness is that they do not know the young China that is growing up from under all the rotten debris; and what they do know they underrate.

I was also interested in the Timperley correspondence. One of the most subtle and difficult problems in timing is to attempt to plot the graph showing the moment when all the liberal and decent opinion in England, discrepant and unintegrated as it is, ranging from the Timperleys to the Lyttons to the Alexanders to the Barbara Woottens to the Freda Utleys and back toward the Amalgamated Engineers and so on, will coalesce enough to check Chamberlain and his bunch. I think it will coalesce all right, but will it be too late?

In this connection I was especially interested, in the remark, in your letter to Alsberg, about the possibility that the Chamberlain government might countenance a Far East settlement that would be totally unacceptable to Washington. This cuts near the bone. Naturally, the remark led me to wonder whether you would consider my proposed September editorial a well-timed poke in the eye or an ill-timed thorn in the pants.

The letter to Alsberg also brought me up to date on a number of points. I was interested to hear that Hu Shih is going to Europe. At the end of his considerable stay, what is your estimate of the weight that he swings in American circles and the extent to which he molds or leads the opinions of Chinese in America?

I think that you are pretty cagey in turning over so much of the China section of the inquiry to Asiaticus, Han-seng and Chi. They will bring out the absolutely essential radical aspects, but can be depended on to do it with the right touch.

For the general purposes of this inquiry it seems to me that the good scoring position, for the IPR, differs with different countries. For China, my hunch is that it will pay to keep behind the official Chinese Communist position—far enough not to be covered by the same label—but enough ahead of the active Chinese liberals to be noticeable. For Japan, on the other hand, hang back so as not to be inconveniently ahead of the Japanese liberals, who cannot keep up, whereas the Chinese liberals can. So the chief thing is to oppose the military wing of Japanese aggression in China, counting on a check there to take care of both the military and the civilian components of aggression in Japan. For the British—scare the hell out of them, always in a polite way, but usually in a way that looks as if it might turn impolite. The British liberal groups are badly flustered; and being British, the way to encourage them to pull themselves together is to fluster the Tories. For the U. S. S. R.—back their international policy in general, but without using their slogans and above all without giving them or anybody else an impression of subservience. When it comes to the French, my wisdom fails. I haven't the vaguest idea what the real French constituency of our French affiliates is. The guy in Yosemite who thought he was on a ranch in the wild West may be the equivalent in France of Alexander in England, but I can't spot the French opposite number of Archie Rose, or Barbara Wootten, or George Taylor.

Yasuo seems to be functioning very creditably on the change from direct current to alternating current; but you are right, at any moment that whole fuse may blow out.

With Kurt Block I have begun a correspondence, but I am waiting for a clearer line on him. So many of the Germans drifting around now are interpermeated in the most curious way with both Marxism and Nazi hokum.

For the Italian stake in the Far East, have you checked on a tame, or at least semidomesticated Italian whom Lasswell has on some kind of a string (possibly frayed and still more possibly defrayed) in Chicago? Name of Renzo Sereno.

The news that Motylev may actually be over here in August is splendid. Tell him I have a mountain right here that he can climb any time.

Back to Block. Fred has sent me a copy of his letter to you of June 28, commenting on Block's memorandum on Germany's Far Eastern interests. I agree with Fred's main point—about the confusion caused to German commercial interests in China. Undoubtedly the German trading community in China bitterly resented the Japanese invasion and the political attitude taken by Germany. German trade even in Japan has also been thrown out of gear by the Japanese exchange restrictions. Nevertheless, the Germans who actually earn their living in the Far East are not the real big shots. Therefore I think Block may be broadly right; the determining interests in Germany decided that it was time to put their money on the eventual triumph of Japan; which necessarily means discounting immediate losses.

Fred has also sent me a copy of his letter to you of June 27, commenting on the San Francisco Japanese attacks on the IPR personnel. My position in this is a little different from Fred's. His work, even where it touches political controversy, is a logical extension of his economic research. He is also, as he points out in his letter, careful to the point of punctilio in his public appearances and speeches.

In my own case, before I had anything to do with the IPR I made my living partly by commercial lecturing and freelance writing. My political, travel and personal-observation and personal-opinion writing was undoubtedly better known than my academic work. In the circumstances, it would be silly and look timid for me to creep into the shelter of my desk and avoid further expression of opinions that I am already known to have. Considering, also, the way in which individuals of the Japanese IPR (Nasu specifically) have publicly endorsed such challenging measures of Japanese "forward policy" as military agricultural colonization in Manchuria, I do not see that Japanese publicists are entitled to question American employees of the IPR who express themselves on public issues as American citizens.

We are all doing fine now, and I am getting on with my book.

Yours very sincerely,

OWEN LATTIMORE.

The CHAIRMAN. Gentlemen, at what hour would it be convenient to reconvene, 2 o'clock or 2:30?

The committee stands recessed until 2:30.

(Whereupon, at 12:40 p. m., the hearing was recessed until 2:30 p. m. of the same day.)

AFTERNOON SESSION

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will come to order.

You may proceed, Mr. Morris. Mr. Sourwine advises the Chair that he wishes to take up a letter at this point, however.

Mr. SOURWINE. Mr. Carter, I hold in my hand a press release marked for immediate release July 25, 1951, from the Institute of Pacific Relations. I ask you have you seen that press release?

TESTIMONY OF EDWARD C. CARTER, NEW YORK, N. Y.—Resumed

Mr. CARTER. I saw it just before the morning session.

Mr. SOURWINE. Did you in any way participate in its preparation?

Mr. CARTER. No.

Mr. SOURWINE. Did you have opportunity when you saw it before the morning session to read it and note its contents?

Mr. CARTER. Hurriedly.

Mr. SOURWINE. You are then familiar with the fact that this press release states that Mr. William L. Holland, executive vice president of the American IPR today made the following statement:

Despite the fact that some of the institute's dead files were illegally seized last February by an agent of the subcommittee * * *.

In other words, that this press release at the outset seeks to convey the charge that the subcommittee acted illegally of taking possession under subpena of the files that were in the barn in Lee?

Mr. CARTER. My understanding, Mr. Sourwine, is that the question on the legal basis of subpena, I thought a subpena could subpena people, but I didn't know that it could subpena documents.

Mr. SOURWINE. I wasn't asking at the moment for your opinion in regard to what a subpena could or could not do. I was asking if you were familiar with the charge made.

Mr. CARTER. Yes.

Mr. SOURWINE. Is it in any sense your charge?

Mr. CARTER. I would associate myself with it.

Mr. SOURWINE. Disassociate yourself from it or with it?

Mr. CARTER. I associate with it.

Mr. SOURWINE. Have you had legal advice with regard to that charge?

Mr. CARTER. Yes.

Mr. SOURWINE. Are you yourself a lawyer?

Mr. CARTER. No.

Mr. SOURWINE. Your position is that the committee took an illegal action when it took possession of the files under subpena in Lee, Mass.?

Mr. CARTER. Yes; because they didn't take them from an officer of the Institute of Pacific Relations. They didn't take them from me, on whose property they were stored. They could have gotten them all by asking the IPR.

Mr. SOURWINE. Mr. Carter, I wasn't asking for an argument on the matter and I didn't intend to make one. I simply wanted the record to show that if the charge was made that you were associating yourself with it, that that was the fact, and whether or not you had legal advice in connection with it.

Mr. CARTER. The institute had legal advice. It was reported to me that the institute had legal advice. I personally had great confidence in the legal firm that gave the advice. Personally, I associate myself with it.

Mr. SOURWINE. What was that firm?

Mr. CARTER. Davis, Polk, Wardwell, Sunderland & Keindl.

Mr. SOURWINE. What would you say, sir, was the purpose of making that charge in this press release distributed here at this time?

Mr. CARTER. You would have to ask an officer of the institute.

Mr. SOURWINE. No, sir; you have said you would associate yourself with the charge. For what purpose do you associate yourself with it?

Mr. CARTER. I was quite naturally surprised that after the institute had invited J. Edgar Hoover——

Mr. SOURWINE. If you will pardon me, sir. I do not mean to interrupt you unduly, but I would like to have an answer in regard to what purpose you had in associating yourself with that charge.

Mr. CARTER. My neighbors in Lee, Mass., wanted to know what the situation was. It is the first time in my life that an agency of the American people, an official agency, had——

Mr. SOURWINE. Pardon me, sir, but you are making another speech. The charge is being made now. I am trying to get at the purpose of making the charge at that time.

Mr. CARTER. To indicate that though it was something that appeared questionable at the outset, the institute has shown, ever since the seizure of those files, its willingness to cooperate in every possible way.

Mr. SOURWINE. I am glad you brought that point out, that the institute has made no previous challenges to the legality of taking possession of files by the committee.

Mr. CARTER. I couldn't answer that question.

Mr. SOURWINE. As a matter of fact, as you have pointed out, the committee has been given the files of the institute, have they not?

Mr. CARTER. So far as I know the institute has given everything requested.

Mr. SOURWINE. I am simply wondering whether it was either your intention or purpose, or whether it was the intention or purpose of the institute in making this charge at this time in a press release to seek in any way to discredit the committee.

Mr. CARTER. It was an effort to accredit the Institute of Pacific Relations.

Mr. SOURWINE. Do you know when these files were taken, sir?

Mr. CARTER. Yes, sometime in February of this year.

Mr. SOURWINE. If you thought this was illegal, why wasn't there a contention to that effect made in February or in March rather than here in July in connection with these particular hearings?

Mr. CARTER. Because I was not an officer of the institute and that question should be addressed to a responsible officer of the institute.

Mr. SOURWINE. Do you know anything concerning the purpose of the institute with regard to this press release?

Mr. CARTER. No.

Mr. SOURWINE. Did you, when you were shown the press release, discuss with Mr. Holland or others its purpose or possible effect?

Mr. CARTER. No.

Mr. SOURWINE. I have no more questions on that point, Mr. Chairman.

Senator SMITH. May I ask some questions?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Senator SMITH. Did you protest at the time these papers were seized?

Mr. CARTER. I didn't have any chance. They were taken out of my barn and brought down to Washington under guard. Who was I?

Senator SMITH. They were in your barn, on your property, near Lynn, Mass.?

Mr. CARTER. No; Lee, Mass. Two miles from Lee, not 17 miles, as was said in one of the papers. It is a very accessible place. It is my summer home. They had been sent there because of the fact that storage in New York of dead files was very expensive. It was hoped by the officers of the institute that because I retired if those old files were there I might spend some of my time writing a history of the institute.

Senator SMITH. How long had they been there at the time of seizure?

Mr. CARTER. I can't say, over a year, 2 years. They were there when the institute invited Mr. Edgar Hoover to inspect everything in the IPR files, both in New York and at Lee. I handed over the key of the barn to the representatives of the FBI that had a dozen people there. I gave them every facility for seeing everything. I didn't stay around. I gave them the freedom of the barn.

Senator SMITH. So you had no objection to these papers being seized or examined by the committee?

Mr. CARTER. I had no objection to their being seen by the FBI. I was not consulted as to whether I was for or against their being seen by this committee.

Senator SMITH. Did you protest against their being seen by this committee at the time?

Mr. CARTER. I certainly didn't myself write to Senator McCarran or to any of the committee.

Senator SMITH. Did you protest to any of the people who took charge of any of the papers in the barn?

Mr. CARTER. I didn't see any of them.

Senator SMITH. Did you have any agents on your farm that protested or that you entrusted to protest?

Mr. CARTER. No. Our next door neighbor, a nice New England farmer's wife who kept the key for us in case the electrician or the fire department wanted to come along, she was presented with a subpena. She didn't have legal advice. She was told she had to do it. She might have asked for a court order. I didn't hear about it until the next day.

Senator SMITH. They were in her custody; she had the key?

Mr. CARTER. They were not in her custody.

Senator SMITH. Who else had a key?

Mr. CARTER. They were in my custody as owner of the property. They had been stored on my property for the reasons that I have given, as a convenience for the fire department, and so on, so they could get quick access in case of need when I was living in New York 130 miles from Lee.

The commissioner of fire and police could go to our next-door neighbor and get the key for those specified purposes. She was not employed by the Institute of Pacific Relations; she wasn't an officer of the IPR; she wasn't custodian of the property; she had a friend who had the key.

The CHAIRMAN. The files were the files of the Institute of Pacific Relations?

Mr. CARTER. They were.

The CHAIRMAN. You know them to be authentic files of the Institute of Pacific Relations?

Mr. CARTER. I know that the files came up from New York as the authentic files. Whether anyone ever slipped anything in that wasn't authentic, I have no means of saying. Anyone knows that in an old New England barn that if you haven't the key you can get up through the manure chute. You could go both ways.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you think anything was put up through the manure chute?

Mr. CARTER. I have no evidence of it.

Senator FERGUSON. Do you believe there was? Have you any reason to say that?

Mr. CARTER. I have no reason except certain New England skepticism. I am not making any charge.

Senator FERGUSON. You indicated that someone of this committee could have slipped something up through the chute. Isn't that true, and they are going to pull it out here as a part of the rabbit out of the hat of the IPR files?

Mr. CARTER. I think you can read that into what I said.

Senator FERGUSON. Would not any reasonable person read it into your remarks?

Mr. CARTER. Apparently you have, and I regard you as highly reasonable.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you want to let it stand? Is that your charge?

Mr. CARTER. I do not wish to make any charge that any member of this committee or any member of the United States Government slipped anything up through the manure chute into the IPR files.

Senator FERGUSON. Why did you say it?

Mr. CARTER. I am human.

Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, may I ask another question?

The CHAIRMAN. I think his answer is "to err is human," and he has erred.

Senator FERGUSON. You say there were certain charges made against the IRP. Have any officer or group of officers of the IRP, since those charges have been made, made an independent check to ascertain whether there was any reasonable grounds for the charges?

Mr. CARTER. I don't want to duck, but I would prefer an executive officer of the institute answer that question, because I don't know all the operations.

Senator FERGUSON. Have you caused any such research to be made to see whether or not there was anything to the charges or reasonable grounds for the charges?

Mr. CARTER. You mean charges by the Senate committee?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes. You say charges were made.

Mr. CARTER. Charges were made in the press. Those charges in the press purported to stem from the process of seizure of those files.

Senator FERGUSON. Was there any independent check made by the institute itself to ascertain if there was any truth to the charges—well, let me ask if there was an indication at least that this was a front for communism? Has anyone made a search to ascertain whether or not it was a front?

Mr. CARTER. Oh, yes.

Senator FERGUSON. Who did it?

Mr. CARTER. A group of which Robert Gordon Sproul, president of the University of California, was a member; Prof. Joseph P. Chamberlain at Columbia, recently deceased; Brooks Emeny, formerly of Cleveland, Ohio, and now president of the Foreign Policy Association; Arthur Deane, a colleague of John Foster Dulles and Allan Dulles, a partner of Southerland & Cromwell, and a few others.

Senator FERGUSON. Did they question you on that matter?

Mr. CARTER. They did.

Senator FERGUSON. Did they question Field?

Mr. CARTER. Whether all of them did, I know Mr. Arthur Deane did.

Senator FERGUSON. Did they make a written finding, a report?

Mr. CARTER. You are referring, Senator Ferguson, just to what period? After the seizure?

Senator FERGUSON. No; any time, even after the seizure.

Mr. CARTER. Before the seizure——

Senator FERGUSON. Did they make a written report?

Mr. CARTER. They made a written report. I think copies have been sent to Mr. Morris with the facsimile signatures.

Senator FERGUSON. After the seizure did they make an investigation and make a report?

Mr. CARTER. They considered the question of various applications——

The CHAIRMAN. The question is: Did they make an investigation and make a report, and not whether they considered it.

Senator FERGUSON. It will not take long to answer that.

Mr. CARTER. Not an investigation in the sense of reading 400 books and thousands of letters.

Senator FERGUSON. Do you not think it would have been proper for an organization such as this to make a search to attempt to see whether or not serious charges are true, so, if there were, they could clean their own house rather than to have a congressional committee do it?

Mr. CARTER. The charges made in a few papers appeared to the members of the committee——

The CHAIRMAN. The question is susceptible to a "yes" or "no" answer, and you can explain afterward. If you do not care to answer "yes" or "no," I think the matter ought to terminate.

Mr. CARTER. Would you repeat it once more?

Senator FERGUSON. I want to know whether or not it would be a reasonable thing when charges are made against an organization as large as this that they were acting as a front of communism, that somebody in there would not have had an examination, a detailed investigation of their own house after these papers were seized and whether or not they did and whether or not they made a report.

Mr. CARTER. Charges that were made at the time of the seizure were in large part the same charges that had been made by a New York businessman, Mr. Alfred Kohlberg. They were investigated in view of the officers of the IRP. They were not substantiated. The new charges were so similar, in some cases so identical, that I imagine the committee felt there was no use of going through it again.

Senator FERGUSON. Was this investigation made after the papers were found in the office of Amerasia? Didn't that put an entirely different complexion on this whole Communist front and this organization being a Communist front?

Mr. CARTER. It would have been an entirely different complexion if there had been a proven charge that the Amerasia passed on restricted documents to representatives of foreign governments.

Senator FERGUSON. You mean the fact that they stole the papers out of the files of the Federal Government, and used them, the mere fact they didn't pass them on to foreign governments made a difference?

Mr. CARTER. I think it did, because I think one would be espionage or something more serious.

The CHAIRMAN. One would be theft and the other would be treason; is that not true?

Mr. CARTER. You are the chairman.

Senator FERGUSON. Were they not both serious matters?

Mr. CARTER. Yes.

Senator FERGUSON. Wasn't Mr. Field connected with both?

Mr. CARTER. He was not connected with Amerasia at the time of the seizure of the Amerasia files.

Senator EASTLAND. How do you know copies of those documents were not passed on to foreign governments?

Mr. CARTER. A lot of people have been trying to prove it and it has not been proven.

Senator EASTLAND. You just testified they were not passed on. How did you know that?

Mr. CARTER. Every effort was made by very competent and virile people to prove it and it was never proven.

Senator EASTLAND. Stolen by Communists, were they not?

Mr. CARTER. They were stolen; they certainly were stolen. They were secured irregularly by people who were accused of being Communists.

The CHAIRMAN. All right, gentlemen. Go ahead, Mr. Morris.

Mr. MORRIS. Before commencing this next line of inquiry, I would like to call attention to the fact that exhibit 3–B has two corollary letters which I would also like to introduce into the record at this time. I show you them so you might see everything that is going into the record. We introduced that top letter and there were two corollary letters underneath.

Mr. CARTER. These appear to be authentic letters.

Mr. MORRIS. Thank you, Mr. Carter.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you offering them?

Mr. MORRIS. I now offer the corollary letters on exhibit 3–B into the record.

The CHAIRMAN. They will all be a part of exhibit 3–B. They are attached together.

(Documents referred to attached to exhibit 3–B were filed for the record. See p. 26.)

Mr. MORRIS. I would like to get back to a line of questioning we had just before the luncheon recess.

I refer you to a letter dated July 10, 1938, from Mr. Lattimore to Mr. Carter. Among other things it says:

> I think you are pretty cagey in turning over so much of the China section of the inquiry to Asiaticus, Hang-seng and Chi.

Also that portion of the next paragraph:

> For the U. S. S. R.—back their international policy in general, but without using their slogans, and above all without giving them or anybody else an impression of subservience.

Do you know that Asiaticus, who was referred to in that letter, wrote for Imprecorr, which is the official organ of Communist International published in Moscow?

Mr. CARTER. I didn't know it at the time. As I said this morning, I did not employ Asiaticus on the inquiry.

Mr. MORRIS. Asiaticus did write for official Communist publications, did he not?

Mr. CARTER. I am so informed.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Mandel, I wonder if you would introduce into the record a writing of Asiaticus in Imprecorr.

Mr. MANDEL. Asiaticus was a writer for the publication Imprecorr, which is an abbreviation for International Press Correspondence. He was a writer of at least one article in 1927 and seven articles in 1928. I have before me a photostat of one of his articles entitled "Dollar Imperialism in the Far East," which appears in the issue of May 31, 1928, page 534.

To get the flavor of the article I would just read one sentence:

> The United States which issued from the World War as the main creditor state, wanted us to maintain the financial control of the predatory campaign of imperialist finance in China.

The Imprecorr was a weekly official organ of the Communist International. This is shown by the following: In a Communist publication entitled "The Worker's Monthly," of December 1926 on its back cover, reference is made to the Imprecorr as follows:

> A weekly mine of information about the international Communist movement, articles by the leading Communists of the world, reports from every land, indispensable as a source of information of the world revolutionary movement.

There are other excerpts I could show that this paper was an organ of the Communist International. Just to summarize, I want to point out that in its issue beginning September 6, 1928, a series of articles is devoted to the Sixth World Congress of the Communist International.

Mr. MORRIS. How many articles did Asiaticus write for Imprecorr?

Mr. MANDEL. He wrote at least one in 1927, and seven in 1928. I can read the titles and dates if you desire.

Mr. MORRIS. I don't think it will be necessary, Mr. Chairman.

Senator FERGUSON. I suggest he put them in the record.

The CHAIRMAN. One of them is quite voluminous.

Mr. MORRIS. I would like to offer the one article referred to by Mr. Mandel in the record and have it marked as exhibit No. 5.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be inserted in the record.

(The document referred to was marked "Exhibit No. 5" and is as follows:)

EXHIBIT No. 5

[From International Press Correspondence, May 31, 1928]

POLITICS—DOLLAR IMPERIALISM IN THE FAR EAST.

(By Asiaticus)

The Japanese attack on Shantung, the military operations around Tientsin and the comprehensive preparations "for the purpose of preserving Manchuria from civil war," which means occupying it with Japanese troops, very naturally raise the question as to how the United States imperialists will reply to this Japanese campaign. As from 1905, when by its victory over imperial Russia, Japan was enabled to appropriate Korea and the southern part of Manchuria, the United States were for practically two decades the most obstinate and dangerous opponent of Japanese expansion on the Asiatic Continent.

Nevertheless, in spite of the appeals issued from Nanking, the United States imperialists are continuing to observe the most mysterious silence and are so far refraining from any steps toward hemming the desire of the Japanese for intervention and annexation. Nay, more than that. For when the Japanese had expelled the south Chinese troops from the railway zone of Tsingtao and Tsinanfu and Japan suggested to the diplomatic corps at Peking that the task of defending Tientsin against the advance of the south Chinese be entrusted to the Japanese troops, the United States minister at Peking was one of the first to agree. It was only subsequently, upon instructions received from Washington, that the minister withdrew his consent, whereupon the Japanese Government simply proceeded with the military safeguarding of Tientsin on its own account without the sanction of the United States although, according to the Washington agreement of 1922, such an action in the Peking-Tientsin zone was only permissible with the consent of all the "interested" powers.

It is obvious, moreover, that Washington entertains no illusions in the matter of the Japanese promises, according to which Japan is ready to respect the Washington agreement regarding Shantung and according to which the Japanese campaign purports no intervention in the Chinese civil war but merely the protection of the Japanese interests in the zone of military operations.

The explanation of this attitude on the part of the United States toward Japan during the last few years can, nevertheless, not be sought in even a partial surrender of United States imperialism to Japan. The Washington Conference, at which the United States Government presented its claims to the hegemony in the Far East, obliged Japan to evacuate Shantung, while conceding that the harbor of Tsingtao, the railway line from Tsingtao to Tsinanfu and the bulk of the iron and coal occurrences in these regions should remain pronouncedly under Japanese financial control. The Japanese Government, or rather Japanese capital interests, were to have their creditor claims guaranteed, in the case of the mines also their proprietory claims.

The Washington Conference, moreover, determined that the interested powers were only to act in corpore in the question of granting loans to the Chinese Government. The United States which issued from the World War as the main creditor state, wanted thus to maintain the financial control of the predatory campaign of imperialist finance in China. For this reason the outcome of the Washington Conference in China was not received as a general expression of the "traditional friendship" of the United States for China, but on the contrary as an imperialist front under the lead of the United States for the purpose of a maintenance and extension of the subjugation of China. It is merely characteristic of Chiang Kai-shek and his clique, as also their entire policy of treachery toward the national revolution, that they should now appeal against Japan to the "traditional friendship" of the United States.

So as to safeguard this policy of maintaining the financial lead of the imperialist proceedings of the powers, the United States required the dissolution of the Anglo-Japanese alliance, a development which actually came about under pressure from Washington after the conclusion of peace. The evacuation of Shantung was a further success, making Japan more liable to acceed to an American financial control of the Japanese imperialist expansion in northern China.

Since the Washington Conference, however the United States have got nearer and nearer to their object by different ways. True, the loans, which can only be granted to the Chinese Government by an international financial consortium, have not materialized, partly because the Chinese Government was obliged, under the pressure of the national-revoluntionary forces, to refuse to deal with the international financiers, and partly because in the last few years the so-called Central Government at Peking was not capable of negotiating a loan. On the other hand, United States capital has found its way to Japan and into the Japanese enterprises in China, especially in Manchuria. In Japan itself and in the United States, there has been a visible change in the matter of mutual confidence, naturally only among such circles as are interested in the policy of expansion in Asia.

Since the World War and since the earthquake of 1923, Japan has not been able to extricate itself from its financial crisis. During the World War it was in a position to develop its national industries and to strengthen its commercial positions both in China and in India. European and American competition was partially suspended for the time being in view of the necessity of war requirements. After the World War it was inevitable that Japan should experience a serious economic and financial crisis by reason of the resumption of competition on the part of the industrially strengthened victorious powers. The earthquake in 1923 made the position still worse for Japan. Nevertheless, Japan is the only power that has managed to make big capital investments in China since the Washington Conference. At Tsingtao and Shanghai, big Japanese cotton mills have been erected in Chinese territory. Large and expensive railway systems have been constructed in Manchuria, and the mining industry in Manchuria and other north Chinese districts has made gigantic strides under Japanese management. This could only be effected with United States money.

According to United States estimates, some two thousand million dollars of United States money have been invested in the Japanese enterprises in Manchuria and northern China. Only a few weeks ago the Japanese South-Manchurian Railway management negotiated with Morgan for a loan of $50 million. This loan had already found the sanction of the United States Government, and it was only upon protest being raised in China that the consent of the United States authorities was withdrawn. The United States financiers are, however, in general undoubtedly acting with the consent of their Government in their repeated grants of financial "aid" to Japan. This development explains the present attitude of the United States in regard to the Japanese intervention in China. Japanese imperialism is also defending interests of the United States. The foreign policy of the United States limits itself to watching that these interests should not be endangered by the Japanese military operations in China and that the Japanese should not gain such positions as might threaten the future of the financial control of the United States in the Far East.

United States imperialism sees its strongest rival at present not in Japan, but in Great Britain. At the last disarmament conference, which was frustrated by the impossibility of an agreement between the United States and Great Britain, Japan played the part of a mediator. In the present struggle in the Far East, the United States are mainly interested in preventing a revival of the Anglo-Japanese alliance. It is therefore wrong to imagine that the United States are anxious to preserve their attitude of "traditional friendship" for China. The United States will safeguard their own interests, i. e., see to the realization of financial control in the Far East even on the basis of an increased Japanese colonization of Manchuria.

With its present action in the north of China and Manchuria, Japan is attempting to emancipate itself somewhat from United States capital by gaining further positions. And here it is that the old conflict may possibly revive, on the basis of a struggle for the division of China and for the hegemony of the United States financial capital in such parts of China as have already been subjugated.

Mr. MORRIS. Do you have a record of Asiaticus writing any publication under Communist auspices?

Mr. MANDEL. Asiaticus under that name also wrote a book in German entitled "Von Canton Bis Shanghai," which means from Canton to Shanghai, published by Agis Verlag. On page 53 of this book Asiaticus refers in German—and this is a translation—to "the Communist Party, the sole leader of the national and social revolution."

That gives the flavor and line of the book.

The CHAIRMAN. I like that word "flavor."

Go ahead.

Mr. MORRIS. Who was Chen Han-seng?

Mr. CARTER. I think I referred to him this morning. Chen Han-seng was a Chinese scholar, a graduate of American universities, got his doctorate over here, head of a section of the Academica Sinica, order of social sciences research council, who was an authority on the farm problems of China, who came to this country, and when we made a study of China and its labor he was recommended to us as a highly competent Chinese scholar who knew more about the tussles between landlord and so on, than any other Chinese, so we employed him.

Mr. MORRIS. For how long was he employed by the IPR?

Mr. CARTER. I can't say.

Mr. MORRIS. Did you know he used a pen name?

Mr. CARTER. I didn't until you brought it up at the executive session.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Carter, I would like to show you a photostatic copy of a letter purportedly from you, dated January 15, 1940, to Dr. V. E. Motylev, Pacific Institute, 20 Razin Street, Moscow, U. S. S. R.

I will read this to you and then offer it for your examination:

DEAR MOTYLEV: I am not certain whether you are informed that the pen name of Dr. Chen Han-seng and Miss Elsie Fairfax-Cholmeley are Raymond D. Brooke and Edith Cromwell.

Sincerely yours,

EDWARD C. CARTER.

Mr. CARTER. You recall it to my attention. I had forgotten it.

Mr. MORRIS. You do recall writing that letter to Mr. Motylev?

Mr. CARTER. It is from my address. It hasn't got any signature on it, but my signature is typed in. It makes sense to me.

Mr. MORRIS. I offer this in evidence and wish it to be marked "Exhibit No. 6."

(The document referred to was marked "Exhibit No. 6" and is as follows:)

EXHIBIT No. 6

129 EAST FIFTY-SECOND STREET,
New York City, January 15, 1940.

Dr. V. E. MOTYLEV,
Pacific Institute, 20 Razin Street,
Moscow, U. S S. R.

DEAR MOTYLEV: I am not certain whether you are informed that the pen name of Dr. Chen Han-seng and Miss Elsie Fairfax-Cholmeley are Raymond D. Brooke and Edith Cromwell.

Sincerely yours,

EDWARD C. CARTER.

Mr. CARTER. A great many members of the British Foreign Office wrote for IPR publications under pen names because in their position they couldn't write under their own signatures.

Mr. MORRIS. Why did these two people, Chen Han-seng and Elsie Fairfax-Cholmeley, use pen names?

Mr. CARTER. I can't say. My only guess would be that some writers write so prolifically in order to get publishers to take their stuff they sign different names, appearing to have different individualities.

Mr. MORRIS. Would you identify Miss Fairfax-Cholmeley for us, please?

Mr. CARTER. She comes from an English aristocratic Yorkshire family. She is a cousin of Sir John Chancellor, or rather a niece of Sir John, who is British colonial governor in the West Indies. Her cousin is Christopher Chancellor, the present head of Reuters, known to many in this room, and a relative of hers, Mrs. Yates Thompson, who lived in Portland Square in London and owned Apollinaris which is a water that prosperous people drink in certain parts of the world. She was working for someone who joined my staff on a trip to the Far East and was told Mrs. Yates Thompson would be interested in helping finance the trip, as I didn't have money for a big staff. Mrs. Cholmeley went on the trip as my stenographer without cost either to me or to the institute.

(Subsequent to the hearing the following letter was received from Mr. E. C. Carter which was ordered inserted in the record at this point:)

NEW YORK CITY, September 6, 1951.

Mr. ROBERT MORRIS,
Senate Judiciary Committee,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. MORRIS: In my testimony some weeks ago I believe that I stated that Miss Elsie Fairfax-Cholmeley was a cousin of Christopher Chancellor, the present head of Reuters. My wife tells me that this is inaccurate. It seems that when the Chancellor children were young they went to stay for long periods in Yorkshire at the Cholmeley's home. It was because of this intimate relationship under the same roof that I made the mistake of thinking they were cousins.

I believe that the mistake is quite unimportant, but I want to correct it.

Sincerely yours,

EDWARD C. CARTER.

Mr. MORRIS. I would like to show you a photostatic copy of an article appearing in the publication Far Eastern Spotlight for June 1949.

Mr. CARTER. This was considerably after my contact.

Mr. MORRIS. I would like to call your attention to what purports to be page 16 which contains an article by Raymond D. Brooke, which you will notice is the same name as the name you told Mr. Motylev was the pen name of Dr. Chen Han-seng who was employed on your staff at the time.

Mr. CARTER. This is the review of the Columbia Press book.

Mr. MORRIS. What is the Far East Spotlight? Do you know, Mr. Carter?

Mr. CARTER. I don't see Far East Spotlight on it. This is just a photostat of part of a magazine.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Mandel, will you identify the photostat we are discussing here?

Mr. CARTER. Oh, yes. Far East Spotlight. It was down at the bottom, not the top caption.

I remember in the list of books received a lot of books by eminent people—Macmahon Ball, of Australia; Margaret Bourke-White; Pearl Buck—I am trying to recall what this Far Eastern Spotlight is. It seems whatever its political connection, which I can't establish from this, it was putting the spotlight on fairly important folks, which were by eminently democratic and capitalistic writers.

Mr. MORRIS. Don't you know that the Far East Spotlight is the official publication for the Committee for a Democratic Far Eastern Policy?

Mr. CARTER. I didn't know that.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Carter, aren't you an expert in the field of the Far East?

Mr. CARTER. I have done my role. My role has been more to organize and secure experts than to pose as an expert myself. My position has been more managerial than highly trained research person.

Mr. MORRIS. Was it not part of your function to be able to distinguish Communist from non-Communist, particularly——

Mr. CARTER. No; it was to distinguish scholars from nonscholars.

Mr. MORRIS. It did not make any difference to you whether they were Communist or not?

Mr. CARTER. If a Communist, especially in the period before the war, after we recognized the Soviet Union and during the period when we were allies of the Soviet Union, if I knew a Russian Communist who knew more about Kamchatka than any one else, I would try to get him to write. If he knew more about the Arctic Sea route or about fish——

Mr. MORRIS. Would you employ him on your staff and have him do your secretarial work?

Mr. CARTER. I certainly in the period that——

Mr. MORRIS. We are now talking about Chen Han-seng, who was working on the staff of IPR.

Mr. CARTER. I would certainly employ a Soviet Russian scholar whom I knew to be highly competent in the period when the Russians were allies and in the longer period when we were trying to extract all we could from the Soviet Union for the benefit of all the member countries.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Carter, I would like to call your attention——

Mr. CARTER. I tried to get a Russian Communist on my staff several times and never succeeded.

Mr. MORRIS. We are talking about a particular man, Chen Han-seng.

Mr. CARTER. The answer is I have already said he was employed by the institute.

Mr. MORRIS. You made a point and I am developing it. You said at the time when United States was allied to the Soviet Union you would have been glad to do it. We are now talking about Chen Henseng, who you advised Mr. Motylev used the pen name of Raymond D. Brooke. I have shown you an article under the name of Raymond D. Brooke, under the Committee for a Democratic Far Eastern Policy, which is an organization on the Attorney General's list, a subversive organization. At the time we discussed this letter and Mr. Chen, it was January 15, 1940. That was during the time of the Hitler-Stalin pact. That was the time when the United States was in no sense allied with the Soviet Union.

I would wonder if that would alter your comment in any way?

Mr. CARTER. A great many people knew that the Hitler-Stalin thing was only a matter of a few months, that it was up. We still had diplomatic representation in Moscow. Moscow had diplomatic relations here.

Mr. MORRIS. In other words, it is your testimony you would have turned anything over to a Soviet citizen, anything of value, on the ground that the Soviet Union was allied to the United States?

Mr. CARTET. We turned over material——

The CHAIRMAN. It seems to me the question calls for a "yes" or "no." Then you may explain.

Mr. CARTER. Sure, I would pass on any publication of the IPR to a Russian scholar knowing he was a Communist, because we were giving stuff to British and American people everywhere. We were not dealing in secret information. We were dealing in what we believed to be facts. The more facts people, friend or foe, do—it was based on research on economic and social questions, more conceivably the human rights which might step forward in a few instances.

Senator FERGUSON. You believe that a Communist can be an objective scholar? You think their thinking allows them to be scholars in the true sense of the word?

Mr. CARTER. Not in what we conceive to be the true sense of the word. I think an enormous amount of their so-called scholarly stuff is puerile.

On the other hand, in certain areas a great many scientific publications of the Soviet Union stand up under the most searching criticism of the capitalistic world. A lot of them are "hooey."

Senator FERGUSON. Do you think they can be really scholars? You were looking for scholars, as I understand it. Do you really believe that a Communist can be a real scholar in the true sense of the word?

Mr. CARTER. I will just repeat what you say, "in the true sense of the word."

Senator FERGUSON. That is begging the question. In any sense of the word. I will change it.

Mr. CARTER. Oh, yes, in the Communist sense, certainly.

Senator FERGUSON. Then he is a Communist and not a scholar, that is all.

Mr. MORRIS. I would like to offer this Raymond D. Brooke article as exhibit No. 7 and I would like to show it to Mr. Carter.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be received.

FAR EAST READING—PEASANTS AND FREEDOM

(By Raymond D. Brooke)

AGRARIAN UNREST IN SOUTHEAST ASIA, by Erich H. Jacoby, Columbia University Press, New York.

Erich H. Jacoby, a Scandinavian who has none of the political biases and prejudices commonly found in this country, is to be congratulated for having successfully established in his book three very important points relating to the present problem of world peace.

Based upon his own experiences and field studies for 4 years in the Philippines, and also critically drawing from the publications of authors in the same field of southeast Asia, notably Russell Andrus, Rupert Emerson, Pierre Gourou, L. S. Furnivall, Karl Peizer and Carle C. Zimmerman, Jacoby has systematically explained the agrarian situation in no less than six countries.

He has particularly emphasized the land tenure, the crop system and the peasant indebtedness in Java and the Philippines, the two countries of the tropical archipelagoes in Asia, as well as in Siam, Burma, Indochina and Malaya, all in the subtropical mainland.

The second point is brought out in the first and last chapters, namely, the close relation between agrarian unrest and the ardent desire for national independence, the interplay between economics and politics, or to be more concrete, the peasantry as bearer of the national idea in Asia.

Mr. Jacoby says in his preface: "As far as the national movements in southeast Asia are concerned, I have tried to show that, to a considerable degree, they are movements for land and for the reasonable use of land." Yes, Mr. Jacoby has admirably succeeded in his scholary endeavor. He has shown how the European and American colonial powers first allied themselves with the trading companies, then with the native princes or chieftains, and finally with the local landlord class, in order to maintain an indirect rule over the colony or semicolony. This political cooperation with the landlord "deepens the political crisis within the colonial system as the bulk of the population begins to identify colonial rule with landlord rule." (p. 32) Rizal's great novel, The Reign of Greed (El Filibusterimo) is cited as the best example of this expression.

The author's final point is that real political independence in each of these Asiatic countries must be tested by the solution of the present miserable agrarian situation, or the economic and social emancipation of the peasantry who constitute the majority of the people. (p. 258). For the sake of world peace, Mr. Jacoby explicitly states: "Certainly the withholding of independence from those nations might involve the most dangerous political consequences. * * * No solution, short of unrestricted political sovereignty, will be adequate for peoples that have conceived the national idea in all its aspects and are ready to develop the human and economic resources of their country in a liberal and democratic way" (p. 260). This point is now being clearly demonstrated by the dramatic events in China and the struggle of the Chinese peasantry for nationalism and democracy, which cannot but encourage all the southeast countries in Asia.

Mr. MORRIS. Do you want to see that?

Mr. CARTER. I wonder if Mr. Sourwine could get me a copy of that.

Senator FERGUSON. Which is that?

Mr. CARTER. This Imprecorr, this letter that is just going in.

Mr. SOURWINE. Here is a copy for you.

Mr. MORRIS. I would like to show you a reproduction of the letterhead of the Communist Party of the United States dated March 1, 1949, addressed to all sections and counties and signed, "Comradely yours, May Miller, assistant organizing secretary; Robert Thompson, chairman."

I would like to call your attention to the last paragraph. This is on the Communist Party letterhead of New York State:

Any inquiries in relation to further activities can be received by writing to the Committee for a Democratic Far Eastern Policy at 111 West Forty-second Street, New York City.

I would like you to observe it before I introduce it into the record.

Mr. CARTER. I have never seen it. I have never received a letter from the Communist Party of the United States, and it is addressed to "Dear Comrades," and dated March 1, 1949, and is a boost for the Committee for a Democratic Far Eastern Policy which, as I understand it, was started as so many organizations were, containing liberals and leftists and rightists. I shan't use the word "liberal" in Senator Ferguson's presence because you asked me the other day what I thought a liberal was and I gave a pretty weak answer.

Senator FERGUSON. All right, as long as you recognize it was weak.

Mr. CARTER. It just ran according to form. A lot of anti-Communists were on the Committee for a Democratic Far Eastern Policy. When they found it was going to the left, they got off. As the nucleus left, it apparently satisfied the Communist Party of the State of New York, so I am not particularly interested.

Mr. MORRIS. I should like to introduce this into the record as a characterization of the Committee for a Democratic Far Eastern Policy.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be inserted in the record.

New York, N. Y., March 1, 1949.

To All Sections and Counties

DEAR COMRADES: Enclosed please find program for action on China policy, as voted upon by a united front action conference on China, held in New York on January 29, 1949.

We are sure that you will find this material not only informative, but helpful in planning actions on China in your communities.

A special outline has also been issued by the National Education Committee on Communist Policy in China. This can be secured through orders from our district education department. The outline can be used as the basis for discussion in your sections and branches.

Any inquiries in relation to further activity can be received by writing to the Committee for a Democratic Far Eastern Policy, at 111 West Forty-second Street, New York City.

Comradely yours,

MAY MILLER, Assistant Organizing Secretary.

PROGRAM FOR ACTION ON CHINA POLICY

As suggested by the Action Conference on China Policy, New York City, January 29, 1949

PROGRAM OBJECTIVES

1. Demand a congressional investigation—

A. Of the Chinese lobby in Washington—one of the largest spending foreign influences in our Capital; not registered as foreign agents.

B. Of the billions of dollars of private accumulation deposited in American banks and investments by Chinese officials and individuals.

2. Demand a new China policy—

A. An end to all forms of American intervention in China and of plans to aid any elements and remnants of the Kuomintang.

B. Preparation by our Government to recognize the government which the people of China are now establishing.

C. Planning now by our authorities for genuine and self-respecting cooperation with the people's government in China, including normal and friendly trade relations free of any political conditions.

3. Get the facts and implications of the Government's China policy to the American people.

IMMEDIATE STEPS FOR CARRYING OUT THE ACTION PROGRAM

1. Get your organization immediately to pass a resolution on China policy. (Use the enclosed January conference resolution for suggestions.) Send copies of your organization's resolution to your Senators and your Congressmen; give it publicity in your organization's publication and elsewhere; send a copy to the Committee for a Democratic Far Eastern Policy.

2. Make use of the political ammunition of facts: the American people, if they know, will act.

A. Make a drive to get readers and subscribers to Far East Spotlight, the committee's monthly magazine. This is the indispensable tool for every fighter for a new and friendly policy toward China. Previous sources of reliable information about China and the Far East now have a NAM slant; only Far East Spotlight gives you the positive and encouraging facts about the Chinese people's great and successful fight against American reaction, and keeps you up-to-date about Washington's evil plans to go on backing reaction in China and the Far East. Subscription: $2 a year; introductory offer: $1 for 8 months. Members of the CDFEP get this free.

B. Push the sale and reading of Anna Louise Strong's Tomorrow's China—paper bound, 65 cents; cloth bound $2. Organizational orders for five or more: 25 percent discount.

C. Have meetings on the China policy issue.

(a) The committee can furnish speakers:

In the New York City area: Telephone the speaker's bureau of the committee any afternoon, BRyant 9–6343.

In California, the San Francisco area: Contact Mr. William Kerner, 1841 Ellis Street, San Francisco. Los Angeles area: Contact Mrs. Jeannette Orel, 362 South Columbia Avenue, Los Angeles.

(b) Send your organization's own speakers to the briefing session on China; first session, Friday night, February 18, 7:30 sharp. Telephone the committee for registration blanks; BRyant 9–6343. No fee.

You can't fight without facts. Far East Spotlight is your basic source of information. Meetings on China will bring facts to hundreds of others.

3. See to it that the President and the Members of Congress hear from hundreds of individuals on China policy right now. Order prepared postcards from the committee, 1 cent each. Write your own messages. Make calls—in person and by telephone—on your Senators and Congressmen.

4. Have your organization make an immediate contribution to the work of the committee or plan to give a regular (monthly, quarterly, or yearly) contribution.

5. Support the Committee for a Democratic Far Eastern Policy—

A. By becoming members and by getting your friends to join. Membership includes subscription to Far East Spotlight.

B. By securing individual contributions for the committee. Your own; your friends; throw a party for the committee.

C. By doing volunteer work at the committee's office; 111 West Forty-second Street, fifth floor—any time, any day.

Every Tuesday night the staff is "at home" to friends who come to help.

The Chinese people are defeating the American reactionaries: So can we.

China policy reveals the over-all character of Washington's foreign policy—it harms the American people.

China policy is directly related to our domestic struggle for homes, for more consumption goods, for lower prices, for increased social security, for healthy international trade, for freedom from depression and militarism.

China shows up the weak spot in our reactionaries' program. Let's fight on China policy and take advantage of the blow the Chinese people have dealt the American reactionaries.

COMMITTEE FOR A DEMOCRATIC FAR EASTERN POLICY.

RESOLUTION ON CHINA POLICY

ACTION CONFERENCE ON CHINA POLICY, NEW YORK, JANUARY 29, 1949

This Action Conference on China Policy, meeting in New York City on January 29, 1949, and attended by 182 registered delegates and observers from 80 organizations and including 48 individual participants, voted to send to every Member of the Eighty-first Congress, through the Committee for a Democratic Far Eastern Policy under whose auspices the conference was held, the following resolution:

In view of the following facts:

1. That our Government since VJ-day has violated both the democratic objective of World War II and the Charter of the United Nations in giving support to the antidemocratic and dictatorial Kuomintang regime of Chiang Kai-shek;

2. That our Government since VJ-day has made available to the Kuomintang regime of Chiang Kai-shek over $6 billion worth of the resources of the American people for use in civil war against the people of China who are our historic friends and allies in the task of building a peaceful, prosperous, and democratic world;

3. That American guns, bullets, airplanes, bombs, poison gas, gasoline jelly, and flame throwers have brought suffering, death, and destruction to millions of people in China, thus threatening the alienation of the billion and a half people of Asia who are our natural allies in a democratic world;

4. That we Americans whose resources have been wasted and misused in China are still waiting for adequate and decent housing, for lower prices on consumption goods and food, for increased social security, for mutually beneficial trade relations between our two countries as a factor in preventing a depression, and for freedom from militarism and for the security which only peaceful and cooperative relations among nations can give;

5. That our Government's policy toward China is causing frictions and misunderstandings that can easily lead to conflicts and even to war;

6. That the people of China have decisively demonstrated their purposes and power to rid themselves of the callous, cruel, antidemocratic, and outworn feudal regime which for the past years has existed only with outside (American) support and have shown their power to negate all the military advice, training, and equipment given by the United States to the Kuomintang regime of Chiang Kai-shek, and are now establishing a functioning government of their own creating;

7. That there are nationally prominent American political, military, and publishing figures openly and secretly advocating and working for continued and intensified intervention in the internal affairs of China against the Chinese people;

8. That a strong Chinese lobby is at work in Washington (one of the biggest money-spending foreign influences in our Capital but not registered as a foreign agent) trying to influence our Government authorities to continue support of the antidemocratic and unpopular Kuomintang elements;

9. That the very Chinese officials and individuals who are urging more pouring out of the American people's money in China are known to have accumulated billions of dollars (wrung from the suffering people of China and stolen from the pockets of the American taxpayers) and now stowed away in American banks and investments:

Be it therefore resolved, That we go on record as demanding:

1. That there be a congressional investigation—

A. Into the activities of the Chinese lobby in this country; and

B. Into the private wealth which Chinese officials and individuals have stowed away in American banks and investments.

2. That there be an immediate end to all forms of American intervention in China including an end to any dealings with any elements or remnants of the Kuomintang regime, recognizing the right of the Chinese people to make decisions about their country free of all pressure or interference on the part of our Government.

3. That our Government prepare to recognize the government which the Chinese people are now establishing for themselves and that our authorities begin planning for genuine and self-respecting cooperation with that government, including normal and friendly trade relations free of any political conditions.

Mr. MORRIS. I think we come now to Dr. Chi and, Mr. Chairman, I think we have discussed Dr. Chi enough without going into this description of Chi again.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Morris, with the approval of the Chairman, you mentioned this afternoon this letter of Lattimore's about my being cagey, and so on. Are you going to come back to that?

Mr. MORRIS. Yes.

You mentioned Asiaticus, Chen Han-seng, and Chi. I wanted the record to show there are Communists writings for Asiaticus Han-seng and Chi. Now that I have done that, I am going to address your attention to the latter. Do you have a comment on it?

The CHAIRMAN. To what letter?

Mr. MORRIS. This is the letter of July 10, 1938, from Mr. Lattimore to Mr. Carter, in which Mr. Latimore commends Mr. Carter for thinking he was pretty cagey in turning over so much of the China section of the inquiry to Asiaticus, Chen Han-seng, and Chi.

The CHAIRMAN. What is your question, then?

Mr. MORRIS. Do you have a comment to make on that?

Mr. CARTER. Yes, just to repeat what I said this morning, that contrary to Mr. Lattimore's impression, I did not turn over the inquiry stuff to be written by Asiaticus, Han-seng, and Chi.

Second, on the next page where reference is made to "back the international policy of the U. S. S. R.," in general our policy was in 1938 to back the international policy as we knew it of the Soviet Union in Asia because they and we and the Chinese were desperately concerned with Japanese aggression which was developing from '31, '37, '38 finally on to Marco Polo Bridge at Pearl Harbor.

The CHAIRMAN. When you say "they" and "we" did you mean the institute when you say "we"?

Mr. CARTER. No; I meant the Russian Government, or the Chinese Government, the British Government, and our Government thought the Japanese were going much too far. And the principal element of Soviet far-eastern policy as we understood it vis-à-vis Japan, was to stop Japan. We felt that it was highly desirable to make it perfectly clear without propagandizing or carrying on political education to give the publics of the democracy and of the world chapter and verse on the implication of Japanese aggressions, Manchuria, China, and so forth.

Senator FERGUSON. When you used the word "we" you meant our Government?

Mr. CARTER. Yes.

Senator FERGUSON. You were backing it up?

Mr. CARTER. I was in sympathy with it as an individual.

Senator FERGUSON. Do you think that paragraph read to you was the policy of our Government where they talk to you about being pretty cagey to turn it over to these two people, that they will bring out absolutely essential radical aspects, but can be depended on to do it with the right touch? Is that the American policy?

Mr. CARTER. No.

Senator FERGUSON. How are you going to carry out the American policy.

Mr. CARTER. I was referring here——

Senator FERGUSON. I know what you are referring to, but the paragraph before that is the one I read. Were you carrying out the American policy when Lattimore wrote to you that sentence, and then do you think Lattimore was carrying out the American policy with that philosophy? The paragraph before, I mean, where in the same letter he said:

> The U. S. S. R.—back up their international policy in general, but without using their slogans and, above all, without giving them or anybody else an impression of subservience.

Wasn't that exactly what he was doing when he said you were hiring these people to do that very thing and you were cagey about it, you were smart? Doesn't that tie in with the exact sentence that you were doing it and you never objected to that expression?

Mr. CARTER. I objected in that I didn't carry out the employment of these three men.

Senator FERGUSON. Were they in your employ at that time?

Mr. CARTER. Not in the context that Lattimore said.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you ever write him a letter and say you were not cagey, you didn't know those people were carrying it out underhanded as to funds?

Mr. CARTER. I haven't a copy of my reply to this letter.

The CHAIRMAN. The question could have been answered "yes" or "no."

Senator FERGUSON. Did you?

Mr. CARTER. I don't remember.

Senator FERGUSON. That is all.

Senator SMITH. What contacts do you have with these three men? Did you employ them?

Mr. CARTER. I am glad you raised that. Chi was earlier employed for a short time on a job for the institute. Chen Han-seng was employed to write a monograph on China's agrarian problems and one or two other monographs.

Asiaticus was invited by someone on the staff—I don't remember who—to write an article from time to time.

As I said this morning, I have no memory of ever having met Asiaticus. I didn't know what his nom de plumes were. I knew there appeared articles or an article signed by Asiaticus, who clearly, as Lattimore makes out here, had a more radical view or fundamental view than few of the writers in the Far East at that time who thought the status quo in China could continue indefinitely when many of us saw that it was crumbling and a totally different situation was inevitably coming about and it was in the American and world interest to know what the forces were that on the one side were causing the crumbling of the old Chinese regime and what the forces for good or evil were that were in reaction to building up from the point of view of power.

Senator SMITH. In what capacity did you employ those three men?

Mr. CARTER. In different capacities—one on land problems, one on economics and the institute, but not I personally employed Asiaticus for contemporary comment from the point of view of a radical on the China coast as to how the Western World looks at China. One of the things that we felt was that all of the time we were looking at things from the American point of view.

Senator SMITH. I am thinking now you did employ these three men as Mr. Lattimore suggested, although not on the specific item that he mentioned here. Is that the point?

Mr. CARTER. That is quite true.

The CHAIRMAN. From the last paragraph of that letter of July 10, I take it there had been correspondence between you and Lattimore that led up to his remark in that last paragraph; is that true.

Mr. CARTER. Yes; I was in constant contact with Lattimore throughout the times he was on the staff. I hadn't known him before. I am quite frank to say that I regarded him as a good American, a great scholar, and one of the best authorities on Asia.

The CHAIRMAN. From what he stated "I think you are pretty cagey in turning over so much of the China section of the inquiry to Asiaticus, Han-seng, and Chi," he must have been advised by you that it must have been turned over?

Mr. CARTER. Not necessarily; I don't know.

The CHAIRMAN. Where did he get the information?

Mr. CARTER. You will have to ask him. I don't know. I know his information was wrong.

The CHAIRMAN. He did not get it from you?

Mr. CARTER. Well, as I send out——

The CHAIRMAN. Answer my question. He did not get that information from you? The information that is found in his statement, "I think you are pretty cagey in turning so much of the China section of the inquiry to Asiaticus, Han-seng, and Chi"?

Mr. CARTER. I just don't remember. In building up that inquiry which involved 30 or 40 scholars, we made a list of many scholars from all over the world on trade, on tariffs, on foreign ships in Chinese waters, and so on, and sent these around. We said to people: "Who do you think are the best people?"

The CHAIRMAN. This question he had been advised you turned the matter over to these three so you were not inquiring any further there, were you?

Mr. CARTER. He may have seen the list. I can't answer that. I am sorry.

The CHAIRMAN. He says, "They will bring out the absolutely radical aspects, but can be depended on to do it with the right touch."

Did you afterward advise him you had not turned the matter over to these three so he would not be misled?

Mr. CARTER. He must have known it.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you afterward advise him?

Mr. CARTER. I can't remember.

The CHAIRMAN. In the next paragraph the letter reads—

> For the general purposes of this inquiry, it seems to me that the good scoring position for the IPR differs with different countries. For China, my hunch is that it will pay to keep behind the official Chinese Communist position—far enough not to be covered by the same label—but enough ahead of the active Chinese liberals to be noticeable. For Japan, on the other hand, hang back so as not to be inconveniently ahead of the Japanese liberals who cannot keep up, whereas the Chinese liberals can. So the chief thing is to oppose the military wing of Japanese aggression in China, counting on the check there to take care of both the military and the civilian components of aggression and Japan. For the British—scare the hell out of them. Always in a polite way but usually in a way that looks as if it might turn impolite. The British liberal groups are badly flustered, and being British, the way to encourage them to pull themselves together is to fluster the Tories.
> For the U. S. S. R.—back their international policy in general, but without using their slogans and, above all, without giving them or anybody else an impression of subservience.

So he was giving you pretty general advice. Did you tell him afterward you were not following his advice?

Mr. CARTER. I would hope you would——

The CHAIRMAN. You can answer my question, yes or no. Did you tell him or did you write to him that you were not going to follow his advice?

Mr. CARTER. I cannot prove it, but I am certain we talked over these general issues——

The CHAIRMAN. Did you ask him what his meaning of radicalism was?

Mr. CARTER. Why, no. Yes; I knew what it was, which was very different from what—you know you can be a radical and not be a Red.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you tell him you were not going to follow his advice?

Mr. CARTER. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. How did you tell him, by letter?

Mr. CARTER. I don't remember the geography and dates.

Senator FERGUSON. I think now we ought to ask you this question, and you say that radical aspects were entirely different than being a Red. In the next paragraph he shows you that Red was the philosophy or the radical aspect was the philosophy of Red Communist Russia because he told you to follow it. Is that not true?

Mr. CARTER. He told me he thought I was cagey in following it. I have said I have not followed it.

Senator FERGUSON. It is very significant to me and I wish you would make an explanation of it. After the words that the chairman read:

> My hunch is that it will pay to keep behind the official Chinese Communist position—far enough not to be covered by the label—but enough ahead of the active Chinese liberals to be noticeable.

Did he not really tell you to follow—didn't Lattimore tell you to follow the Communists of China?

Mr. CARTER. If he was telling me what line to follow, he was telling someone who was not responsive to that line.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you write and tell him you did not want his advice and that you had no——

Mr. CARTER. I can't remember, but I know when I had disagreements with him I told him so, and forcefully. In a case like that on a balance between the Chinese Communists and the Kuomintang, both sides purported to be anti-Japanese and to stop the Japanese, and far more influential people than I believed that everything that would unite the Chinese Reds and the Chinese Kuomintang in stopping Japanese aggression was in the Chinese interest and American interest.

Senator FERGUSON. Don't you think that Lattimore told you in those two paragraphs that have been read that he was wanting you to follow the "Commie" line?

Mr. CARTER. It would seem to me that he was assuming that I was, and I denied it.

Senator FERGUSON. And wanted you to continue; is that right?

Mr. CARTER. He was giving me a bouquet.

The CHAIRMAN. He was approving of it?

Mr. CARTER. Yes; I would prefer to address these questions to Lattimore, because he would remember what was in it.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Carter, when he said you were cagey, he was approving of it, was he not?

Mr. CARTER. It was a bouquet.

Senator EASTLAND. Why did not that letter raise a grave question in your mind at the very least as to whether or not Lattimore was a Communist?

Mr. CARTER. My conviction was, and is, he was not and never has been, and, second, this should be remembered: In the context of 1938 where the political pattern of the world and the tensions were totally different from what they are now. We are feeling out to find out who were our allies. We didn't care very much who they were, so long as they pasted the Japs and got us ready to beat the Germans.

Senator EASTLAND. You say we followed the U. S. S. R. line without the appearance of being subservient. That statement was not noticed to you he was a Communist?

Mr. CARTER. I don't think I can add anything that will help.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Watkins.

Senator WATKINS. On the second paragraph of the letter dated July 10, 1938, it reads:

> The letter from Wellington about the "paper bombs" was illuminating. I was interested to hear about Mr. Kuo, who had spent 20 years in Japan. The Japanese have some first-class experts whose finesse in dealing with war lords and crooked politicians is extraordinary. Their weakness is that they do not know the young China that is growing up from under all the rotten debris; and what they do know they underrate.

What was he talking about when he spoke of the young China growing up? He was not speaking of the Kuomintang and Chiang Kai-shek?

Mr. CARTER. No; in 1938—along from 1931 on when things were really booming and China was getting organized and under way under the superb efforts of the generalissimo there was a wholly fresh clan among the young Chinese who felt at least we are getting unified, we are going to resist Japan. We are going to get reforms. And anyone who was in China over those years was aware right from 1931 on—the railroads were being built, airfields were being built, the currency was getting into a better position, trade was moving, and so forth. The universities were prospering; there was new blood and within the Kuomintang, and one of the reasons that the Japanese struck when they did was because they saw if this process of advance went on under Chiang it would be too late for Japan to take China.

Senator WATKINS. In 1938 the war with Japan had been on for many years.

Mr. CARTER. There was the Manchurian incident in 1931. The Japanese moved into Tientsin and Peking in the summer of 1937, but they didn't go very far south. This new life under Chiang Kai-shek and the threat of a militant Japan was causing unity, hope, progress in the use of the young intelligentsia who had never been used by the old war lords. They saw a bright future ahead.

Senator WATKINS. This does not refer to the Communist movement that was coming up in China?

Mr. CARTER. That you would have to ask Lattimore. I think it was primarily the Kuomintang.

Senator WATKINS. What was the rotten debris he had in mind? Wasn't that the Chiang Kai-shek regime he was talking about?

Mr. CARTER. I happened to be out there about that time. There was quite a little rotten debris around Chiang Kai-shek's regime. Some other governments have a little rotten debris around them, and Americans notice it more for a foreign country than we do at home.

Senator SMITH. Mr. Carter, do you say now you did or did not answer a letter Lattimore wrote dated July 10, 1938?

Mr. CARTER. I don't know whether it is in writing or orally.

Senator SMITH. Have you examined your own personal file since you were subpenaed to come here?

Mr. CARTER. I had not seen this letter—I mean, I have——

Senator SMITH. Have you examined the files?

Mr. CARTER. I have turned the pages of some, although it has been very difficult to look at them systematically because they were taken out of the barn and I have not had access to them here.

Senator SMITH. I am not asking about the papers taken out of the barn; I am asking you about correspondence now in your personal possession.

Have you examined any of that correspondence with reference to this hearing?

Mr. CARTER. Sure.

Senator SMITH. You do have some other papers in your personal possession?

Mr. CARTER. I have nothing as much as you have.

Senator SMITH. I did not ask that question. I am asking whether or not you now have in your possession, your personal possession, any correspondence or copies of correspondence that you were having with Mr. Lattimore and others about this whole activity.

Mr. CARTER. No.

Senator SMITH. You have no personal files at all then?

Mr. CARTER. I have personal files. Well, there, again, as I stated in executive session, the Senate committee not only took IPR files but took four drawers of my own personal files. I have not got those back yet.

Senator SMITH. Do you now have any personal files with any letters or copies of letters or correspondence bearing on this subject about which we are examining you?

Mr. CARTER. I have photostatic copies of a number of letters which the FBI took out of the IPR files thinking they were pertinent to the question of the IPR loyalty and the FBI, though they made this investigation a long time ago, has never seen fit to render any charges whatsoever against the IPR.

Senator SMITH. I am not asking you about that; I am asking whether now you have in your possession any correspondence, copies of letters, bearing on the subject of this inquiry?

Mr. CARTER. I repeat; I have photostat copies.

Senator SMITH. Outside of that. You have told us about the photostats. Do you have any other correspondence?

Mr. CARTER. I don't remember any.

Senator SMITH. Where do you keep your personal files? In the barn? In New York? Or where?

Mr. CARTER. Most of them are somewhere in this building, but my current stuff may be in my home, my house or barn, at Lee, or in my New York apartment.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you maintain an office?

Mr. CARTER. I do not at the present time.

Senator SMITH. Have you discussed this letter of July 10 with Mr. Lattimore recently?

Mr. CARTER. Oh, no.

Senator SMITH. You have not?

Mr. CARTER. No. Until I saw it this morning I hadn't seen it. I hadn't seen it for a long time.

Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, I think somebody ought to ask whether or not there is a copy of any letter to Lattimore in reply to this.

The CHAIRMAN. That is what Senator Smith was trying to get at.

Senator FERGUSON. I mean in this file.

Mr. Mandel, did you find any copy?

Mr. MANDEL. Yes.

Mr. SOURWINE. I would like to go back to one point, Mr. Chairman, that may be clear in the record but which remains unclear to me.

Did you testify, sir, that Mr. Chi had nothing to do with the inquiry or the so-called inquiry series?

Mr. CARTER. He was asked—Mr. Holland, who was in executive charge——

The CHAIRMAN. The question is: Did you testify he had nothing to do with it? Answer that "Yes" or "No." Then you can explain.

The question is calling on your recollection as to whether you testified.

Mr. CARTER. I don't remember.

Mr. SOURWINE. Do you recall his was one of three names mentioned in Mr. Lattimore's letter?

Mr. CARTER. I recall it from this morning's statement.

Mr. SOURWINE. And that you stated, when questioned about it, that you had not done what Mr. Lattimore had presumed you had done?

Mr. CARTER. I so testify.

Mr. SOURWINE. Did you mean by that you had not employed Mr. Chi in connection with that matter?

Mr. CARTER. It meant that the end result was that he did not produce a book in the inquiry series.

Mr. SOURWINE. That is all you meant?

Mr. CARTER. Yes.

Mr. SOURWINE. You did not mean you had not approached him?

Mr. CARTER. I didn't mean to imply one way or the other.

Mr. SOURWINE. Did you, in fact, approach him in that connection?

Mr. CARTER. I think I was undoubtedly consulted when one of my colleagues approached him for a volume which he never completed.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is: Did you approach him? That is easily answered.

Mr. CARTER. I don't remember doing so.

Mr. SOURWINE. Do you know whether he did, in fact, write anything in connection with that inquiry series?

Mr. CARTER. I think, in executive session, Mr. Holland reported that he wrote a manuscript which was not ever printed.

Mr. SOURWINE. Don't you recall in connection with this exhibit 1–A, which was put in the record earlier at today's session, we had the letter of Mr. Holland and the final paragraph of which spoke of Mr. Chi, and included this sentence:

> You may remember that Chi was attached to the IPR international secretariat in 1940 and wrote one of the inquiry reports on China's economic development, distributed only in brief form because it was incomplete.

Didn't you recall that?

Mr. CARTER. I remember that. I thought what I just said supported it.

Mr. SOURWINE. Doesn't that seem to indicate that actually Mr. Chi did write something and that it was actually distributed to the membership of the IPR?

Mr. CARTER. One hundred copies were mimeographed. It wasn't felt substantial enough to print it in larger edition.

Mr. SOURWINE. It was substantial enough that many years later, in 1950, it was recalled as a portion of his contribution to the inquiry; was it not?

(No response.)

The CHAIRMAN. What is your answer?

Mr. CARTER. I am affirming Mr. Sourwine's knowledge.

The CHAIRMAN. You meant by waving your hands you affirmed what he said?

Mr. CARTER. Yes.

Mr. SOURWINE. You don't want this committee to believe that Mr. Chi wrote whatever it was that he did write which was ultimately circulated as a voluntary matter and without having been asked to write anything, do you?

Mr. CARTER. Oh, no.

Mr. SOURWINE. He was asked by the institute or someone representing the institute to take part in that inquiry, and you are shaking your head again.

Mr. CARTER. I am affirming; I think you are right.

Mr. SOURWINE. That is all, Mr. Chairman.

Senator FERGUSON. There is one thing I would like to ask in response to Senator Eastland's question in relation to the writer of this letter.

Do you know of anyone who was not a Communist and/or following the Communist line that was advocating what these two paragraphs advocate in this letter; that is, paragraph 1 and paragraph 2? They have been read a number of times. That is the paragraph which says that you were cagey and the paragraph that contains the Russian and Chinese foreign policy. Do you know of anyone who is not a Communist and/or following the Commie line that was advocating that philosophy?

Mr. CARTER. I know a good many people who felt that insofar as the Soviet Government was opposing Japanese or German aggression that it was in the interest of the IPR to get as much as we could out of that situation.

With reference to my being cagey——

Senator FERGUSON. No; the part about following the Communists of China.

Do you know anybody that was not a Communist and/or following the line that was advocating following the Communists of China?

Mr. CARTER. The testimony that has come out in this city in the past——

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, do you know anybody?

Mr. CARTER. Sure.

Senator FERGUSON. How many?

Mr. CARTER. I think of one.

Senator FERGUSON. Who is it?

Mr. CARTER. General Marshall.

Senator FERGUSON. You think General Marshall was following that line?

Mr. CARTER. He was following the line of getting as much of the Chinese Communists, to woo them away from Moscow.

Senator FERGUSON. This was for China. It says, "For China, my hunch is that it will pay to keep behind the official Chinese Communist position."

You say that General Marshall was following that? If so, I have never heard it. It is news to me, and you are supposed to be an expert in this field.

Senator O'CONOR. At or about the time of this exchange in correspondence, to your knowledge was Mr. Lattimore in touch with representatives of the State Department?

Mr. CARTER. I would think on any scale it wholly unlikely. I don't know.

Senator O'CONOR. Was he subsequently?

Mr. CARTER. Very tenuously. He wasn't in and out of the State Department all the time.

Senator O'CONOR. Was he sometimes?

Mr. CARTER. I can't say.

Senator O'CONOR. I have a letter before me written to you by Owen Lattimore on the stationary of Pacific Affairs of June 7, 1940, which was the next month to that which has already been referred to.

Mr. CARTER. 1940?

Senator O'CONOR. Yes.

Mr. CARTER. This is July, 1938.

Senator O'CONOR. There is one of July 1940.

Senator FERGUSOON. The one with two paragraphs, the 10th of July.

Mr. CARTER. That is 1938.

Senator O'CONOR. There was another one of 1940.

We will omit that part of the question. This is 1940, in which he refers to John Carter Vincent. Had he been in touch with Mr. Vincent very frequently, do you know?

Mr. CARTER. I can't say.

Senator O'CONOR. I read this paragraph in which he is referring to the possible engagement of some one outside of the institute to do some extra work and he said:

I am pretty sure that John Carter Vincent is not back from Geneva or we should have heard. Moreover, as a member of the State Department, he would probably have to pussyfoot in commenting on political parts of the book—

Et cetera.

I ask you whether or not that would indicate he was in pretty close touch with members of the State Department?

The CHAIRMAN. Senator, that letter should be identified. Is that the Lattimore letter?

Senator O'CONOR. Yes, sir. It is a letter from Lattimore to the witness.

The CHAIRMAN. And the date is what?

Mr. CARTER. June 7, 1940. It concerns the geology of China. He wanted criticism of a book.

The CHAIRMAN. Go to the question, please.

Mr. CARTER. This was a matter of getting a review for the quarterly Pacific Affairs, of a book by Lattimore entitled "Inner Asian Frontiers of China."

The question was whether Gaus, who had been United States Ambassador in China, could review it. Lattimore says that he is pretty sure that Vincent isn't back from Geneva, or, as a member of the State Department, he would probably have pussyfooted. This was quite the usual routine in that members of the British Foreign Office or the Canadian External Affairs of the State Department really felt free to write a hard-hitting review of a book by a nonofficial.

Senator O'CONOR. But my point was whether it was indicative of the fact that Lattimore was in close touch with John Carter Vincent or other representatives of the State Department.

Mr. CARTER. You could interpret that either way. At that time, anyone working in the Far Eastern field knew that John Carter Vincent was an important man in the State Department. We would read in the newspapers about his movements. Personally, I wouldn't take it that he was close, a close day-by-day friend. He may have been, but I don't know.

Senator O'CONOR. If not day-by-day, would you say he was in very close association with him on numerous occasions?

Mr. CARTER. I can't tell you; no.

Senator O'CONOR. I asked you previously whether, to your knowledge, Owen Lattimore was identified closely with the State Department?

Mr. CARTER. And I said I didn't think so.

Senator FERGUSON. Was he connected with Lauchlin Currie?

Mr. CARTER. I testified this morning that, in connection with Lattimore's going out to Chungking, to Chiang Kai-shek, that some of the dealings on the passage and reservations were handled——

Senator FERGUSON. I am familiar with the Pearl Harbor hearings on that.

Senator O'CONOR. But is it not a fact that Mr. Lattimore had an office in the White House or in the State Department?

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Lattimore never had an office in the State Department or the White House.

Senator O'CONOR. Are you sure of that?

Senator FERGUSON. Are you sure of that?

Senator EASTLAND. Did he use Lauchlin Currie's office, which was in the Old State Department Building, while he was an Assistant to the President?

Mr. CARTER. Let me qualify that. On the State Department, I am prepared to take Lattimore's testimony on the Old State Building. I should assume that a man who is going out on the nomination of Mr. Roosevelt to be political adviser to the head of the Chinese Government, Chiang Kai-shek, would naturally spend several days in close contact with Mr. Currie, because he was going on a special relationship, nominated by Roosevelt.

Senator EASTLAND. At the suggestion of Currie, was it not? He was promoted for that job by Currie, was he not?

Mr. CARTER. I assume so; yes.

Senator O'CONOR. And in connection with that, he maintained the office in the White House or in an annex adjoining it.

Mr. CARTER. Old State.

Seator O'CONOR. Well, that put him in direct touch with both the White House and the State Department, did it not?

Mr. CARTER. Yes.

Senator FERGUSON. Could you get any nearer to the State Department than in the Old State between the White House and the State Department?

Mr. CARTER. Well, I have been accused of looking like Mr. Hull, when walking through the corridors.

The CHAIRMAN. Who was it that accused you of that? I would like to have a photograph of him.

Mr. CARTER. He was slightly tipsy.

The CHAIRMAN. He must have been.

Senator FERGUSON. But you are not going to quibble over whether or not he had it in the White House or the State Department, if he had it in the annex; would you?

Mr. CARTER. I want to state, as firmly as I can, that he must have had a desk for several days adjoining one of the offices of one of the President's executive assistants on an operation which, organizationally, on a chart of organization, was totally different from having an office in the State Department.

Senator FERGUSON. Is that your analysis of what you think or what you know? Do you know that he had an office?

Mr. CARTER. That is what I think. I never saw him in the office. I have seen Currie in his office in the Old State Building, and was informed that it was an office of an assistant, executive assistant, and that for convenience's sake it was in that building, but it was not a part of the State Department.

Senator FERGUSON. Now you are talking about Owen Lattimore's office?

Mr. CARTER. I am talking about Mr. Currie.

Senator EASTLAND. Lattimore was in that office; was he not?

The CHAIRMAN. Just a minute, Senator.

Senator FERGUSON. Was Lattimore in that office?

Mr. CARTER. I don't know.

Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Lattimore got his mail through Mr. Currie's office; did he not?

Mr. CARTER. I don't know.

Senator FERGUSON. He used the White House telephones, got telephone calls through the White House exchange, which was connected with Currie's office; did he not?

Mr. CARTER. I can't remember whether it was the State Department exchange or the White House exchange when I once or twice phoned Mr. Currie.

Senator FERGUSON. I would like to ask you this question: Did you ever attempt to send Mr. Lattimore to Moscow? Did you ever attempt to get Mr. Lattimore sent to Moscow?

Mr. CARTER. Yes.

Senator FERGUSON. When was that?

Mr. CARTER. I can't tell you. It is in the record from the executive hearing. He was in Sweden carrying on a research, and I thought it would be a good idea, since he was so near Moscow, to go to Moscow. I sent him a telegram as to whether he would be interested in going.

Senator FERGUSON. Yes; you telegraphed him the day after the Hitler-Stalin pact; did you not?

Mr. CARTER. I did. But I am not satisfied on the date when the telegram was received.

Senator FERGUSON. Why did you want him to go to Moscow the day after the Hitler-Stalin pact?

Mr. CARTER. I can't tell you, but I do not think it was in connection with the pact, but in connection with his research.

Whenever possible, whenever one of the principal officers of the IPR was in Europe, visiting our branches in London, the Hague, and Paris, I urged them, if possible, to also visit the Moscow office which then was affiliated to the International Secretariat. It was just the same as before Pearl Harbor when one of our men was in the Far East. I said, "If you go to China, you have to go to Japan and you have to go to the Philippines," because they were all members, and I was trying to play fair. We had fewer opportunities to go to Moscow, and we desired to get everything we could out of the Bolsheviks.

I learned that Lattimore was in Sweden. It is only a few hours away, and I inquired whether he could go, and hoped he could go.

Senator EASTLAND. Then it was not for him to see if he could get permission to enter one of the Chinese provinces that Russia occupied?

Mr. CARTER. For a great many years, he was a specialist on Mongolia. He knew the Mongolian language and the Chinese language perfectly. Very few Americans or British had the opportunity of going to Mongolia. He wanted to supplement his book knowledge and his knowledge of it, a history, by going into that part of Mongolia which was definitely under Russian influence.

The CHAIRMAN. What is your question, Senator Eastland? I missed it.

Senator EASTLAND. I asked him if his testimony was, by Lattimore, that Mr. Carter was sending him, wanted him to go into a Chinese province that Russia controlled.

The CHAIRMAN. I think it has been answered.

Mr. CARTER. That was my hope, sir.

Senator O'CONOR. You have previously indicated, Mr. Carter, your belief as to the Communist leanings of Lattimore and others.

Mr. CARTER. Not of Lattimore, please.

Senator O'CONOR. I said one way or the other.

Mr. CARTER. All right.

Senator O'CONOR. You expressed an opinion. I did not say what the opinion was.

What have you to say with regard to Lauchlin Currie?

Mr. CARTER. He was Canadian-born, a Harvard economist.

Senator O'CONOR. No; I do not mean his life history. I am referring to his identification or his espousal of Communist principles or his leanings to the Communist line.

Mr. CARTER. I never saw any.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

Senator O'CONOR. There was no evidence to your knowledge?

Mr. CARTER. I haven't seen it.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Morris, you may proceed.

Mr. MORRIS. I am going to read to you a list of names, which names turn up with great frequency in the files. This list has been compiled by the staff here as a condensation of many people, of the many names, who are interested in the institute.

I am going to read a name, and, for the sake of time, I will ask you, in your opinion, yes or no, in your recollection, if they were connected with the institute in any way.

Mr. CARTER. Well, do you mean if I wrote a letter to John Smith in Timbuctu?

Mr. MORRIS. No. The standard is this, Mr. Carter: They are either members of the staff, they were contributors to IPR publications, they were members of the executive board of trustees, or they performed substantial services in addition to their membership in the IPR.

Solomon Adler—yes or no?

Mr. CARTER. I can't answer.
Mr. MORRIS. James S. Allen?
Mr. CARTER. I think he wrote one article.
Mr. MORRIS. Well, I mean, on these cases, we will not go into the details, Mr. Carter. Just answer yes or no.
Asiaticus?
Mr. CARTER. We have covered him.
Mr. MORRIS. Hilda Austern?
Mr. CARTER. She was a bookkeeper; yes.
Mr. MORRIS. Joseph Fels Barnes?
Mr. CARTER. Yes.
Mr. MORRIS. Betty Barnes?
Mr. CARTER. Yes.
Mr. MORRIS. Kathleen Barnes?
Mr. CARTER. Yes.
Mr. MORRIS. Robert W. Barnett?
Mr. CARTER. Yes.
Mr. MORRIS. T. A. Bisson?
Mr. CARTER. Yes.
Mr. MORRIS. Esther Brunauer? She was one of the incorporators. When you incorporated, she was one of the three incorporators, Mr. Carter?
The CHAIRMAN. Your answer to that would be "Yes"?
Mr. CARTER. Yes, for the time.
Mr. MORRIS. Angus Cameron?
Mr. CARTER. No.
Mr. MORRIS. Evans Carlson?
Mr. CARTER. Lecturer; yes.
Mr. MORRIS. Abraham Chapman?
Mr. CARTER. Yes.
Mr. MORRIS. Han-seng Chen?
Mr. CARTER. Yes.
Mr. MORRIS. Ch'ao-ting Chi?
Mr. CARTER. Yes.
Mr. MORRIS. Elsie Cholmeley?
Mr. CARTER. Yes.
Mr. MORRIS. O. Edmund Clubb?
Mr. CARTER. Yes.
Mr. MORRIS. Frank V. Coe?
Mr. CARTER. Yes.
Mr. MORRIS. Lauchlin Currie?
Mr. CARTER. Yes.
Mr. MORRIS. John P. Davies?
Mr. CARTER. Yes.
Mr. MORRIS. Hugh Deane?
Mr. CARTER. I don't remember.
Mr. MORRIS. A member of the D. C. Council, the Washington Council.
Len De Caux?
Mr. CARTER. Might have, yes.
Mr. MORRIS. A member of the board of trustees, was she not?
Mr. CARTER. Yes.
Mr. MORRIS. Len DeCaux?
Mr. CARTER. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. Emile Despres?
Mr. CARTER. I don't remember.
Mr. MORRIS. Lawrence Duggan?
Mr. CARTER. Yes.
Mr. MORRIS. Dolly Eltenton?
Mr. CARTER. Yes.
Mr. MORRIS. Israel Epstein?
Mr. CARTER. Yes.
Mr. MORRIS. John K. Fairbank?
Mr. CARTER. Yes.
Mr. MORRIS. Frederick V. Field?
Mr. CARTER. Yes.
Mr. MORRIS. Theodore Draper?
Mr. CARTER. Dromedary Dates, was he, or Federal Reserve? Yes, I had lunch with him one day.
Mr. MORRIS. Was he connected with the IPR, Mr. Carter?
Mr. CARTER. I don't think so.
Mr MORRIS. Edith Field?
Mr. CARTER. Yes.
Mr. MORRIS. Julian Friedman?
Mr. CARTER. We had a Friedman whose name was Irving. I don't place Julian.
Mr. MORRIS. Did he attend the Ninth IPR conference as a delegate.
Mr. CARTER. May have.
Mr. MORRIS. Mark J. Gayn?
Mr. CARTER. Yes, slight.
Mr. MORRIS. Randall Gould?
Mr. CARTER. Yes.
Mr. MORRIS. Andrew Grajdanzev?
Mr. CARTER. Yes.
Mr. MORRIS. He is now known as Andrew Grad?
Mr. CARTER. Yes.
Mr. MORRIS. Michael Greenberg?
Mr. CARTER. Yes.
Mr. MORRIS. Haldore Hanson?
Mr. CARTER. Yes.
Mr. MORRIS. John Hersey?
Mr. CARTER. Yes.
Mr. MORRIS. Alger Hiss?
Mr. CARTER. He was a member of our board for a short time.
Mr. MORRIS. And an adviser, was he not?
Mr. CARTER. Consultant.
Mr. MORRIS Y. Y. Hsu?
Mr. CARTER. Yes.
Mr. MORRIS. Joy Hume?
Mr. CARTER. Yes.
Mr. MORRIS. Philip J. Jaffe?
Mr. CARTER. Contributing member.
The CHAIRMAN. Answer the question.
Mr. CARTER. Yes.
Mr. MORRIS. Anthony Jenkinson?
Mr. CARTER. Yes.
Mr. MORRIS. Sergei Kournakoff?
Mr. CARTER. Don't remember.

Mr. MORRIS. Was he a writer for your Pacific Affairs?
Mr. CARTER. Don't remember.
Mr. MORRIS. Corliss Lamont?
Mr. CARTER. Contributor, yes.
Mr. MORRIS. Olga Lang?
Mr. CARTER. Yes.
Mr. MORRIS. Eleanor Lattimore?
Mr. CARTER. Yes.
Mr. MORRIS. Owen Lattimore?
Mr. CARTER. Yes.
Mr. MORRIS. W. J. Leaning?
Mr. CARTER. Yes.
Mr. MORRIS. Duncan C. Lee?
Mr. CARTER. Yes, sir.
Mr. MORRIS. Michael Lee?
Mr. CARTER. Attended a conference; yes.
Mr. MORRIS. A member of the secretariat?
Mr. CARTER. At the conference.
Mr. MORRIS. Michael Lindsay?
Mr. CARTER. Yes.
Mr. MORRIS. Lewis Lorwin?
Mr. CARTER. Yes.
Mr. MORRIS. William Mandel?
Mr. CARTER. Yes.
Mr. MORRIS. Kate Mitchell?
Mr. CARTER. Yes.
Mr. MORRIS. Harriet Moore?
Mr. CARTER. Yes.
Mr. MORRIS. Hozumi Ozaki?
Mr. CARTER. Ex-mayor of Tokyo. Maybe, I don't know.
Mr. MORRIS. Was he not a delegate to your Yosemite Conference in 1936?
Mr. CARTER. Yes.
Mr. MORRIS. Fred Poland?
Mr. CARTER. Yes.
Mr. MORRIS. Catherine Porter?
Mr. CARTER. Yes.
Mr. MORRIS. Mildred Price?
Mr. CARTER. I don't know.
Mr. MORRIS. Ludwig Rajchman?
Mr. CARTER. I don't remember. I remember him. I don't remember his IPR connections to be known, I suppose.
Mr. MORRIS. Jefferson Franklin Ray?
Mr. CARTER. Yes.
Mr. MORRIS. Lawrence Rosinger?
Mr. CARTER. Yes.
Mr. MORRIS. Andrew Roth?
Mr. CARTER. Yes.
Mr. MORRIS. Kuikazu Saionji?
Mr. CARTER. Yes.
Mr. MORRIS. Helen Schneider?
Mr. CARTER. Don't remember.
Mr. MORRIS. Was she not a staff worker?
Mr. CARTER. I don't remember.
Mr. MORRIS. John S. Service?

Mr. CARTER. Yes.
Mr. MORRIS. Agnes Smedley?
Mr. CARTER. Yes, she was a member for 2 years.
Mr. MORRIS. Edgar Snow?
Mr. CARTER. Yes.
Mr. MORRIS. Mrs. Edgar Snow?
Mr. CARTER. I don't remember.
Mr. MORRIS. That is Nym Wales.
Mr. CARTER. I don't remember as an extensive correspondent.
Mr. MORRIS. Guenther Stein?
Mr. CARTER. Yes.
Mr. MORRIS. Marguerite Stewart?
Mr. CARTER. Yes, sir.
Mr. MORRIS. Maxwell S. Stewart?
Mr. CARTER. Yes.
Mr. MORRIS. William T. Stone?
Mr. CARTER. Yes, sir.
Mr. MORRIS. And Anna Louise Strong?
Mr. CARTER. Yes.
Mr. MORRIS. Mary Van Kleeck?
Mr. CARTER. I don't know. I know her, but I don't remember her in an IPR connection.
Mr. MORRIS. Did she not write for your publication?
Mr. CARTER. I don't remember.
Mr. MORRIS. John Carter Vincent?
Mr. CARTER. Yes.
Mr. MORRIS. Adam Von Trott?
Mr. CARTER. Yes.
Mr. MORRIS. Harry Dexter White?
Mr. CARTER. Very limited, yes.
Mr. MORRIS. Ella Winter?
Mr. CARTER. I don't remember.
Mr. MORRIS. Victor Yakhontoff?
Mr. CARTER. Yes.
Mr. MORRIS. Rose Yardumian?
Mr. CARTER. Yes, sir.
May I make one short comment?
The CHAIRMAN. Proceed.

Mr. CARTER. It is said that this represents the greater volume of the correspondence. I see a great many important omissions of people with whom I was in constant correspondence, like Ray Lyman Wilbur, Robert Gordon Sproul, Lord Hailsham.

I think there is a long list of people not mentioned with whom it was my obligation and pleasure to be in correspondence. I would hope, if I may make a suggestion, that this list would not be used as a sample of the personnel connections of the IPR, because it is at all levels—stenographers, accountants, people who wrote one article, and so on—whereas, the framework of the institute was the wise leadership of men like Sproul, and Wilbur, and Newton Baker, and Dafoe, and a very large number of people who, by long distance phone, by interview, and by extensive correspondence, I was in touch with.

You said at the beginning that you wanted me to give the whole picture.

The CHAIRMAN. That is correct. That is all right.

Mr. MORRIS. That is perfectly all right, and we understand that that is not the complete list. But we are going to be addressing ourselves to these names, and we want an affirmation or denial of whether they were connected with the institute.

Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, before you go to another subject, I asked a question about investigations within the IPR itself.

You indicated that prior to the Amerasia exposure, that there had been an investigation on the so-called Kohlberg charges.

Mr. CARTER. Yes.

Senator FERGUSON. I want to read just a line or two of testimony, not giving you the name of the party who testified to it.

Do you think there was an investigation made by IPR of the Kohlberg charges?

The answer is:

No; I would say that there was an answer prepared by a staff member of the Kohlberg charges which were accepted by the executive committee.

Now, there was no investigation, but only a member of the staff prepared an answer. Is that what happened?

Mr. CARTER. It is part of what happened. The Kohlberg charges came in, they were analyzed by a large number of members of the staff, in consultation with members of the board. They were then given to the members of the board with the complete text of the Kohlberg charges, the complete text of the proposed staff analysis that was made by the board's committee.

The board's committee took a great deal of time to read both documents and to study afresh a great many of the publications. The board finally accepted that as a voice of the board.

Senator FERGUSON. Then you would say that the witness that testified that there was not—

I would say that there was an answer prepared by the staff members of the Kohlberg charges which was accepted by the executive committee—is not a correct statement?

Mr. CARTER. I think it is a little thin.

Senator FERGUSON. You think it is a little thin. That is all I have.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Carter, you have been on the stand now from this morning until nearly 1 o'clock, and now it is 20 minutes after 4. We are going to ask you to be here tomorrow.

You have been a ready witness, and the committee is grateful for the information you have given us.

Tomorrow, we will have before this committee Mr. Field. We have been advised by the district attorney of New York that Mr. Field will be here tomorrow at 10:30.

The district attorney of New York has put off the hearings that he was to conduct so that Mr. Field might be here.

We will ask you, also, please, to be present at 2:30 tomorrow afternoon.

Mr. CARTER. Will both of those be public or executive hearings?

The CHAIRMAN. They will both be public.

Mr. CROSSMAN. May I ask you if you will want Mr. Carter to testify further? I gathered you did, but I was not quite sure.

The CHAIRMAN. I told him we wanted him for a few questions at 2:30. Just how long it will take, I am not certain.

The committee will stand at recess until tomorrow at 10:30.

(Whereupon, at 4:24 p. m., Wednesday, July 25, 1951, the hearing was recessed until 10:30 a. m., Thursday, July 26, 1951.)

INSTITUTE OF PACIFIC RELATIONS

THURSDAY, JULY 26, 1951

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE TO INVESTIGATE THE ADMINISTRATION OF THE INTERNAL SECURITY ACT AND OTHER INTERNAL SECURITY LAWS, OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
Washington, D. C.

The subcommittee met at 10:30 a. m., pursuant to recess, in room 424 Senate Office Building, Hon. Pat McCarran (chairman) presiding.

Present: Senators McCarran, Eastland, O'Conor, Smith, Wiley, Ferguson, and Watkins.

Also present: Senator McCarthy.

J. G. Sourwine, committee counsel; Robert Morris, subcommittee counsel; Benjamin Mandel, director of research.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will come to order.

Ladies and gentlemen and members of the press, the room is a bit congested. We are sorry we have not more accommodations. Will you kindly aid us in keeping as quiet as you can because even a low voice when audible seems to be distracting. So, if possible, please refrain from speaking at least above a whisper and try to keep your whispers down so that we may proceed.

We will swear the witness. You do solemnly swear the testimony you are about to give before the Internal Security Subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary of the United States Senate will be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, so help you God?

Mr. FIELD. I do.

TESTIMONY OF FREDERICK V. FIELD, NEW YORK CITY; ACCOMPANIED BY VICTOR RABINOWITZ, ATTORNEY AT LAW, NEW YORK CITY

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Field, when you appeared before his committee in executive session you refused to answer many questions on the ground that to do so might incriminate you. In no case, when you made such a claim, did the committee require or compel you to answer the question.

I think you should know that the committee has carefully examined and studied the record of the executive hearings with a view to determining, so far as possible on the basis of information available to the committee, what your rights may have been with regard to the questions which you refused to answer.

Today, the committee does not intend to adopt a harsh attitude toward you. Where you deem it necessary to claim your privilege against self-incrimination, in good faith, the committee will not seek to compel you to answer unless, first, the committee believes your privilege does not apply to that particular question and, second, the information sought to be elicited through your answer is of particular importance to the committee.

It may be that in no instance, where you claim your privilege, will the committee demand that you answer. But I wish to caution you that if and when such a demand is made, it will be a demand backed by the committee's studied judgment that the committee does have a right to compel your answer. You should have that information so that you may guide yourself accordingly.

I think it might be well if the record at this point contained a brief discussion of the privilege of a witness to decline to give evidence incriminating himself. Let me say, Mr. Field, that in this connection I am not attempting specifically to give you legal advice. I am stating certain tenets of the law as I understand it, for the guidance of any witness before this committee who may benefit thereby.

The privilege of a witness to decline to give evidence incriminating himself is not confined to the right to refuse to answer a direct question as to the commission of a crime, but includes the right to refuse to testify to a fact which would be a necessary link in a chain of evidence to prove the commission of a crime by the witness, or would be the source from which evidence of his commission of a crime might be obtained.

Whether an answer to a question would tend to incriminate the witness depends on whether, if he gave a true and responsive answer to the question asked, that answer would form part of a chain of evidence which might tend to convict him.

In the case of a series of questions, the true and responsive answers to all of which would establish the criminality of the witness, an examiner may not pick out a particular question from the series and say that if that particular question shall be asked, the answer will not incriminate the witness. If the question is one link in a chain having a tendency to incriminate the witness, he is not compelled to answer.

Where, from the evidence and the nature of the question, it can be definitely determined that the question, if answered in a particular way, will form a link in the chain of evidence to establish the commission of a crime by the witness, then we may not inquire whether the witness claimed his privilege in good faith or otherwise. It is only where the incriminating effect of the question is doubtful that the witnesses' motive may be considered; for in such case his bad faith would tend to show that his answer would not subject him to any danger.

But the good faith of a refusal to answer questions because the witness fears the answers would tend to incriminate him may properly be inquired into.

Where it is not manifest, so as to preclude all reasonable doubt, that the answer called for cannot incriminate the witness, the privilege must be protected. But the privilege against self-incrimination is confined to real danger, and does not extend to remote possibilities out of the ordinary course of law. Furthermore, in determining whether the answer to a particular question will incriminate the witness, previous testimony by the witness may properly be taken into consideration. A matter which the witness has already admitted, though it might, being admitted for the first time, have a tendency to incriminate the witness, is not privileged when the witness is asked to make the disclosure for a second or subsequent time.

At witness before a congressional committee always may exercise his privilege of refusing to answer questions, and submit to a court the correctness of his judgment in doing so; but in the event that he is mistaken as to the law it is no defense, for he is bound rightly to construe the statute.

I think that is all I have to say on the subject, excepting one other matter, if I may.

Mr. Field, I think those of us who come from the West are especially appreciative of the wonderful name that has been made in the history of America by your family. It is a regrettable thing to me, and to many others, that for some reason or other, best known to yourself, you seem to have perhaps for the time being forgotten the great achievements that were worked out by your ancestors and forebears. Your country is today at the cross-roads of its existence. Never was it challenged by a more dangerous enemy, both at home and abroad. It behooves every American, every man who has the red blood of America in his veins to come to the aid of his country now with everything he knows that will protect this country from its most dangerous enemies. The history of your fine family, the history of your forbears indicates to me, and I hope I will be pardoned for my expression, that we must have a certain high degree of sorrow at the attitude which seems to be assumed by you which I think, hope, and pray is only a momentary attitude and that you may aid the Congress of the United States and the courts and the people of this country in their most trying hour by giving to us frankly and fairly everything that you know. I hope that may be your attitude and I assure you this committee is your friend. They want to get the information. They want to put you with your family in the fine history of your forebears indicates to me, and I hope I will be pardoned which it is intended.

You may proceed, Mr. Morris.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you give your name and address to the reporter.

Mr. FIELD. Frederick V. Field, 16 West Twelfth Street, New York City.

Mr. MORRIS. What is your present occupation?

Mr. FIELD. My present occupation is a prisoner.

Mr. MORRIS. You say you are a prisoner?

Mr. FIELD. That is correct.

Mr. MORRIS. Before you became a prisoner what was your occupation?

Mr. FIELD. I identified myself as a writer.

Mr. MORRIS. Who is your present wife?

Mr. FIELD. My present wife is Anita Boyer Field.

Mr. MORRIS. Who was her former husband?

Mr. FIELD. Her former husband is Raymond Boyer.

Mr. MORRIS. What is he doing now?

Mr. FIELD. I don't know what he is doing now.

Mr. MORRIS. Did he recently serve a prison sentence?

Mr. FIELD. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. On what charges?

Mr. FIELD. I don't remember the technical charges. It had something to do with information regarding explosives as I remember. I am not familiar with it.

Mr. MORRIS. Did it have to do with espionage? Was he a Canadian involved in espionage trials?

Mr. FIELD. I don't really know. I don't know about that case.

The CHAIRMAN. State what you do know.

Mr. MORRIS. To what extent can you tell us about the sentence which Mr. Boyer served in Canada?

Mr. FIELD. I can tell you almost nothing whatsoever.

Mr. MORRIS. You know it involved espionage?

Mr. FIELD. I believe so. The reason I hesitate is only the legal technicalities in identifying the charges.

The CHAIRMAN. That is your understanding?

Mr. FIELD. Yes; I am frankly not familiar.

Mr. MORRIS. What was the name of your first wife?

Mr. FIELDS. Elizabeth Brown.

Mr. MORRIS. Was she active in IPR?

Mr. FIELD. She was associated with the staff of an organization that was housed in the same group of rooms—offices of the IPR.

Mr. MORRIS. What organization was that?

Mr. FIELD. An organization called the Inquiry. I am just trying to remember whether she also actually became a staff member of the IPR. There was a rather close relationship at that time.

I think it would be correct to say "Yes"; she has been associated with at least one of the conferences—one of those international conferences where she probably served as a staff secretary, or something of that sort.

Mr. MORRIS. Who is she presently married to?

Mr. FIELD. Joseph Barnes.

Mr. MORRIS. Was he active in IPR?

Mr. FIELD. Yes; he was.

The CHAIRMAN. When you used the letters "IPR" in the first instance I respectfully suggest you spell it out as to what it is.

Mr. MORRIS. In reference to IPR, you meant the Institute of Pacific Relations?

Mr. FIELD. Yes. May I also say, in connection with Mr. Barnes, I would have been referring to the American Council of the Institute of Pacific Relations.

Mr. MORRIS. What is the name of your second wife?

Mr. FIELD. Edith Chamberlin.

Mr. MORRIS. Was she active in IPR?

Mr. FIELD. Only in this sense: She went to one of the IPR conferences—one of the international conferences as secretary to her uncle, Prof. Joseph Chamberlin, of Columbia. He recently died.

Perhaps at another conference she was a staff secretary. She was not a staff member—only served at a couple of conferences.

Mr. MORRIS. Are you presently serving a jail sentence?

Mr. FIELD. Yes; I am.

Mr. MORRIS. For what?

Mr. FIELD. Well, it is for the matter contained in the last sentence of Senator McCarran's memorandum that apparently according to the courts at present I have misinterpreted the use of the privilege; that is, against self-incrimination.

Mr. MORRIS. Have you recently posted bond for Communists?

Mr. FIELD. I think under the circumstances I must ask leave to employ the privilege of refusing to answer that question. I do so on the grounds that the answer might be self-incriminating under the circumstances. I hope the privilege is available to me in this instance under the fifth amendment.

Mr. MORRIS. Have you recently posted bail for anyone?

Mr. FIELD. In my opinion, Mr. Morris, I speak with hesitancy here on this point because of what the chairman has said and because of my own recent experience; but in my opinion that is a question which tends or does lead me into an area, into perhaps a chain of questions which I do believe might be self-incriminating. It is a question which in itself is awfully hard to decide. I feel that because of my present circumstances I must also decline to answer that on the grounds that the answer might be self-incriminating.

Mr. Chairman, may I, on some of these questions that may be puzzling to me, consult my counsel?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; you may consult with him in confidence, not aloud, if you please.

I stated yesterday, Mr. Counsel, that the propounding of questions would not be permitted. We will not deprive the witness of the right of his counsel by his side so long as it does not interfere with the proceeding.

Mr. RABINOWITZ. Thank you.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Field, will you relate to the committee your associations with the Institute of Pacific Relations?

Mr. FIELD. Yes; I will.

Do you wish me to repeat what I gave in executive session?

Mr. MORRIS. That is right; it was very well done in that session.

Mr. FIELD. You wish me to give a full and lengthy answer?

Mr. MORRIS. That is right, a full expression of your association with the Institute of Pacific Relations.

Mr. FIELD. The association began in 1928 when I was invited by Mr. Carter to become secretary to a committee in this country which was raising money for a well-known Chinese educator, Dr. Y. C. James Yen, who headed up a movement in China against illiteracy.

I accepted the job and spent perhaps 8 or 10 months, something like that, traveling throughout this country with Dr. Yen raising funds for this purpose.

Mr. MORRIS. This was in 1928?

Mr. FIELD. This would be 1928, probably lapping over into '29. I forget how the months fell at the time. It surely fell over into '29.

This was not directly an Institute of Pacific Relations project, but Dr. Yen was given the hospitality of the institute offices in New York. Mr. Carter was a member of chairmen of the American committee aiding him. There was an obvious link between work and personnel in that effort and the institute. I think almost perhaps imperceptibly at the end of that period of work on behalf of Dr. Yen, I found myself a staff member of the American Council of the Institute of Pacific Relations.

I became—I think my first title was assistant secretary, but as I explained to the committee in executive session, there were then only two people in the office. So the assistant secretary was the bottom man. Mr. Carter was then secretary.

I retained this association as a staff member of the American Council with one or two interludes I will refer to, until the fall of 1940.

Mr. MORRIS. When did you have the title of research secretary?

Mr. FIELD. That is one of the interludes I wish to point to.

Mr. MORRIS. When did you become national secretary?

Mr. FIELD. I am not sure about the exact dates, but in the early thirties there was a period of 8 or 10 months—I think it was under a year—when Mr. Holland, who had been research secretary of the international organization, the international part of the institute, was on leave of absence. I forget for what purpose, whether it was to take a degree, to write a book, or something of the sort. I pinch-hit for him for that period. I believe it was at that time that I established my quarters in Honolulu and served——

Mr. MORRIS. That is for a period of about 8 months?

Mr. FIELD. Eight or ten months, something like that.

Mr. MORRIS. In approximately what year was that?

Mr. FIELD. Approximately '32 or '33. I am not positive about that. It was the early thirties. I then reverted back to the staff of the American Council of the IPR. I became secretary of the American branch. I haven't got any records with me.

Mr. MORRIS. Does the date 1934 seem right to you?

Mr. FIELD. I think that is early. I would say probably '35. I think you probably have the records. I would agree with anything that is available to you on that subject.

Mr. MORRIS. You were national secretary for how long?

Mr. FIELD. About 5 or 6 years.

Mr. MORRIS. You terminated approximately in 1940?

Mr. FIELD. In the fall of 1940 I resigned as secretary.

Mr. MORRIS. Did you remain on as a member of executive board of trustees?

Mr. FIELD. I remained both as a trustee and as a member of the executive committee board. Yes; that is correct.

Mr. MORRIS. How long did you remain as a member of the executive committee of the board?

Mr. FIELD. The record will show that. I certainly would agree with it. I think until the summer of 1947.

Mr. MORRIS. Would it be 1948?

Mr. FIELD. I think it is very probably correct.

Mr. MORRIS. You still are a member of the Institute of Public Relations?

Mr. FIELD. I am simply a dues-paying member at $10 or $15 a year, whatever it is.

Mr. MORRIS. You have been that since 1948?

Mr. FIELD. I have continued that. May I say in that connection that as I am sure you are aware, the privilege of membership is to obtain certain publications. It is almost synonymous with being a subscriber to the publication the Far Eastern Survey and a few other things.

Mr. MORRIS. We had a witness yesterday who testified that you contributed approximately $60,000 to the institute during the years that you were associated with it. Does that seem like a reasonable figure?

Mr. FIELD. As I said to you in executive session, Mr. Morris, I am perfectly willing if it were possible for me to check any records and verify anything.

Mr. MORRIS. You said you were going to do that.

Mr. FIELD. I have not been able to since I saw you. I have not been able to check them. I don't know who testified.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Carter testified yesterday that the total of your contribution to the institute through the years that you were associated with it approximated $60,000.

Mr. FIELD. I am perfectly willing to accept that. I really have very little idea myself. That would be over a period of what, perhaps 15 years?

Mr. MORRIS. That is approximately correct.

Mr. Field, he also testified that for a certain period of time you made up the deficit of the institute. Does that square with your recollection?

Mr. FIELD. You asked me that before. I am still a little unclear what you mean. You mean on December 31, plugging the gap?

Mr. MORRIS. That is right. I am using the language that appeared in the files of the institute; namely, that the records did seem to show you made up the deficits for a period of time. Mr. Carter conceded that that was the case.

Mr. FIELD. I have no argument about that. Of course I made contributions. It is just the exact meaning of making up the deficit that puzzles me a bit.

Mr. MORRIS. You cannot recall, Mr. Field, that the problem was ever put to you: "We are here with a deficit, will you make up this deficit?"

Mr. FIELD. On the contrary, that is the kind of situation I can't recall vividly because it is exactly what you say to anyone. That is, anyone you go to to raise money for an organization. I went out myself to raise money for the institute and I would put it that way. We have got a deficit.

Senator EASTLAND. Was it put to you that way.

Mr. FIELD. Certainly it was. I was one of the contributors. I assume it was.

Senator EASTLAND. You made up the deficit?

Mr. FIELD. I certainly made contributions toward the deficit each year.

Mr. MORRIS. You also wrote for IPR publications?

Mr. FIELD. Yes, I did.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you describe in general what your writings in the Institute of Pacific Relations publications have been?

Mr. FIELD. I wrote two books which were published under the auspices of the institute. The first was published by the University of Chicago Press I think in 1931. It was called American Participation in the China Consortiums. You don't want me to describe it?

Mr. MORRIS. No.

Mr. FIELD. The second book was one which I edited called Economic Handbook of the Pacific Area, fairly large parts of which I wrote myself. That was published about 1934 by Doubleday Doran.

I wrote a number of articles for the Far Eastern Survey, which is the American council's fortnightly publication and for its predecessor, which was a more informal kind of publication.

First we put it out in mimeographed form. I think it was called IPR Memorandum. I am not certain about that. The articles in the survey, as I recall, all appear under authors' names. I believe those in the memorandum were put forth as a staff job.

I wrote certain articles for Pacific Affairs and——

Mr. MORRIS. Will you describe approximately how many you wrote?

Mr. FIELD. I was also going to add I did several book reviews for them.

I just from memory couldn't. I am sure you agree with any record you have of that. Not very many, I believe.

Mr. MORRIS. Did you write pamphlets issued by the Institute of Pacific Relations?

Mr. FIELD. I remember Mr. Barnes and I coauthored——

Mr. MORRIS. That is Joseph Barnes?

Mr. FIELD. That is correct. Coauthored two, I think, that I can recall. There may be more.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Field, could you tell us whether you registered as a foreign agent with the Department of Justice for the Chinese Postal Remittances and Savings Bank of Hong Kong on September 19, 1950?

Mr. FIELD. I did so register. The date I will accept from you.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Field, did you register as an agent for the directorate general of the Postal Remittances and Savings Bank of Peking on September 19, 1950, again with the Department of Justice?

Mr. FIELD. Yes. It is my impression they are both one in principle.

Mr. MORRIS. Did you register as a foreign agent for the Bank of China in Peking on September 19, 1950?

Mr. FIELD. Again as to the date I am not certain, but as to the fact, yes.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Field, did you register as a foreign agent for the China National Aviation Corp. of Peking with the Department of Justice on September 19, 1950?

Mr. FIELD. That is correct.

Mr. MORRIS. Is it not true that these four foreign principals were controlled by the Chinese Communist Government?

Mr. FIELD. No; I would not accept that. As a matter of fact, the issue that was fought, and successively fought in court in the first case related to the Bank of China established that there was sufficient independence and autonomy of the Bank of China as apart from the Chinese Government to warrant the funds being frozen. There is an appeal being argued, I believe, at this very moment on this case.

Mr. MORRIS. I am about to show you exhibit C of your registration statement. I call your attention to paragraph (d) which reads:

My information is to the effect—

This is now about the Bank of China—

that two-thirds of the stock is owned by the Peoples Republic of China; that the owner of these shares exercises the usual prerogatives consistent with such ownership.

I ask you if that is not your statement.

The CHAIRMAN. That instrument you have just shown the witness is signed by the witness?

Mr. MORRIS. It is exhibit C of his registration statement, Senator, which is signed.

At this point I will introduce the whole registration statement which bears the signature of Frederick V. Field, and ask him to authenticate his signature.

Mr. FIELD. You want me to reply to that?

Mr. MORRIS. Yes.

Mr. FIELD. That is perfectly true, I am afraid I can't adequately describe to you the argument in the court which resulted favorably——

Mr. MORRIS. At the time you registered, it was your understanding——

Mr. FIELD. It is more complicated than that, because a registration filed does not reveal more information than is called for.

As I recall, one of the important things in the trial itself was the fact that the majority of the board of directors of the Bank of China were not Government appointees. In any case, whatever the evidence was, the judges in San Francisco decided in favor of the autonomy.

Mr. MORRIS. We don't care to go into the particular legal controversy involved, but it was your understanding at the time that you registered, according to your own words—I am quoting them again:

My information is to the effect that two-thirds of the stock is owned by the Peoples Republic of China.

That is your own statement.

Mr. FIELD. I am not denying the statement.

The CHAIRMAN. That is an answer.

What about these other documents?

Mr. MORRIS. I have not finished them.

The CHAIRMAN. You are going to identify them.

Mr. MORRIS. I offer the photostat of the statement, Mr. Field——

The CHAIRMAN. As to your signature.

Mr. FIELD. That is my signature.

Mr. MORRIS. You also acknowledge these exhibit C's are part of that registration statement?

Mr. FIELD. I think they are. I am willing to accept that.

Mr. MORRIS. I am reading from exhibit C of the registration statement on the China National Aviation Corp., again subdivision (d):

According to my information the Peoples Republic of China—

And that is the name of the Communist Chinese Government; is it not?

Mr. FIELD. The present Chinese Government.

The CHAIRMAN. Chinese Communist government.

Mr. FIELD. Chinese Communist government.

Mr. MORRIS. That is not recognized by the United States or the United Nations as the Government of China.

The CHAIRMAN. Listen to the questions because there is a little confusion there, I think. Please clear that up.

Counsel asked you, "And that is the present Chinese Communist government?"

You said "The present government."

Mr. FIELD. I wanted to make a distinction there, Mr. Chairman, but I don't want to labor the point.

The CHAIRMAN. It is the Communist Government of China at the present time; is that correct?

Mr. FIELD. My own opinion is that it is a coalition government in which Communists participate.

Mr. MORRIS (reading):

According to my information the Peoples Republic of China owns 80 percent of the stock of the corporation and exercises the usual prerogatives consistent with such ownership.

Mr. FIELD. That is true.

Mr. MORRIS. Therefore, it was your understanding at the time you registered.

Mr. FIELD. You are now referring to the Chinese National Aviation Corp.?

Mr. MORRIS. Yes.

Mr. FIELD. I see.

Mr. MORRIS. So it was your understanding they were controlled by the Chinese Communists?

Mr. FIELD. Certainly. Again may I just make that amendment in the same way I did before about the Chinese Peoples Government.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you relate to us the circumstances leading up to your registration as an agent for these four foreign principals?

Mr. FIELD. I think I covered this before, did I not?

Mr. MORRIS. You did. I would like you to bring in that portion which shows your association with Dr. Chi.

Mr. FIELD. I will bring that in immediately if you wish. Dr. Chi is the—I am not certain of his title, the document would show it—assistant general manager, is he not, of the Bank of China?

Mr. MORRIS. On your exhibit C on the Bank of China you referred to Chao-ting Chi as the assistant general manager of the Bank of China?

Mr. FIELD. He had formerly been a student in New York City. He took his doctorate degree at Columbia in the late thirties. I am not going to say this with absolute certainty as to dates and the position, but he was associated with the international organization of the IPR for some period of time as a research person.

Mr. MORRIS. You met him as such with the institute?

Mr. FIELD. That is correct. I met him in connection with the preparation of his doctorate thesis through whoever it was he was working with at Columbia.

Mr. MORRIS. Do you know he was working on the Inquiry series?

Mr. FIELD. I believe he wrote one of the books in connection with it.

Mr. MORRIS. It is your testimony that you recall he wrote one of the books in the inquiry series?

Mr. FIELD. It is my recollection that he did, but I am not going to—I may be incorrect here.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you explain the relationship?

Mr. FIELD. Yes. You asked me to bring out that relationship and I have.

Presumably it was through this connection I had with Dr. Chi and I had lost track of him for a number of years and was surprised when he emerged in this particular position.

Mr. MORRIS. How did you first hear from Dr. Chi?

Mr. FIELD. By cable.

Mr. MORRIS. He cabled you?

Mr. FIELD. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. What did he ask you to do?

Mr. FIELD. He asked me—I think the cable is probably—I am not sure whether it was submitted here or not, but the gist of it was he asked me if I would accept being attorney in fact for the Bank of China in this country in specific connection with a suit which had been brought by Wells-Fargo Bank in California against another bank with respect to determining correct ownership of funds which would then be claimed by another group of Bank of China representatives, H. H. Kung and others. The bank itself brought the dispute to court, the Wells-Fargo Bank where these funds were deposited, in order to have the court determine the true owner.

Mr. MORRIS. What was the date of that?

Mr. FIELD. It was some time before the registration. It must have been several months before because I think the case was first argued in the spring of 1950, something like that.

Mr. MORRIS. Would you know anything about the nature of the China National Aviation Corp.?

Mr. FIELD. This followed—I forget the date—after the Bank of China.

Mr. MORRIS. The registration was dated September 19.

Mr. FIELD. All the registrations had the same date. There was a prolonged period of time with respect to the question of registration.

Mr. MORRIS. Before you received that cable from Dr. Chi, had anyone broached the subject with you, Mr. Field?

Mr. FIELD. No one had broached it, not that I remember.

Mr. MORRIS. Your first knowledge came at the time you received this cable from Dr. Chi?

Mr. FIELD. I believe so. I want to answer this accurately. I don't want to—What I am trying to recall is the possibility as to whether I had sent some communication or not. I cannot recall it. I don't know if the record shows it. If I did——

Mr. MORRIS. When did you last communicate with Dr. Chi prior to that time?

Mr. FIELD. I had been out of touch for, well, a good many years.

Mr. MORRIS. I wish you would concentrate on that point because it is important.

Will you try to recall what steps you took prior to your receiving the cable from Dr. Chi bearing on this whole question of registration?

Mr. FIELD. I had not—I do not recall having seen Dr. Chi. I really find it impossible to tell you a date. Let me put it this way and perhaps we can work it out: I know he came to this country at least once, and perhaps twice, and I did not see him.

Mr. MORRIS. When was that, approximately?

Mr. FIELD. I worked out these dates. They will appear—I am afraid I can't give this from memory, but I can tell you where the information is available.

In filing the original papers with the court in San Francisco it was necessary to establish this relationship between Dr. Chi and myself. I can't remember why, but I was called upon to do it. I then did work out the chronology. Those papers are public records of the court. I cannot right now do it in justice to myself from memory.

Mr. MORRIS. Give us your best recollection.

Mr. FIELD. I don't remember—my best recollection—please don't hold me to this because it is only a recollection—would be the—I was going to say the late thirties, but I am trying to think.

Mr. MORRIS. You didn't see him at San Francisco at the UN conference?

Mr. FIELD. He wasn't there; to my knowledge he wasn't.

The CHAIRMAN. Were you there?

Mr. FIELD. Yes, sir; I was there.

What I am trying to do is to work back in terms of the international conferences of the IPR to think whether or not he attended them.

Mr. MORRIS. Could you roughly, within 2 or 3 years, give us the date?

Mr. FIELD. I would say—I can't at the moment think of any time after 1940 having seen him. I must say I may be mistaken.

Mr. MORRIS. Who sent the cable to you preliminary to your registering as an agent for China National Aviation Corp.?

Mr. FIELD. I think the cable is here. I will stand by it. It was either the president or general manager of the CNAC and I believe from Hong Kong. I think you have got it. Because it was submitted.

Mr. MORRIS. What was your relation to that particular man?

Mr. FIELD. I had none. I had never known and didn't know his name.

Mr. MORRIS. Did you presume he was acting on the suggestion of Dr. Chi?

Mr. FIELD. The cable apparently said so. As I recall, it did. Isn't it in these documents? Have you got those, Senator? Those may be the termination cables. Are they?

In any case, I am quite sure all the cables are on file.

Mr. MORRIS. What was the role of Mr. Martin Popper in this transaction?

Mr. FIELD. I asked him—I had appointed attorney in fact. I asked Mr. Popper to become attorney at law.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Popper is associated with the American-China Export Co.?

Mr. FIELD. May I speak to my counsel on that?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. FIELD. Mr. Morris, again I think this is a question drawing me into an area which I feel might be self-incriminating. I would respectfully decline to answer on that ground and I would also invoke my privilege under the fifth amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the question, Mr. Morris?

Mr. MORRIS. Read the question back, please.

(The following question was read by the reporter:)

Mr. Popper is associated with the American-China Export Co.?

The CHAIRMAN. To that you refused to answer, invoking your privilege?

Mr. FIELD. I would like to invoke the privilege on that.

The CHAIRMAN. You must do it or not do it.

Mr. FIELD. I have done so.

Mr. MORRIS. When did you resign as agent for the aforesaid foreign principals?

Mr. FIELD. The cancellation of the agency was effective some date in January of this year.

Mr. MORRIS. 1951?

Mr. FIELD. Some date in January of this year, yes.

Mr. MORRIS. Why did you resign as agent for those foreign principals?

Mr. FIELD. I resigned—I remember I began the negotiation toward resignation perhaps the end of November, early November of 1950. I resigned on the ground that the changes in the international situation made it undesirable and impossible to continue these agencies or made it impossible for me certainly to continue playing the role as I had up to that period.

Mr. MORRIS. In other words, you effectively were blocked from carrying out the function which you thought you were going to carry out?

Mr. FIELD. Yes; and I was also unwilling to continue for personal reasons. I didn't wish to continue as agent at that period.

Mr. MORRIS. It was not because you disagreed with the policy of the Chinese Government in waging war against the American troops in Korea?

Mr. FIELD. Mr. Morris, I have answered this chain up to this question, and at this point I would like to invoke the privilege and decline to answer on the grounds that the answer might tend to incriminate me.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Field, I hope you are keeping in mind the expressions that the chairman made. I hope you are keeping in mind everything that pertains to these hearings and to the value that may be placed upon your testimony.

Again I bring to your attention the country that is your country that needs the help of every red-blooded American today and if you have information that would be of assistance to your country in her trying hours, the chairman can only say to you that it behooves every American to come forward because of the blood of Americans is spilled all over Asia today, and it behooves us to try to see that our country is protected internally.

Senator O'CONOR. There is a question there that I would like to ask.

Mr. Field, what specific development caused you to set into motion the cancellation or withdrawal from that representation?

Mr. FIELD. The events which took place in the latter part of last fall, Senator, which were the new situation in the Korea, the developing policies in this country, the embargo, the freezing of funds, and other measures being undertaken in China in retaliation.

My own personal situation in which I did not wish to continue in the light of such developments also. It was something I did not wish to do, as I stated before.

These things led me to initiate the cancellation of the four agencies.

Senator O'CONOR. Was the intervention of the Chinese Communists in the Korean conflict a major consideration?

Mr. FIELD. Well, I have just described it as certainly a factor which was part of the complex events which took place at that time.

Senator O'CONOR. I was taking it up from the standpoint of the timing.

Mr. FIELD. It was the direct relation.

Senator O'CONOR. In other words, it was quite in point of time related to that?

Mr. FIELD. Yes.

Senator O'CONOR. Are there any other specific developments which led up to your decision to withdraw your associations, any other major ones?

Mr. FIELD. I think the ones I have mentioned are sort of general. I can't think of any further way to express it.

Senator O'CONOR. You have mentioned the embargo which went on during the early days of December, about December 9, if my memory serves me correctly. That had a decided bearing upon your decision?

Mr. FIELD. In the case of the agencies, to be on the practical side, the freezing of funds of course was decisive.

Senator O'CONOR. That is the third thing I wanted to ask you.

Mr. FIELD. That was decisive. The embargo did not affect it.

Senator O'CONOR. These two things were interrelated?

Mr. FIELD. Yes.

Senator O'CONOR. They occurred at or about the same day or week?

Mr. FIELD. Yes.

Senator O'CONOR. I was going to ask you whether the freezing of the funds did have a very definite bearing on your decision.

Mr. FIELD. Yes; and I think I mentioned that in my original testimony.

Senator O'CONOR. As the result of that action by the United States Government it was virtually impossible for you to carry on the representation as it had been carried on by you previously?

Mr. FIELD. I said it was both impracticable and impossible in that period. I said also it was undesirable from my point of view to continue in that capacity.

Senator O'CONOR. The point I was directing attention to was whether or not the developments by others than yourself and including the United States Government forced your decision, or whether it was by reason of a change of attitude upon your part as to your willingness to be the accredited representative of these four institutions.

Mr. FIELD. Senator, I could put it this way: That inevitably changes in international relations such as I think did take place last fall impinge on any individual's point of view.

This certainly did have an effect on me. I tried to give some expression to it now in replying to your question.

Senator O'CONOR. Mr. Field, I have before me a booklet which is captioned "China's Greatest Crisis," by Frederick V. Field. You are familiar with it since you are the author of it, is that not true?

Mr. FIELD. Senator, with respect to that question I may say that I would like to invoke the privilege on the grounds that the answer might tend to incriminate me.

Senator O'CONOR. At the outset I was merely intending to identify the Frederick V. Field as to whether or not that was you or another person, to your knowledge.

Mr. FIELD. I think I must invoke the privilege on that question.

The CHAIRMAN. You deny you were the author of it?

Mr. FIELD. I invoke the privilege. I decline to answer on the grounds that the answer might tend to incriminate me.

Senator O'Conor. I read two passages on the back page of the publication for the specific purpose of having you tell us, if you will, whether or not in your withdrawal of representation you departed from these views, or were adhering to them still. The first is a quotation from Earl Browder which is imprinted on the back page of the booklet just over your name. That is your name at the bottom of the second of the two pages. I will hand it to you when I have read it.

The text is as follows:

China's new democracy by Mao Tse-tung, outstanding spokesman for the Chinese Communist, is a work of historical importance, one of the essential documents for evaluating the current Chinese crisis proclaiming the Chinese Communist long-time program and perspective for the liberation and development of that great nation.

That is signed "Earl Browder."

I ask you whether or not you caused that to be imprinted on the back of this booklet?

Mr. Field. Senator, I did mean to suggest that if I may I feel I must use the privilege on that whole chain of questions with reference to this document. I do so in this connection and decline to answer on the grounds that the answer might tend to incriminate me.

Senator O'Conor. Then the one which I read and the name Frederick V. Field is attached to the bottom, is as follows:

China's new democracy reaches the English-speaking public just as the Chinese Nation faces the sharpest test of its history. If we thoroughly comprehend the lessons which Mao Tse-tung here teaches, our efforts to support those policies which will result in a regeneration of China will be immeasurably strengthened.

That is signed "Frederick V. Field."

It is published by New Century, January 1945. You will notice that at the bottom.

Mr. Field. If I may, I would like to refuse to answer on the ground that the reply might tend to incriminate me.

Senator O'Conor. Mr. Field, is there anything concerning this publication which you would tell us about, anything which you feel you can elaborate upon without incriminating yourself?

Mr. Field. Senator, my understanding of my use of the privilege, and I do believe it is the understanding I derived from the chairman's introductory remarks, is that this is an area of questioning or chain of questioning which might incriminate me, and therefore, I am entitled to invoke the fifth amendment and decline to answer.

The Chairman. I understand that you invoke the privilege?

Mr. Field. That is correct, sir.

The Chairman. On the ground that it might tend to incriminate you; is that right?

Mr. Field. Yes.

Senator O'Conor. Without giving support to the views expressed herein or without reaffirming them or in any sense taking any responsibility for the views, will you tell us whether or not this booklet was in fact published and distributed? I am not asking you for any connection you may have had with it other than just the fact of whether or not this booklet was in fact distributed. That is without asking you for a reaffirmation of the views or anything else relating to it, just as to the mere fact.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Does he know whether or not it was printed?

Mr. FIELD. You have shown me a document. It has clearly been published and exists. I must acknowledge that.

The CHAIRMAN. Had you seen it before?

Mr. MORRIS. Have you seen it before?

Mr. FIELD. Mr. Chairman, I must respectfully decline to answer that question on the grounds the answer may tend to incriminate me.

Senator O'CONOR. The negative answer when you started to answer, you do not mean to say you did not see it before?

Mr. FIELD. No; I meant I must decline to answer.

Senator FERGUSON. Do you find this article is such that it could be incriminating? Is it of such a nature?

Senator O'CONOR. That, Senator Ferguson, is a matter of opinion. There is contained in the publication a series of statements in respect to the present Chinese Government.

Senator FERGUSON. You think it is possible the writer could be indicted and convicted for writing it?

Senator O'CONOR. I have an opinion of my own on that and I do think so.

Senator FERGUSON. I wanted to ask that; otherwise I don't see how a claim could be made on the refusal to answer, Mr. Chairman.

Senator O'CONOR. I do not think the witness would have the right to refuse to testify concerning certain facts of it. That is why I distinguished between the reaffirmance of the views expressed in it.

Just one last question: Is there nothing further that you care to say?

Mr. FIELD. I don't think so.

Senator EASTLAND. What were your duties as attorney in fact for the Bank of China?

Mr. FIELD. I would say my primary function had been to secure an attorney at law and to keep in touch with his work.

Senator EASTLAND. Attorney at law for what purpose?

Mr. FIELD. To carry out the interest of the principals.

Mr. EASTLAND. What were those interests?

Mr. FIELD. They were primarily—I say "primarily"; I think they were exclusively the question of the funds deposited in a large number of banks in this country under the name of these three corporations.

Senator EASTLAND. How much money was involved?

Mr. FIELD. I am afraid I couldn't answer.

The CHAIRMAN. Approximately.

Mr. FIELD. Let me think just a moment. A great deal of money was and still is hidden. The Wells-Fargo case involved—well, I hate to use a figure and have it turn out entirely inaccurate.

Senator EASTLAND. What is your best judgment?

Mr. FIELD. Several million dollars involved, not in the Wells-Fargo case. I will say there were $600,000 in that case.

Senator EASTLAND. All of several million dollars involved?

Mr. FIELD. In the Bank of China's deposits in various banks in this country. In connection with the Chinese National Aviation Corporation——

Senator EASTLAND. Do you mean to testify that you received a cablegram out of the clear sky from a man, Dr. Chi, whom you hadn't seen since approximately 1940, that you had lost track of—received a cablegram appointing you attorney in fact for the Bank of China and when he didn't know whether you would accept it or not?

Mr. FIELD. No; because there is more to be said on that and I have said something about it before, but not drawing its full implications.

The Wells-Fargo Bank of San Francisco itself started this whole procedure in court. It invited—it refused to honor a withdrawal, I believe, signed by H. H. Kung, but it might have been one of the old officials of the Bank of China—it refused to honor a withdrawal. It took it to a court and determined the true ownership. In the course of the litigation the Wells-Fargo Bank sent the papers and documents over to China to get their side of the story and it was in that way that the new Bank of China——

Senator EASTLAND. It was your duty to arrange to represent the legal interests of the Bank of China in litigation involving several million dollars. That is true, is it not?

Mr. FIELD. Yes.

Senator EASTLAND. Is it your testimony—and I want you to answer "yes" or "no"—that you received a cablegram from Dr. Chi, a man you had not seen since approximately 1940, that appointed you attorney in fact?

Mr. FIELD. Inviting me.

Senator EASTLAND. To represent that bank.

Well, he named you agent in fact to represent that bank?

Mr. FIELD. No.

Senator EASTLAND. When no one had previously contacted you but to see if you would act, or whether or not you would accept? Is that true?

Mr. FIELD. No, Senator. I think the way you put it does not give quite the correct impression. The first cable asked me whether I would accept. Upon my cabled reply I would, then came a cable of more definitive nature.

Senator EASTLAND. Who first contacted you? Who in this country discussed the matter with you before you received a cablegram?

Mr. FIELD. No one. I did also testify earlier in this session that I am not sure whether it was in this case or in another that I had sent a cable or a letter, some kind of communication to China, with respect to the situation of these funds. I can't identify this and I don't know whether it is available in the record. Presumably it is.

Senator EASTLAND. Did any official of the Communist Party of the United States discuss this matter with you before you received Dr. Chi's——

Mr. FIELD. No; they didn't. I do want, if I may, Mr. Chairman, just to finish that one link I was trying to point out, that the Wells-Fargo Bank started this; that the whole matter was called to the attention of the people in China by the Wells-Fargo Bank. It was through that that it finally came back.

Senator EASTLAND. Here is a cablegram:

We hereby appoint you attorney in fact in connection with * * *.

The CHAIRMAN. Signed by whom?

Senator EASTLAND. The Director General of Posts, Su Yu Nung.

Mr. FIELD. That is a different principal.

Senator EASTLAND (reading):

We hereby revoke all previous powers of attorney and appoint you as attorney in fact representing our interests in the lawsuit of the Bank of China, New York, against the Wells-Fargo.

Signed, "Chi Chao-ting." That is the cablegram in question; is it not?

Mr. FIELD. That would be the cablegram following the previous exchange which would not have been filed because all that the Bureau requires is the instrument effecting the formal appointment of the agency.

There would have been cables prior to any one of those, preparatory, introductory cables, leading up to the ones here submitted.

Senator EASTLAND. Where are those cables?

Mr. FIELD. I have them.

Senator EASTLAND. With you?

Mr. FIELD. No.

Senator EASTLAND. Will you make those cables available to the committee?

Mr. RABINOWITZ. If I may——

Senator EASTLAND. Wait a minute.

Mr. FIELD. If I may consult my counsel.

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly, but he is not going to answer for you.

Mr. RABINOWITZ. I did not intend to answer. I wanted to refer to a perfectly obvious fact that the witness does not at the moment have access, physical access, to his records.

The CHAIRMAN. He will have to answer that for himself, please.

Mr. RABINOWITZ. I wasn't trying to answer the question.

The CHAIRMAN. That is all right. Propound your question, please.

Mr. FIELD. I have no objections. I have a practical problem.

The CHAIRMAN. I would like to have the record cleared up as to the cablegrams read by Senator Eastland. They should be marked as an exhibit in this case, or some identifying mark put on them.

Senator EASTLAND. I thought they had already been put in.

The CHAIRMAN. We had just connected them up.

Senator EASTLAND. I thought they were in the record.

Mr. MORRIS. Do you therefore testify you will make available to this committee all pertinent correspondence, telegrams, and everything else relating thereto in connection with that registration?

Mr. FIELD. I thought the question was to complete the file of cables prior to these—this I agreed to do. I am in no position to fulfil this now.

Mr. MORRIS. As soon as you are in a position?

Mr. FIELD. I will do so as soon as I am.

Mr. MORRIS. I would like to offer in evidence the registration, No. 640, with exhibit C in connection with the foreign principals—the China National Aviation, the Bank of China, the Directorate General of the Postal Remittances and Savings Banks.

Mr. FIELD. The Chinese National Aviation Corp.

Mr. MORRIS. And the Postal Remittances and Savings Bank of Peking. There are four registrations with exhibit C's in four cases.

The CHAIRMAN. They will be admitted in the record.

(The documents referred to were marked "Exhibit No. 9" and are as follows:)

KNOW ALL MEN BY THESE PRESENTS: That the CHINA NATIONAL AVIATION CORPORATION organized and existing under and by virtue of the Laws of China, having its principal place of business in Tientsin, China, pursuant to a resolution duly adopted by its Board of Directors and hereto annexed and forming a part hereof, has made, constituted and appointed and by these presents does make, constitute and appoint, Frederick V. Field, a citizen of the United States of America, residing at 23 West 26th Street, City of New York, United States of America, its true and lawful attorney to represent the China National Aviation Corporation in the United States of America and with board authority to manage and conduct the business, property and affairs of China National Aviation Corporation in the United States of America, and without limiting the generality of such powers, and by way of enumerating some of the powers which it is intended to repose in said Attorney, to do and perform the following in the United States of America:

1. To manage and control the funds and assets of China National Aviation Corporation, and without limiting this general power, to invest and reinvest the same, to purchase, arrange for the purchase of, or otherwise acquire, sell, arrange for the sale of, or otherwise dispose of, own, hold, exchange, transfer, deliver, pledge, or otherwise deal in and with bonds, stocks, bills of exchange, acceptances, notes, and other securities or property, including, but not limited to, all such securities and property, at any time held or controlled by any bank, Government or person, either as collateral, in custody, or otherwise; to receive the delivery of any securities or other property, and if conditionally released by any bank, Government or person, to execute conditional or trust receipts therefor.

2. To accept for payment at a future date, drafts, bills of exchange and any other instruments for the payment of money, whether expressed in United States dollars or in any other currency, negotiable or non-negotiable, drawn upon the China National Aviation Corporation by its head office, branches, correspondents, customers, or others, and to issue letters of credit, including commercial letters of credit and travelers letters of credit, authorizing the holder thereof to draw drafts upon China National Aviation Corporation or its correspondents at sight, on time or otherwise in United States dollars or in any other currency.

3. To purchase, or otherwise, acquire, own, hold, sell, endorse, negotiate, assign, transfer, exchange, deliver or otherwise dispose of, make, draw, sign, issue, open, accept, pay, renew, guarantee, discount, collect, transmit, protest, mortgage, pledge, hypothecate, and otherwise deal in and with, notes, drafts, bills of exchange, or other evidences of debt, acceptances, letters of credit, including commercial letters of credit and travelers letters of credit, checks, orders for the payment of money, stocks, bonds, securities, bills of lading or other shipping documents, insurance policies, warehouse receipts, trust receipts, and other instruments, negotiable or non-negotiable of every kind and description; to waive presentment, notice of nonpayment and protest of any and all negotiable or other instruments.

4. To open, maintain, adjust, settle and close any deposit account, foreign currency account, or other account in the United States of America, for the deposit or collection of funds belonging to China National Aviation Corporation, or to others with any bank, and to make any agreements or arrangements and to issue any instructions relative to such accounts; to designate one or more depositories for said accounts; to deposit such funds in said deposit accounts. All said funds shall be subject to withdrawal or charge at any time and from time to time, upon checks, notes, drafts, bills of exchange, acceptances, undertakings or other instruments or orders for the payment of money, when made, signed, drawn, accepted or endorsed by said Attorney or his substitute or substitutes. Each depository be and it hereby is authorized to pay cash, certify, give credit for, accept, or purchase the same, or make any such charge without limit as to amount, and without inquiry as to the circumstances of issue or the disposition of the proceeds, even if drawn, made or endorsed to said Attorney or his substitute or substitutes, or tendered in payment of his individual obligation or for his credit, or for deposit to his personal account. Any and all endorsements for or on account of China National Aviation Corporation upon such checks, notes, drafts, bills of exchange, acceptances, undertakings and other instruments or orders for the payment of money, tendered for deposit or collection to any said bank, may be by written or stamped endorsements of China National Aviation Corporation without any designation of the party making such endorsement.

5. To open, maintain, adjust, settle and close, custody, safekeeping, collection, or other accounts with any bank or person, in the United States of America; to deliver to, transfer to, and deposit with any such bank or person for custody and safekeeping, and to withdraw any securities or other property belonging to China National Aviation Corporation, its customers or others, and to execute any agreements or other instruments and instructions relative thereto or relative to any custody or safekeeping account or the securities and property therein; to have securities of China National Aviation Corporation, its customers or others, placed on registered in the name of the depository's nominee. The said Attorney may authorize each such bank or person to receive and hold in any such custody or safekeeping account as depository, and to sell or arrange for the sale of, or otherwise dispose of, checks, notes, drafts, bills of exchange, acceptances, or other instruments for the payment of money, negotiable or non-negotiable, stocks, bonds, coupons and other securities and funds not subject to check or other property, to collect all interest, dividends and other income which may become due and to credit the same to any account of China National Aviation Corporation, to execute on behalf of China National Aviation all necessary ownership certificates or other instruments that may be required under any income tax or other laws of regulations of any Government now or hereafter in effect.

6. To hire deposit boxes, safes or other space in any vault or any safe deposit company or bank in the United States of America, or in any warehouse or other premises, subject to the terms, conditions, rules and regulations of any such safe deposit company or bank, warehouse or owners of any other premises, and to execute any and all agreements and instruments required therefor.

7. To execute deeds, conveyances, mortgages, bills of sale, conditional bills of sale, assignments, transfers or other instruments of assignment or transfer.

8. To the extent permitted by law, to accept, receive, maintain and manage deposit account, savings accounts, safekeeping or custody accounts, or other accounts, from any bank, person or Government.

9. To receive personal property, both tangible or intangible, of every kind and description for safekeeping or management, and to lease to customers for hire, safe deposit boxes, receptacles or other space for the safekeeping of such personal property.

10. To receive goods, wares and merchandise, which may be shipped to or consigned to China National Aviation Corporation by or for the account of customers or others or for its own account, or in which China National Aviation Corporation may be interested, and to sell, assign, transfer or otherwise dispose of, or deal with the same, or any part thereof; to transport, store or warehouse the same or any part thereof in the name of China National Aviation Corporation or otherwise. To do and perform any act or thing necessary or proper, in order to obtain clearance through customs of goods, wares and merchandise or other property, for the account of China National Aviation Corporation or its custmers or others including but not limited to the following: to make customs entries; to pay customs duties; to challenge and contest any duty or tax; to make delivery or other disposition of such property, to obtain proper dutiable valuation and proper tariff classification for any such property; to settle and determine all claims, disputes and matters; and to execute bonds, reports and other instruments in connection with the foregoing matters.

11. To place or effect insurance of any kind upon any property or assets of China National Aviation Corporation or of its customers or others, including but not limited to fire, compensation, fidelity, theft, credit, liability, and public liability; to obtain binders for, contract for, renew, cancel or make other disposition of, such insurance; in connection therewith and in case of loss, to execute proofs of loss, statements, affidavits, agreements or other documents, and to collect, receive and acquit for any such insurance, or any sum or sums which may be due to the China National Aviation Corporation, its customers or others in connection therewith.

12. To purchase or otherwise acquire, own, hold, sell, convey, exchange, manage, alter, remodel, repair, lease, rent, invest in and make loans upon, act as broker with respect to mortgage, or otherwise deal in and with real estate, both improved and unimproved, and wheresoever located, or any interest therein, and to construct, erect, build, alter, improve, demolish buildings and structures of every kind, necessary in the transaction of China National Aviation Corporation's business or for account of customers or others.

13. To retain attorneys; to appoint, engage, employ, make contracts with, manage and control agents and subagents, assistants, accountants, representatives, and other employees in any agency, branch or other office of China National Aviation Corporation wherever located, as the said Attorney may deem necessary or advisable. Without limiting the foregoing general powers, to fix their terms, conditions and agreements of retainer or employment and salaries or other compensation; to prescribe their duties; to terminate their employment and to dismiss, discharge or suspend any of them in the absolute discretion of said Attorney, with or without cause, and solely upon such grounds as the said Attorney may deem sufficient in the best interest of China National Aviation Corporation; to fill vacancies and to increase or decrease the number of all such employees; to assemble and maintain an adequate and proper staff; and to establish, alter or amend rules and regulations for the control of such staff, agents and employees.

14. To execute such leases, extensions, and renewals of leases, options, service contracts, and such other instruments as may be necessary or proper in the establishment and maintenance of offices for China National Aviation Corporation anywhere in the United States; to purchase, acquire, sell, exchange, or otherwise dispose of such furniture, fixtures, supplies, and other personal property as may be necessary or convenient in connection with the business of China National Aviation Corporation in the United States of America.

15. To ask, demand, sue for, recover, receive, and give acquittances for any and all moneys, debts and demands, bonds, stocks, securities, and other property due or payable to, belonging to, or deliverable to China National Aviation Corporation, or which may hereafter become due, or payable or deliverable to China National Aviation Corporation, or to which the China National Aviation Corporation may have the right of immediate possession, either as principal, interest, dividend, or otherwise, and from any bank, person, or Government; to compromise, adjust, settle, compound, or otherwise dispose of all claims, demands, disputes, and controversies; to execute any composition, agreement, or other debtor or creditor agreement, or to make any arrangement with debtors to refer any dispute, controversy or matter to arbitration and to appoint or consent to the appointment of arbitrators or an umpire, either before or subsequent to the commencement of legal proceedings; without limiting to any extent the various rights and remedies which are or might be available to China National Aviation Corporation to accept, take possession of, hold, or store any goods, wares, or merchandise, or other personal property whether belonging to China National Aviation Corporation or held by China National Aviation Corporation as security or in trust, or held by any bank or person as security or in trust or for the account of China National Aviation Corporation, or otherwise, and to hold, manage, sell, assign, transfer, lease, mortgage, pledge, or otherwise deal with the same, or any part thereof.

16. To commence, prosecute, enforce, appear in, intervene in, accept service of process in, defend, settle, adjust, compromise, or discontinue any action, suit, proceeding, or litigation at law or in equity, in any court, or before any Government; to apply for or consent to the appointment, removal, or substitution of any Receiver, Trustee, Referee, Master, or Arbitrator.

17. To appear in and participate in any bankruptcy, insolvency, equity, or receivership proceeding or suit, or in any matter relating to the assets, estate, or effects, or the winding up of the affairs of any person, intended to the China National Aviation Corporation or its customers; to execute proofs of claim, and powers of attorney; to attend at and participate in any and all meetings of creditors, either prior to the commencement of or in connection with any such proceeding or suit; to vote in respect of any claim or other matter at any such meeting; to appoint proxies; to withdraw, compromise, settle, satisfy, and deal with any claim; to execute petitions in bankruptcy or applications for the appointment of receivers in any court and under insolvency, bankruptcy, or other laws; and to execute any and all other petitions, answers, proofs of claim, pleadings, or other papers which may be necessary or proper.

18. To attend and vote at, or to appoint proxies or other representatives to attend or vote at any and all meetings of creditors.

19. To execute applications, affidavits, petitions, and other instruments in order to obtain licenses, permits, franchises, and rights from the Government of the United States of America, the several states, territories, and dependencies thereof, the District of Columbia, or any other Government or representatives of any of the foregoing with reference to importing, exporting, selling, exchanging, storing, transshipping, trucking, moving, and matters relating to the performance of any act or thing or the exercise of any power granted by this power of attorney.

20. To execute all such tax returns, information returns, schedules, affidavits, waivers, petitions, applications for refunds, and other instruments and documents as may be required by or permitted under any tax law, income-tax law, or other law, rule, regulation, or requirement of any Government.

21. To do and perform any and all of the foregoing acts and things and to exercise the broad general powers herein granted as well as the specific powers mentioned in this instrument within and throughout the State of New York, the District of Columbia, and the several states, territories, and dependencies of the United States of America and within any other country except as herein otherwise stated, provided only that the same be not inconsistent with the laws, statutes, ordinances, rules, and regulations of any Government having valid jurisdiction in the premises.

22. To transact generally, any and all business on behalf of the China National Aviation Corporation, with full power and authority to do and perform all acts and things incidental to the exercise of, or requisite, necessary, or proper to be done under and by virtue of the broad general powers hereby granted as well as the specific powers herein enumerated, and in and about the premises, as fully to all intents and purposes as the China National Aviation Corporation might or could do if personally present in its corporate capacity, or as the Board of Directors of the China National Aviation Corporation could do if present in person and acting directly therein; to have and possess a seal of the China National Aviation Corporation and to affix the seal to any instrument and to attest the same: provided, however, that at no time shall the seal of the China National Aviation Corporation be or constitute a requirement for the validity of any instrument which said Attorney is authorized to execute and that the right herein granted to use such seal as aforesaid shall not be construed to require the use thereof on any instrument.

23. To do and perform any and all of the acts and things, and to exercise all of the powers herein granted, to the extent that the same shall be in accordance with the laws, rules, or regulations of the Government of the United States of America, the several states, territories, and dependencies thereof, the District of Columbia, or any of the governments or representatives of any of the foregoing. Should the performance of any act or thing or the exercise of any power herein granted, be determined to be illegal or contrary to the laws, rules, and regulations of any such Government as aforesaid, by any Court of competent jurisdiction, or pursuant to the opinion of counsel, or otherwise, it is the intention of the China National Aviation Corporation that this Power of Attorney and all the powers herein granted, nevertheless, shall be and continue at all times in full force and effect as to all acts, things, and powers the performance and exercise of which shall not have been held or determined, specifically, as aforesaid to be illegal or violative of such laws, rules, and regulations.

24. In the interpretation and construction of this power of attorney, the several terms hereinafter mentioned shall be defined to include the meanings indicated, but these definitions shall not be deemed to limit in any way the broader definitions or meanings that would otherwise be given to them in law. The term "bank" shall be defined to include any government bank, central bank, correspondent bank, agency bank, branch bank, private banker, banking partnership or firm, or any other banking or financial organization or institution, public or private. The term "person" shall be defined to include any individual, firm, partnership, corporation, public or private, or association, and also any Government or bank as herein defined. The term "execute" or "make" shall be defined to include make, draw, sign, swear to, verify, acknowledge, certify, deliver, deposit, send, file, and record.

25. To nominate, constitute and appoint from time to time, a substitute or substitutes to act in the name, place, and stead of said Attorney who at all times shall have full power of revocation.

26. The China National Aviation Corporation for itself, its successors and assigns does hereby ratify, confirm, and approve all acts and transactions which said Attorney or any lawfully appointed substitute or substitutes shall do or cause to be done by virtue of this Power of Attorney. All acts and transactions of said Attorney and of his substitutes, shall, notwithstanding any prior revocation of any substitution thereunder, be valid, effectual and binding upon the China National Aviation Corporation, unless notice in writing of such revocation of this Power of Attorney shall have been previously delivered to the China National Aviation Corporation or person to whom a copy of this Power of Attorney shall have been delivered.

27. The China National Aviation Corporation does hereby annul, cancel, revoke, and terminate any and all previous Powers of Attorney heretofore granted and does hereby annul, cancel, revoke and terminate all rights, powers, authorities, privileges, and immunities granted therein and thereby vested in or given to any and all such previous attorneys-in-fact.

IN WITNESS WHEREOF, the China National Aviation Corporation has caused this Power of Attorney to be executed, and its corporate seal to be hereunto affixed by being thereunto duly authorized by the resolution hereinabove referred at to this day aforesaid.

Sealed with the Common Seal of The China National Aviation Corporation and signed by Liu Ching Yi, its Managing Director, in the presence of—

[SEAL] CHINA NATIONAL AVIATION CORPORATION,
By C. Y. LIU, Managing Director.

6. (1) Attorney in fact for the Bank of China to represent all Bank of China interests in the United States.

Registrant's authority has been used in connection with several lawsuits in the United States District Court for the Northern District of California, Southern Division. In the first of those actions (Bank of China v. Wells Fargo Bank & Union Trust Co., No. 29287-G), there is a contest between two groups, each of whom claim to have authority to act on behalf of the Bank of China for control of several deposits in the Wells Fargo Bank in San Francisco. Registrant, pursuant to appointment as attorney in fact for the present management of the Bank of China, authorized the filing of certain motions in the actions. The suits had previously been commenced by persons who alleged that they were authorized to act on behalf of the Bank of China. Their purported authority was first questioned by the Wells Fargo Bank and later contested by the registrant.

A decision has been rendered in this case by the United States District Court for the Northern District of California, Southern Division, and the matter is now on appeal.

Registrant has also been designated attorney at law to make claim on behalf of the present management of the Bank of China to deposits in several other American banks. No litigation is pending involving those deposits.

(a) Attorney in fact of China National Aviation Corporation with broad authority to manage and conduct the business affairs of this corporation in the United States.

Registrant has used his authority as attorney-in-fact in connection with a number of pending lawsuits in the Federal Court in California initiated by Civil Air Transport, Inc., a Delaware corporation, in which the question to be determined is the ownership of the deposits in various banks as well as to certain property in California. Civil Air Transport, Inc., claims that the stock and assets of China National Aviation Corporation were sold to it. The California banks in which the deposits are held are acting merely as stakeholders and China National Aviation Corporation, a defendant in the suits, is opposing the claims of Civil Air Transport, Inc., on the ground that the purported sale of the stock and assets of China National Aviation Corporation was fraudulent and wholly invalid.

(3) Attorney-in-fact for Directorate General of Postal Remittances and Savings Bank, Peking.

(4) Attorney-in-fact for Chinese Postal Remittances and Savings Bank, Hong Kong. In both (3) and (4) Registrant's power-of-attorney is limited to the protection of the interests of these banks in an interpleader action started in the New York Supreme Court by the Chase National Bank of the City of New York. The question involved in that lawsuit, since removed to the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York, is which of several adverse claimants have authority to act on behalf of the banks. Registrant's power-of-attorney comes from the present management of the banks.

Pecuniary interest in oil leases and/or royalties

My records as well as those kept by my accountant show only original cost and current income. They identify the leases or royalties, moreover, only by the name of the remitter. In other words I do not presently have on hand the exact identity or location of each royalty or lease nor the exact fraction of my holdings in each of these properties.

The latter information can be secured, and will be secured if desired, by keeping track of incoming checks from these properties, for the fractional interest and lease number are usually indicated thereon. As all properties do not regularly pay on a monthly basis such information would take several months to accumulate.

It should further be noted that I have a few other investments in royalties and leases which, not having furnished income for a number of years, I regard as washed out. I do not carry such holdings in my records. Again, however, should a list of these washed-out investments be desired it would be possible, with considerable effort, to identify them by scrutinizing my accounts for earlier years.

The list of investments in oil royalties and leases, identified by the name of the remitter and the original cost follows:

Mr. MORRIS. I would also like to introduce the document referred to——

The CHAIRMAN. To these instruments, I think you have already answered that your signature is attached?

Mr. FIELD. Yes; I have.

Mr. MORRIS. I would like to identify the pamphlet and introduce it into the record, the one that was subject of a conference between Mr. Field and Senator O'Conor. It is a booklet entitled "China's Greatest Crisis." It is published by the New Century Publishers, Inc., 832 Broadway.

On page 1 it has a statement here about the author, Frederick V. Field. [Reading:]

The author of this pamphlet is a member of the executive committee of the American council, Institute of Pacific Relations, an author on far eastern problems. He is also executive vice president of the Council for Pan American Democracy and member of the editorial board of New Masses.

The publishing date is January 1945. I would like to introduce this into the record as exhibit No. 10.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be received.

CHINA'S NEW DEMOCRACY

(By Mao Tse-tung)

"China's New Democracy by Mao Tse-tung, outstanding spokesman for the Chinese Communists, is a work of historical importance * * * one of the essential documents for evaluating the current Chinese crisis * * * containing the Chinese Communists' long-time program and perspective for the liberation and development of that great nation."—Earl Browder.

"No document more important than China's New Democracy by Mao Tse-tung, the revered Chinese Communist leader, has emerged from that nation since the beginning of the war. It is unquestionably the most significant contribution to the foreign understanding of the problems and perspectives of our far eastern ally available to us. * * *

"China's New Democracy reaches the English-speaking public just as the Chinese nation faces the sharpest test of its history. If we thoroughly comprehend the lessons which Mao Tse-tung here teaches us, our efforts to support those policies which will result in a regeneration of China will be immeasurably strengthened."—Frederick V. Field.

Senator O'CONOR. Mr. Chairman, on that point, Mr. Field, what was the time or the date when you first undertook to make application for a commission in the Army Intelligence of the United States?

Mr. FIELD. The origin was the other way around. I was asked if I would accept a commission.

Mr. MORRIS. Who asked you?

Senator O'CONOR. I was going to bring that out. I wanted to get the time first.

Mr. FIELD. It began very early in January of 1942.

Senator O'CONOR. It extended over quite a period, did it not, Mr. Field?

Mr. FIELD. At least 2 months.

Senator O'CONOR. By whom were you asked to join the Intelligence Corps of the United States Army?

Mr. FIELD. I have been trying to think since I read this coming down on the train yesterday who it was. I cannot recall the name. I remember it was an officer who had established emergency headquarters in New York. He was apparently engaged in recruiting people for specialized jobs of one sort or another.

Senator O'CONOR. Why did he single you out?

Mr. FIELD. Among a great many others, obviously. I had worked for a great many years on American far eastern policy and didn't consider myself a great expert, but presumably I had some slight reputation in the field, and I suppose they were looking for these people.

Senator O'CONOR. Who else assisted, or who assisted you in your efforts to secure the commission, or who was interested in regard to the pending matter as to whether or not it initiated with you or came to you by way of an offer?

Mr. FIELD. I would like to answer as fully as my recollection permits on this. At that time I was—everybody was interested—so there is a general answer to that—anybody I knew. After conversation with this officer whose name I cannot recall—there may be some correspondence with him; I am not sure—I was asked to come here to Washington to go through a series of rather prolonged interviews with the officers who were heading up, or under whom this particular section, which was to be a research staff on certain problems that they were facing, was organized. I spent some time down here and had long individual discussions with the various officers. The subject of the discussions was the question of my political views and whether they could be reconciled with the task which they wished me to undertake. We had very long talks, very full and frank talks on both sides. Finally, I was definitely offered a commission by this particular branch.

Senator FERGUSON. I wondered whether or not from the witness when he was being questioned on his political views by these officers, whether he refused to answer on the grounds it would tend to incriminate him. Did you?

Mr. FIELD. I have just said we had a very full and frank discussion.

Senator O'CONOR. Did you reveal to them fully your views?

Mr. FIELD. Yes; I did.

Senator O'CONOR. In connection with that, and I will come back to that, were you endorsed for the commission by Edward C. Carter, Owen Lattimore, and William T. Stone among others?

Mr. FIELD. Could I come to that in just a moment?

Senator O'CONOR. If you would be good enough to give me the answer categorically.

Mr. FIELD. At one point I was.

Senator O'CONOR. You were endorsed by each of those three?

Mr. FIELD. Maybe I answered too hastily. Could I make just one remark introductory to that?

Senator O'CONOR. Yes.

Mr. FIELD. The whole thing was cleared in this particular Army set-up. It then was blocked at some point, some undeterminable point outside the Army. I meant——

The CHAIRMAN. Speak up, please. The reporter is behind you.

Mr. FIELD. The commission was blocked elsewhere. I was notified of it, and asked to come back to Washington, which I did.

At the time it was suggested that it was impossible for the officers in question themselves to initiate any investigation as to what had gone wrong. They did suggest that I do so myself and see if I could eliminate the problem. It was at that point that I went to everybody I knew whom I thought might be in a position to help me, and Mr. Carter was one of them. I remember that he did offer to help me. I believe he did take certain steps.

Senator O'Conor. How about Owen Lattimore?

Mr. Field. I am not sure whether I went to him or not. I would have. I do remember distinctly going to Mr. Carter. I don't have a real recollection of going to Mr. Lattimore. If he were there, I doubtless did go to him.

Senator O'Conor. If I were to state to you there was certain correspondence that indicates, in which reference is made to Owen Lattimore as being interested in the——

Mr. Field. I definitely—either I or somebody went on my behalf.

Senator O'Conor. And William T. Stone?

Mr. Field. I suppose he would have been one of the persons. I noticed his name in the paper. My recollection is I didn't go to him.

Senator O'Conor. Did he come to you?

Mr. Field. No; I imagine he was interested indirectly through someone else, but I am not sure about that.

Senator Eastland. Did Lauchlin Currie endorse you for a commission?

Mr. Field. I didn't recall he had. I didn't go to him myself.

Senator Eastland. Did you understand he endorsed you?

Mr. Field. No, I hadn't until I heard this. I think it was quite possible he was reached through one of these other people.

Senator Eastland. It is quite possible he did endorse you for a commission?

Mr. Field. I think it is quite possible.

Senator O'Conor. Who is William T. Stone? What is his position?

Mr. Field. I had known him for many years when he worked for the Foreign Policy Association.

Senator O'Conor. Was he not a member of the board of Amerasia?

Mr. Field. The letter helped——

Senator O'Conor. The letter showed you were chairman of the board, and among its members were Owen Lattimore and William T. Stone?

Mr. Field. Then he was.

Senator O'Conor. Was he connected with any agency of the United States Government?

Mr. Field. At that time in 1942?

Senator O'Conor. Or subsequently.

Mr. Field. Subsequently I know he has been.

Senator O'Conor. In what?

Mr. Field. I haven't seen him but I know—wasn't he with OWI during the war, or OSS? Then he, perhaps, when they were taken over by the State Department, went over too.

Senator O'Conor. You state, Mr. Field, that the reason for the effort to receive a commission was that there was a certain problem that was under consideration. Did I understand you correctly to use that expression?

Mr. Field. Yes; I did.

Senator O'CONOR. What was the certain problem?

Mr. FIELD. I have no idea what the rules were about this kind of question. I am perfectly willing to answer.

Senator O'CONOR. All right, answer.

Mr. FIELD. This problem of the strategic bombing of Japan.

Senator O'CONOR. You were consulted as to the strategic bombing of Japan, or rather, you were consulted as to taking a job which would have direct relationship with that problem?

Mr. FIELD. That is the way I understood it, sir.

Senator O'CONOR. Were these persons with whom you consulted, including Mr. Carter, Owen Lattimore, William T. Stone, Lauchlin Currie, aware of the nature of the problems that were then under consideration, about which you were being considered for a commission?

Mr. FIELD. That I am certain of, as to the specific nature; as to the general nature, they certainly would have. It would have depended, and I don't now recall what the rules were with regard to the confidential nature of that——

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Field, did you apply for a commission yourself?

Mr. FIELD. I went through down here in Washington—whatever one does. I imagine I signed the documents.

The CHAIRMAN. Did the Army investigate you?

Mr. FIELD. All I am aware of, Mr. Chairman, were these prolonged interviews which I referred to.

The CHAIRMAN. Did they investigate you before you applied for that, or afterward? Do you remember?

Mr. FIELD. They initiated this.

The CHAIRMAN. The investigation?

Mr. FIELD. No, they initiated the question of my coming into this work.

The CHAIRMAN. Who initiated that?

Mr. FIELD. The Army.

The CHAIRMAN. Then you made the application pursuant to their initiation?

Mr. FIELD. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. Before that or after that did they investigate you, to your knowledge?

Mr. FIELD. All I am aware of is the investigation that took place through these long interviews.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Smith.

Senator SMITH. I want to ask Mr. Field, when did you first learn that the Senate was going to make an investigation of IPR?

Mr. FIELD. I am not—I mean I was down here last year, Senator Smith.

Senator SMITH. It was last fall?

Mr. FIELD. I testified in May of 1950 before Senator Tydings' committee, April or May or something like that. Do you remember that?

Senator SMITH. No, I am referring to after that investigation was closed, when did you next hear that the Senate was going to investigate this matter further in regard to IPR?

Mr. FIELD. I don't believe I can identify this. I remember there was a great deal carried in columnists' political gossip columns to the effect that such an investigation was going to proceed.

Senator SMITH. Was it after that time you resigned your agency with the four institutions mentioned here this morning?

Mr. FIELD. Senator, there was no connection whatsoever between knowledge of such an investigation and such agency, the proof of which there is no secrecy about, in regard to my agency. I have testified fully as to it.

Senator SMITH. Did you have any instructions from those institutions as to what disposition was made of the funds recovered for them as attorney in fact?

Mr. FIELD. The litigation never went to the point of recovering funds.

Senator SMITH. I am not asking that. I am asking whether you had any instructions ahead of time as to any disposition of funds, the several million dollars.

Mr. FIELD. None.

Senator SMITH. May I ask you also what was to be your compensation and what compensation in fact did you receive, if any, from those institutions for acting as attorney in fact?

Mr. FIELD. That is declared in the report that we submitted to the Bureau. None.

Senator SMITH. You understood to start with you would not receive any compensation?

Mr. FIELD. What is that?

Senator SMITH. You understood when you accepted the agencies you were not to receive any compensation?

Mr. FIELD. I either understood it or stipulated it myself; the conditions.

Senator SMITH. The reason you did that was because you were trying to assist these institutions in getting these funds?

Mr. FIELD. I was interested in that purpose; yes.

Senator SMITH. Why were you interested in that purpose?

Mr. FIELD. Senator, again I think this is a question which leads into an area in which I must invoke the fifth amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Field, let me just give you a little word of advice, if I may. You have answered the question to which you could have raised the question. The reason for it does not incriminate you and never will, in any sense of the word. You may claim your privilege if you want to, but I am just giving you that advice.

Mr. FIELD. Could the question be repeated?

The CHAIRMAN. Will you state the question again, please?

The reason I make that observation, on two or three occasions I have refrained from making it, but you have raised the question and invoked the privilege when in reality it was not worthy of the invocation.

Mr. FIELD. Mr. Chairman, may I say on my behalf I endeavor to us the privilege as little as possible?

The CHAIRMAN. I compliment you on that. I hope you will not invoke the privilege.

Mr. FIELD. Please read the question.

Senator SMITH. Read the question.

(The following question was read by the reporter:)

Why were you interested in that purpose?

Senator SMITH. The purpose of recovering funds for these institutions.

Mr. FIELD. Senator, the thought that occurred to me originally in declining to answer is that that is a question which asks for my political views and leads into this area. This is an area which, because of certain legislation in this country, may lead me to self-incrimination. It is on these grounds, in spite of the chairman's warning, which I appreciate, I must decline to answer the question.

Senator SMITH. About the matter of his commission, at the time you discussed with someone in connection with the Army a proposed commission for you in the Intelligence Department, can you tell us with whom you talked?

Mr. FIELD. Down here in the Army?

Senator SMITH. Yes.

Mr. FIELD. I don't recall the names. I have been trying to think of them. There was some correspondence at the time. It is possible I retained some of it.

Senator SMITH. You do have some of that now?

Mr. FIELD. I am not sure I do, but I remember running across it a few years ago.

Senator SMITH. You don't recall a single one of the men in the Army or the military service you discussed this with?

Mr. FIELD. Senator, what makes me hesitate is to throw out a name that might turn out to be inaccurate might be doing an injustice to someone. I think I could suggest a couple of names but I am not sure they would be correct. I would only have their last names.

Senator SMITH. Why do you think it would be doing an injustice to any Army officer to throw out his name that you were the man he met?

Mr. FIELD. It is possible it is doing someone an injustice to be associated unfavorably with me as far back as 1942.

Senator SMITH. Regardless of who the officers who you talked to were, did you disclose to that officer or those officers any connection with the Communist Party you may have had?

Mr. FIELD. I am sure this type of question came up. We had a full and frank discussion. I have no hesitancy whatsoever, if the letters were available, to inform you the names of these—there were two people in particular. I have no hesitancy in giving those names if I can identify them.

Senator SMITH. You say whatever you told the Army officers at that time about your connections was true?

Mr. FIELD. Unquestionably.

Senator SMITH. Do you recall acquainting them with any connection you may have had with the Communist Party?

Mr. FIELD. At this point I would have to decline to answer on the grounds the answer might tend to incriminate me.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Ferguson.

Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Field, you said you do not remember the names of the people in Intelligence. Didn't you write a letter to Carter giving him the name of Merian Cooper, "Our friend John Cooper's brother," as very high in the Army Air Intelligence, telling him you had taken this matter up, the letter being dated February 18, 1942? Does that refresh your memory?

Mr. FIELD. The name Cooper refreshes my memory. I have no wish to conceal or deny these names. If you have the documents, I am glad to answer.

Senator EASTLAND. If we have the documents you will admit it.

Mr. FIELD. I have offered before to supply the documents myself. I would like to make it clear I offered to supply the documents myself.

Senator FERGUSON. I want to ask you this question about Owen Lattimore and about Currie, that you don't remember going to, whether in this same letter you didn't say this:

I am enclosing a confidential account of my attempt to get into the Army to serve as sort of an aide memoire to anyone looking into it. I am also enclosing a copy of my original Who's Who on the basis of which I was regarded as sufficiently qualified for the job.

By the way, I might wonder why anybody thought his Who's Who would put him in the Navy or Army Intelligence.

Mr. FIELD. I was asked for it.

Senator FERGUSON (continuing):

Nothing new to report. I have had a good talk with Justine Wise Polier and her husband. Both are working on the matter. Presumably Currie is taking it up with Owen.

Mr. FIELD. That is unquestionably Owen Lattimore.

Senator FERGUSON. Who is Currie?

Mr. FIELD. That would be Lauchlin Currie. It carries out exactly the testimony that I gave recently that Mr. Currie had probably been reached indirectly.

Senator FERGUSON. Not only probably but was; he was reached by Lattimore.

Mr. FIELD. There isn't any question about it.

Senator FERGUSON. There is no doubt, is there?

Mr. FIELD. I never entertained or suggested any doubt.

Senator FERGUSON. Let's get a copy of the letter.

Mr. FIELD. I acknowledge the truth of it if it is here in the letter.

Senator FERGUSON. I can show you here the original written on your own stationery. There is no doubt about it is there?

Mr. FIELD. No, sir; I have no doubt.

Senator FERGUSON. Was there anybody else in the Army Intelligence you took it up with?

Mr. FIELD. As I say—I am sorry, Senator.

Senator FERGUSON. Was there anybody else in Army Intelligence you took this matter up with?

Mr. FIELD. I testified to Senator Smith there were others to whom I talked. You probably have references to them in those letters.

Senator FERGUSON. Would you have any objections to Army Intelligence turning over to this committee all that you told them and the recommendations and all the matters they have before them?

Mr. FIELD. None whatsoever.

Senator FERGUSON. There is nothing in that file you know of you would not want turned over?

Mr. FIELD. No.

Senator FERGUSON. I will have further questions later, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Eastland.

Senator EASTLAND. Mr. Field, you testified for many years you worked in far eastern affairs? That is correct, that is your testimony?

Mr. FIELD. That is correct.

Senator EASTLAND. Did you ever have dealings with the United States State Department in our Far Eastern policies or affairs?

Mr. FIELD. I knew people in the State Department.

Senator EASTLAND. Whom did you know in the State Department?

Mr. FIELD. This question of what you meant by dealings——

Senator EASTLAND. Whom did you know in the State Department?

Mr. FIELD. One of the people that I recall very vividly knowing in the early time was Dr. Hornbeck, Stanley Hornbeck.

Senator EASTLAND. Who else?

Mr. FIELD. Over this whole period?

Senator EASTLAND. Yes.

Mr. FIELD. I knew a great many of them.

Senator EASTLAND. Name them. Did you know Alger Hiss?

Mr. FIELD. No; I did not.

The CHAIRMAN. You knew he was Hornbeck's assistant, did you not?

Mr. FIELD. He wasn't at the time; at least I didn't believe he was at the time. I knew Dr. Hornbeck. Dr. Hornbeck was the Chief of the Far Eastern Division at the time I knew him. I am trying to think who succeeded Dr. Hornbeck as head of the Division.

Mr. SOURWINE. Was it John Carter Vincent?

Mr. FIELD. I think that is possible.

The CHAIRMAN. Was it John Carter Vincent?

Mr. FIELD. I am not sure. I met John Carter Vincent at an IPR conference.

Senator EASTLAND. Did you ever discuss our Far Eastern policy with John Carter Vincent?

Mr. FIELD. No, I don't remember ever having any discussion with him.

Senator EASTLAND. What dealings did you have with the State Department relative to our Far Eastern affairs or Far Eastern policy?

Mr. FIELD. Personally I had very few dealings with them. I just had to, as part of trying to carry out the job of the institute, the research job of the institute. One would try to keep as well informed as possible, keep coming down and checking on whether things were accurate or not.

Senator EASTLAND. Tell me with whom you had dealings.

Mr. FIELD. If you want to ask me certain names and refresh my memory——

Senator EASTLAND. I don't want to refresh your memory, and you are bound to remember whom you had dealings with.

Mr. FIELD. I have given you some names.

Senator EASTLAND. Who else? You have given two names.

Mr. FIELD. I met on several occasions. The name I was trying to think of before was Nelson Johnson, who was later Ambassador to China. I am sorry, I am more than willing to think about this. I happen to be extremely tired and I am not recalling names very rapidly.

I went to China a couple of times. I met most of the officials of the Embassy on both those trips. I certainly acknowledge knowing the people who were in the Far Eastern Division during most of this period, let us say, at least up to 1940.

Senator EASTLAND. Did you discuss our China policy with them?

Mr. FIELD. I wouldn't put it in terms of discussing. I was at the time a very inexperienced person in the field and I was trying to learn. I would come down to learn from them.

Senator EASTLAND. How long have you known Lauchlin Currie?

Mr. FIELD. I only met him once. That was in Canada at a conference of the Institute of Pacific Relations during the war.

Senator EASTLAND. You never had a conference with him in Washington?

Mr. FIELD. No; I did not.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Morris.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you explain your relationship with the publication Amerasia?

Mr. FIELD. Yes; I testified on this at your executive session.

Mr. RABINOWITZ. Mr. Chairman, may I——

The CHAIRMAN. Just a minute. I beg your pardon, but I have laid down the rule. You may confer with the gentleman.

Mr. RABINOWITZ. I wanted to address a question to you with respect to the procedure here, merely with this in view: I note they are opening a new subject here. The witness came down from New York last night, got in very late and was up in accordance with the routine at the District jail at 5 o'clock this morning, which is when he last had something to eat. If we are going to open a new subject and go on for some time, I wonder whether it would be possible to take a luncheon recess now? I know it is a trifle early, but the witness is very much fatigued, I think.

The CHAIRMAN. If he can carry on for 20 or 25 minutes more, that will be all.

Mr. FIELD. Do you want me to testify as I did in your executive session on this subject?

Mr. MORRIS. Were you the owner of 50 percent of the shares of the corporation?

Mr. FIELD. Your information was accurate. If you will repeat it——

Mr. MORRIS. That you were the owner of 50 percent of the stock?

Mr. FIELD. I don't think that was it. Yes, Jaffe had 49 percent of the stock of Amerasia. Somebody had 1 percent.

Mr. MORRIS. Were you chairman of the editorial board of Amerasia?

Mr. FIELD. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. Was this during the time when you were national secretary of the Institute of Pacific Relations?

Mr. FIELD. There was an overlapping, yes.

Mr. MORRIS. You were national secretary from 1934 to 1940?

Mr. FIELD. Yes, and this started in 1937.

Mr. MORRIS. When did you resign from Amerasia?

Mr. FIELD. I think it was the very end of 1943, but I am not absolutely certain. I testified as to the exact date before Senator Tydings. At that time I know my testimony because I looked it up.

Mr. MORRIS. It is your testimony, therefore, from 1937 to 1943 you were half owner of the publication Amerasia, the corporation?

Mr. FIELD. I don't think there was any change in the ownership.

Mr. MORRIS. When you resigned, who took over control of Amerasia?

Mr. FIELD. Mr. Jaffe.

Mr. MORRIS. Did you discuss with your associates in the Institute of Pacific Relations the workings of Amerasia during that period?

Mr. FIELD. Yes, we did have discussions. I think I touched on some of those in the executive sessions. I remember your drawing me out on a development that took place with respect to it. In what manner do you want me to proceed here?

Mr. MORRIS. Would you just relate in general what were your relations with the institute people? They knew full well you were half owner of Amerasia?

Mr. FIELD. Yes. There were discussions prior to the establishment of Amerasia as to whether or not it was proper and suitable for a responsible staff person to undertake this outside activity. I believe from the very beginning certain people in the institute had grave doubts about it which came to the surface some years later and were more vigorously expressed.

I recall testifying in executive session that my argument for starting the magazine and one which I think did carry considerable weight at the time, was a number of us in our several years of work in the institute had developed certain ideas. We were interested in conclusions to be drawn from research as well as the research itself. One of the best ways to insure the institute itself, to insure it remained in the research field and avoided becoming political, was to establish an organization, and where we could blow our steam off outside the institute. This was one of the prevailing arguments which I think persuaded somewhat doubtful people in the institute about the advisability of undertaking this.

Mr. MORRIS. A good many of your associates of IPR were on the editorial board of Amerasia, were they?

Mr. FIELD. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. Could you tell us who some of those were?

Mr. FIELD. If you have the masthead—Mr. Lattimore was.

Mr. MORRIS. Kate Mitchell?

Mr. FIELD. Is that an early masthead?

Mr. MORRIS. This is 1943.

Mr. FIELD. 1937 or 1938 would be more accurate.

Mr. MORRIS. Kate Mitchell?

Mr. FIELD. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. Harriet Moore?

Mr. FIELD. If the masthead shows it.

Mr. MORRIS. T. A. Bisson.

Mr. FIELD. He was not in the IPR at that time.

Mr. MORRIS. Benjamin Kizer?

Mr. FIELD. He was a trustee.

Mr. MORRIS. And of course Philip Jaffee?

Mr. FIELD. He was not an IPR staff person.

Mr. MORRIS. He was associated with the IPR?

Mr. FIELD. Only as a member. He wasn't a trustee or an officer in any capacity, or a staff person.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Field, were you ever known as Comrade Frederick Spencer?

Mr. FIELD. I decline to answer that question on the ground the answer might tend to incriminate me.

Mr. MORRIS. When I used "comrade," I meant a member of the Communist Party and you have given your answer.

Did you contribute an article in the publication China Today under the name of Frederick Spencer in March 1935?

Mr. FIELD. I decline to answer that question on the ground the answer might tend to incriminate me.

Mr. MORRIS. Did you contribute an article in China Today in April 1935?

Mr. FIELD. I also decline to answer that question.

Mr. MORRIS. Also under the name of Frederick Spencer?

Mr. FIELD. I decline to answer on the ground the answer might tend to incriminate me.

The CHAIRMAN Did you ever write under the name of Frederick Spencer?

Mr. FIELD. Mr. Chairman, I must decline to answer that question on the ground the answer might tend to incrimi nate me.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like Mr. Mandel, who was previously sworn, to introduce into the record articles by Frederick Spencer in the March and April issues of China Today.

The CHAIRMAN. Proceed. Mr. Mandel is under oath.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Mandel, how many other articles have appeared in China Today under the name of Frederick Spencer?

Mr. MANDEL. Under the pseudonym of Frederick Spencer?

Mr. MORRIS. How many times did Frederick Spencer contribute articles to China Today?

Mr. MANDEL. Nine.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Mandel's testimony is that nine articles by Frederick Spencer appeared in China Today.

Will you give the dates, Mr. Mandel?

Mr. MANDEL. March 1935 and April 1935 (2); May 1935; October 1935; November 1935 (2); June 1936 and October 1936.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Mandel, do any articles appear in the publication China Today under the name of Frederick V. Field?

(List appears on p. 125 as part of exhibit No. 15.)

Mr. MORRIS. Were you executive secretary of American Peace Mobilization in 1940 and 1941, Mr. Field?

Mr. FIELD. I respectfully decline to answer on the ground that to answer might tend to incriminate me.

Mr. MORRIS. Were you active in any way with the American Peace Mobilization in 1940 and 1941?

Mr. FIELD. I must give the same declination on the ground that the answer might tend to incriminate me.

Mr. MORRIS. Did you picket the White House in connection with the demonstrations conducted by the American Peace Mobilization in 1941?

Mr. FIELD. I must also decline to answer that question on the ground the answer might tend to incriminate me.

Mr. MORRIS. Did you remain executive secretary of the American Peace Mobilization after June 2, 1941, when the Germany Army invaded the Soviet Union?

Mr. FIELD. I decline to answer on the ground the answer may tend to incriminate me.

Mr. MORRIS. The Daily Worker of January 10, 1941, lists you as a speaker at a defense rally for convicted Oklahoma Communists. Did you take part in such a defense rally?

Mr. FIELD. I decline to answer on the ground the answer might tend to incriminate me.

Mr. MORRIS. Did you contribute to the New Masses on December 16, 1941?

Mr. FIELD. I decline to answer on the ground the answer might tend to incriminate me.

Mr. MORRIS. Did you contribute on April 14, 1942?

Mr. FIELD. I also decline to answer on the same ground.

Mr. MORRIS. During the period July 22, 1947, or during the period April 14, 1942, which is the last date, up until July 22, 1947, did you contribute 37 articles to the New Masses?

Mr. FIELD. I decline to reply on the grounds that the answer may tend to incriminate me.

Mr. MORRIS. Were you at any time editor of the New Masses?

Mr. FIELD. I also decline to answer that question on the same grounds.

Mr. MORRIS. Did you write an article in the Communist, which was the official monthly publication of the Communist Party, and was later known as Political Affairs, in September of 1944, entitled "China's Real Destiny"?

Mr. FIELD. I decline to answer that on the ground the answer may tend to incriminate me.

Mr. MORRIS. Did you write 14 articles in this same publication up to December 1950?

Mr. FIELD. I decline to answer that question on the same grounds.

Mr. MORRIS. Did you write an article on April 25, 1944, in the Daily Worker?

Mr. FIELD. I decline to answer that question on the ground the answer may tend to incriminate me.

Mr. MORRIS. Did you thereafter contribute 54 articles, published with your bylines, up until October 9, 1949, in the Daily Worker?

Mr. FIELD. I also decline to answer that question for the same reasons.

Mr. MORRIS. While you were in the Institute of Pacific Relations, were the publications China Today, the New Masses, the Communist, and the Daily Worker in the institute library?

Mr. FIELD. I don't recall. Would you name them again?

Mr. MORRIS. Once again: China Today, do you recall whether that was in the IPR library?

Mr. FIELD. It probably was.

Mr. MORRIS. It should have been?

Mr. FIELD. I imagine it was, and I would say "Yes" to that.

Mr. MORRIS. The articles there, under the name of Frederick Spencer, should have been in the IPR library?

Mr. FIELD. You would have to rephrase that question. I am not sure how you are asking the question.

Mr. MORRIS. Should not the articles there by Frederick Spencer have been in the IPR library?

Mr. FIELD. Presumably all of the contents of China Today were in the library, if the magazine was.

Mr. MORRIS. Was the publication New Masses in the library?

Mr. FIELD. That I don't recall.

Mr. MORRIS. As national secretary, you do not recall whether or not the library of the IPR will contain New Masses?

Mr. FIELD. We were building a fairly substantial library, and I don't recall that.

Mr. MORRIS. You were specializing in publications particularly on the Far East, were you not, and the New Masses frequently wrote on the far eastern policies?

Mr. FIELD. I really must answer I cannot recall whether it was there or not.

Mr. MORRIS. Was the publication The Communist in the library?

Mr. FIELD. I do not recall that, either.

Mr. MORRIS. Should it have been there?

Mr. FIELD. I would not have thought so, in the far eastern library. I don't know whether it was there or not.

Mr. MORRIS. Are the articles on far eastern problems?

Mr. FIELD. I imagine occasionally that there are such articles.

Mr. MORRIS. How about the Daily Worker; was that in the files of the library of the IPR?

Mr. FIELD. In that case, I should say almost definitely it was not, and I can see no reason why it should have been.

Mr. MORRIS. Were you a speaker at a Communist Political Association at San Francisco in the Palace Hotel on May 17, 1945?

Mr. FIELD. I decline to answer that question on the ground the answer may tend to incriminate me.

Mr. MORRIS. I show you a photostatic copy of an invitation called for a United Nations Conference presented by the Communist Political Association of San Francisco, Thursday, March 17, 1945, 8 p. m., concert room, Palace Hotel, and the speakers listed and the program listed here is Frederick V. Field, member of the executive committee of the American Council of the Institute of Pacific Relations, and correspondent for the New York Daily Worker. The other speaker is William Schneiderman, national vice president of the Communist Political Association, and also president of the California Chinese Political Association.

I offer that, Mr. Field, and ask you if you have ever seen it before?

Mr. FIELD. I decline to answer, Mr. Morris, on the ground the answer may tend to incriminate me.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to introduce that into the record.

The CHAIRMAN. It is inserted in the record.

(The document referred to was marked "Exhibit No. 11" and is as follows:)

EXHIBIT No. 11

You are invited to hear a panel of speakers on the United Nations Conference, presented by the Communist Political Association of San Francisco, Thursday, May 17, 1945, 8 p.m., at concert room, Palace Hotel.

Communist Political Association of San Francisco.

Offices: Suite 701, Garfield Building, 942 Market Street, San Francisco 2, Calif. Phone EXbrook 2996.

PROGRAM

Frederick V. Field, member, executive committee, American Council, Institute of Pacific Relations, correspondent, New York Daily Worker.

A. Simones, editor, Nord Rouge, Northern France Industrial Area Daily.

William Schneiderman, national vice president, Communist Political Association. President, California Communist Political Association.

Chairman, Oleta Yates, president, Communist Political Association of San Francisco.

This panel of distinguished speakers is presented by the Communist Political Association of San Francisco to contribute to public information and understanding of world security.

They will discuss various aspects of the United Nations Conference for International Organization, its progress, problems, and perspectives.

There will be opportunity for the audience to ask questions from the floor.

Admission is by invitation only.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Field, I would like to show you a photostatic reproduction of an article, and I am going to ask you if you will look at it.

Mr. FIELD. Do you want me to read it?

Mr. MORRIS. Read it and tell us what it is.

Mr. FIELD. It is a photostat of an article.

Mr. MORRIS. In what publication?

Mr. FIELD. It is not indicated—yes, it is, Political Affairs.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you read the last sentence, and who wrote the article, commencing on page 60?

Mr. FIELD. Would you clarify that question, Mr. Morris? Do you want to know what name appears here?

Mr. MORRIS. What name appears on that article as the author of that article?

Mr. FIELD. The name is Frederick V. Field.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you read the last sentence?

Mr. FIELD (reading):

It is our task as American Communists to help mobilize the forces of labor and all anti-imperialists in our country, and deal further blows at Wall Street, so that the Chinese new democracy may consolidate its victories and move firmly and powerfully on the road toward socialism.

Mr. MORRIS. That is all.

(The document referred to was marked "Exhibit No. 12" and is as follows:)

EXHIBIT NO. 12

This is the concluding page of an article by Frederick V. Field, published in the January 1949 issue of Political Affairs and entitled "The Meaning of the Chinese Revolutionary Victories":

74 POLITICAL AFFAIRS

union movement destroyed by Chiang Kai-shek. Already, in Harbin, in August 1948, an All-China Trade Union Conference laid the foundation for such a development. From this conference its chairman, Liu Ning-Yi, spoke out to the organized working people of America. He said:

Let there be greater solidarity between the Chinese and American working class. Support the war of liberation of the Chinese people. Oppose the aggressive policy and the antilabor, antipeople policy of American imperialism. Oppose the reviving of Japanese fascism by the American Government. Oppose the American policy of helping the slaughter of the Chinese people. Let the workers and people of China and the United States unite! Let us hold fast to our posts and defend democracy and world peace![1]

A special responsibility devolves upon American Communists. The China issue presents a signal opportunity to deal a mighty blow at the fortress of world reaction. The opportunity and the power exist to smash American imperialist plans for China. Under the leadership of the great Communist Party of China and its renowned chairman, Mao Tse-tung, the heroic Chinese people are discharging their duties with honor. The imperialists are being decisively beaten back in China. It is our task, as American Communists, to help mobilize the forces of labor and all anti-imperialists in our country, to deal such further blows at Wall Street, that the Chinese new democracy may consolidate its victories and move firmly and powerfully on the road toward socialism!

[1] Liu Ning-Yi, chairman, in a letter from the All-American Trade Union Conference in answer to greetings from 130 American trade-unionists. Harbin, August 1948, received November 1948.

The magazine Political Affairs was formerly known as the Communist.

Senator O'CONOR. Could I ask a question?

Mr. Field, in view of this series of questions, there is just one fact regarding the knowledge on the part of others concerning your views and philosophies.

For example, you have stated that from 1928, Mr. Edward C. Carter was in close association with you. If you recall, you mentioned the invitation to become the Assistant Secretary at the time that Dr. Yen, on the subject of the discussion of illiteracy—was Mr. Carter in close association with you continuously from that time until 1942, when you were invited or under consideration for a commission in the Army?

Mr. FIELD. If I may put it the other way around, I was in close association with Mr. Carter, that would be correct.

Senator O'CONOR. Yes, that probably is more nearly correct.

Mr. FIELD. Except the terminal point would be earlier; it would be the fall of 1940.

Senator O'CONOR. 1940?

Mr. FIELD. Yes.

Senator O'CONOR. It is a fair assumption, then, for one to draw, that he was quite familiar with your views and ideologies?

Mr. FIELD. I would think so.

Senator O'CONOR. Would the same be true of Owen Lattimore?

Mr. FIELD. To a much less extent.

Senator O'CONOR. But, nevertheless, to some degree?

Mr. FIELD. To some degree. We were colleagues in the same organization.

Senator O'CONOR. Colleagues in the same organization?

Mr. FIELD. Yes.

Senator O'CONOR. So that when he endorsed or took steps concerning your obtention of the commission, he was familiar with your views?

Mr. FIELD. To some extent; yes.

Senator O'CONOR. And would the same be true, to a lesser extent, possibly, of Lauchlin Currie?

Mr. FIELD. No. As I think I testified, to the best of my recollection I had never met Lauchlin Currie at that time.

Senator O'CONOR. Was Mr. William T. Stone familiar with your views and philosophies?

Mr. FIELD. Well, as I believe I testified, our association had been through his being a staff member of the Foreign Policy Association, and I in the IPR, and the two organizations working in somewhat similar fields, and I would see him occasionally, and we weren't particularly close.

Senator O'CONOR. Now, the only other question, Mr. Field, I would like to ask you, is this: You have previously testified that at one point during the consideration of the application for the Army commission, it was blocked or it was stopped, or some impediment occurred.

Mr. FIELD. Yes.

Senator O'CONOR. Did Mr. Carter or Mr. Lattimore or Mr. Field learn of that development, of the fact that there had been——

Mr. FIELD. The last name——

Senator O'CONOR. Mr. Stone, I meant.

Mr. FIELD. Mr. Carter and Mr. Stone and Mr. Lattimore, you mean, did they learn of this?

Senator O'CONOR. Yes.

Mr. FIELD. It is my recollection that I went immediately to Mr. Carter, to inform him of it; and I think, and I am almost certain, to ask him to do anything he possibly could to break the jam.

Senator O'CONOR. And similarly, according to the correspondence, Mr. Lattimore?

Mr. FIELD. Presumably so.

Senator O'CONOR. Did they, upon learning of that development, still persist in their efforts to have you appointed or be given a commission by the Army, in Intelligence?

I would advise, if you would, you answer me.

Mr. FIELD. I wanted to put it differently. I would put it they were all interested in seeing if the jam could be broken.

Senator O'CONOR. In other words, my point is, did they continue their efforts?

Mr. FIELD. I can speak with certainty about Mr. Carter, because I remember he did; and the evidence is Mr. Lattimore did; and I can't speak about the others.

Senator EASTLAND. I want to ask a question. Do you know Dr. Philip Jessup?

Mr. FIELD. Yes; I do.

Senator EASTLAND. How long have you known Dr. Jessup?

Mr. FIELD. I met him through the Institute of Pacific Relations, and I believe I went into it before he did, and I am not perfectly certain of that, and let me say roughly, Senator, it would be the early thirties, or maybe 1930, or something like that. I am not perfectly certain as to the date.

Senator EASTLAND. You have been closely associated with him, have you not?

Mr. FIELD. No. I was associated with him in the sense of a staff member, of the association between a staff member and an officer of the organization with whom you are only in occasional contact.

Senator EASTLAND. When did you resign from your position in the Institute of Pacific Relations?

Mr. FIELD. It was in the fall, as I said, of 1940.

Senator EASTLAND. Did Dr. Jessup attempt to get you to remain in that position?

Mr. FIELD. I think it is quite possible. I am not sure whether he was chairman of the council or not, and I think it is very possible that he did try, and I think that there were several people that tried to persuade me to change my mind.

Senator EASTLAND. Now, Dr. Jessup was acquainted with your political background and political affiliations, was he not?

Mr. FIELD. I don't know what the implications of your remarks are, Senator, and it is hard to answer. He knew me as a staff member in an organization of which he was an officer.

Senator EASTLAND. But now, he knew your political affiliations, did he not?

Mr. FIELD. I don't know what political affiliations you refer to, Senator, so it is hard for me to answer.

Senator EASTLAND. You know your political affiliations, Mr. Field.

Mr. FIELD. What Mr. Jessup knew about me is something that I find it very difficult to testify to, and I can testify to the relationship we had.

Senator EASTLAND. Well, in your judgment, now, he knew your political affiliations, did he not?

Mr. FIELD. I imagine he made his own judgment.

Senator EASTLAND. You would say, in your judgment, now, in your judgment he knew your political affiliations?

Mr. FIELD. I find it impossible to give an intelligent answer to that question, Senator.

Mr. MORRIS. I would like to offer into evidence a statement signed by Phillip C. Jessup, chairman of the board of trustees of the American Council, Institute of Pacific Relations, dated June 28, 1940, and this is a memorandum to the board of trustees, and I would like to read the last paragraph, because I think that this is Senator Eastland's point.

> At this time the staff wish to express their appreciation of the leadership which Mr. Field has given to the American Council in the past. We consider that it is in the best interest of the American Council that Mr. Field should remain as closely associated with it as possible. We therefore should like to see him continue as secretary of the council, exercising the maximum amount of guidance and determination of policy consistent with his desire to be relieved of the burden of administrative work and financial promotion.

I would like to introduce that into evidence and mark it as exhibit No. 13.

The CHAIRMAN. It may be inserted in the record and so marked.

EXHIBIT No. 13

AMERICAN COUNCIL,
INSTITUTE OF PACIFIC RELATIONS, INC.,
New York City, June 28, 1940.

OFFICERS

Philip C. Jessup, chairman
Miss Ada L. Comstock, vice chairman
Benjamin H. Kizer, vice chairman
Philo W. Parker, vice chairman
Robert Gordon Sproul, vice chairman
Ray Lyman Wilbur, vice chairman
Frederick V. Field, secretary
Francis S. Harmon, treasurer
Miss Hilda Austern, assistant treasurer

To the Board of Trustees:

In transmitting Mr. Field's report of the reorganization of the American Council, involving a drastic reduction of its budget, I should like to let you know that Mr. Field's tactful and sincere handling of the problem has carried us through a crisis with less damage than an outsider would have believed possible. The staff's cooperation in this most unfortunate contraction which the financial situation made unavoidable is a tribute to it and to the unusual abilities of Mr. Field. He and the staff built up a spirit in the organization which has proved that it can withstand a hard blow. The spirit is still there and the job of the American Council is still to be done with your help.

It is not possible, in my opinion, to refuse Mr. Field's request that he be freed from the administrative and financial routine of the office. But, since I share the view of the staff as expressed in a letter from Miss Farley of the staff to the executive committee, I cannot acquiesce in his complete separation from the direction of the affairs of the American Council. I have, therefore, appointed him staff adviser with the understanding that he is to be on leave without salary for the next 6 months. Miss Farley's letter included the following resolution of the entire staff:

"At this time the staff wishes to express their appreciation of the leadership which Mr. Field has given to the American Council in the past. We consider that it is in the best interests of the American Council that Mr.

Field should remain as closely associated with it as possible. We should therefore like to see him continue as secretary of the council, exercising the maximum amount of guidance in the determination of policy consistent with his desire to be relieved of the burden of administrative work and financial promotion."

Sincerely yours,

PHILIP C. JESSUP, Chairman.

Mr. MORRIS. I would like to introduce into the record the minutes of the executive committee of the American Council of the Institute of Pacific Relations, 5 p. m., September 18, 1940; present: Philip C. Jessup, chairman, Philo Parker, Francis Harmon, and Edward C. Carter; together with a telegram from Frederick V. Field, from Chicago, dated September 1, 1940, to Philip C. Jessup. I would like to introduce both of these into the record as the next exhibit and have them so marked.

The CHAIRMAN. They may be so marked and inserted in the record.

EXHIBIT No. 14

MINUTES OF A MEETING OF THE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE, AMERICAN COUNCIL OF THE INSTITUTE OF PACIFIC RELATIONS

Held at 5 p. m., Thursday, September 18, 1949, 129 East Fifty-second Street, New York City.

Present: Philip C. Jessup, chairman; Philo W. Parker; Francis E. Harmon; Edward C. Carter.

(1) Letters of comment and telegrams of regret were received from the two absent members, Prof. Joseph P. Chamberlain in Washington, and President Ada Comstock in Boston.

(2) The chairman read a long telegram which he had received from Mr. Frederick V. Field in Chicago on September 1, in which Mr. Field indicated that he had been called to the secretaryship of a new society which was being created to strengthen the forces of democracy during the coming critical years. He had a deep conviction that he was obligated to accept this new responsibility because the election of officers was taking place at that time. He felt it was necessary to accept despite his obvious personal preference to postpone decision pending consultation with Dr. Jessup and others. As he anticipated criticism and misunderstanding, his continued deep interest in the welfare of the Institute of Pacific Relations demanded, he felt, the affirmation of his immediate resignation from all IPR responsibilities. Dr. Jessup explained that he had subsequently talked at length with Mr. Field who explained in detail the reasons that had lead him to accept the new position. Mr. Parker voiced the feelings of all present when he inquired whether Dr. Jessup felt that Mr. Field could not be persuaded to resume the secretaryship of the American Council. Dr. Jessup replied that he thought Mr. Field's decision was final. Under the circumstances it was moved that a minute be drafted indicating the committee's acceptance of the resignation with great regret. The minute should include an appropriate appreciation of the distinguished service which Mr. Field had rendered during 11 years of service with the American council. The hope was to be expressed that when his new task was completed, it would be possible for him to resume active leadership in the work of the American Council.

(3) Dr. Jessup then invited the attention of the committee to the question of Mr. Field's successor. Mr. Field himself had considered a large number of names in consultation with others. He had finally informed Dr. Jessup that of all those considered, he thought Mr. Harry B. Price was the best fitted for the secretaryship of the American Council. The committee went over a long list of names, considering various possibilities from many angles. Finally the committee came to the conclusion that Mr. Price was the most promising of all.

(4) After further discussion, the committee voted to authorize Mr. Carter to offer the secretaryship of the American Council to Mr. Price (but not until hearing from Dr. Wilbur). If Dr. Wilbur strongly dissented, the matter should be referred back to the executive committee.

(5) It was voted to increase the American Council budget so as to make it possible to offer Mr. Price a salary of $5,200 a year. Mr. Carter was to explain to Mr. Price that at the present time the finances of the American Council would not permit of a larger salary, but that when the financial situation improved the committee would recommend that the salary be fixed at $6,000.

(6) Mr. Francis E. Harmon, the treasurer, explained that he had accepted the treasurership as a stopgap, that he felt that the position required a man of commanding leadership in business or industry, and that he hoped that the committee would shortly find a new treasurer of the required qualifications in his place. The chairman assured Mr. Harmon of the committee's appreciation of his position and also of the invaluable service he had rendered already as treasurer. The committee would, however, take Mr. Harmon at his word and would relieve him if and when a more suitable candidate became available.

(7) With reference to the date of the board of trustees meeting, Mr. Carter reported that he had asked Dr. Wilbur to suggest a time in October or November when he would be in the East and free to attend a meeting. It was hoped that Dr. Wilbur's reply would permit of the fixing of the date for the meeting of the trustees.

(8) Owing to lack of time it was proposed that other items on the agenda be postponed until the next meeting. These had to do with proposals regarding the interrelation of the Far Eastern Survey, Inparel and a proposed news bulletin, with the starting of regional groups, and with the development of a Latin-American research center.

TELEGRAM FROM FREDERICK V. FIELD FROM CHICAGO, SEPTEMBER 1, 1940, TO PHILIP C. JESSUP

I have been attending a peace congress of some 6,000 representatives from all parts of the country, labor, farm, and middle-class organizations. This is a genuine peace movement through the interpretation of democracy. These people and our program represent what I have for long profoundly believed in. They are asking me to become the executive of a continuing organization, and I feel a deep conviction that I must accept. As the people I should be working for will meet to elect officers tomorrow, I must, despite obvious personal preference to postpone decision pending consultation with you and others, and as the executive must be presented to them, make an immediate affirmative decision. This show has been and will be smeared by the newspapers. I anticipate losing the respect of many present friends. These developments I regard as inevitable if we do the job in this country that was not done in France, etc. In view the inevitable criticism and misunderstanding, and because of my continued deep interest in the IPR welfare, I feel that I must, by this telegram, affirm my immediate resignation from all the IPR responsibilities that its officers wish to accept. Finally I must urgently hope for both personal and professional associations that you will reserve your own judgment until I can talk with you.

F. V. FIELD.

Mr. MORRIS. I would like to read one particular part of it here. I am reading now in the middle of the first paragraph:

Dr. Jessup explained that he had subsequently talked at length with Mr. Field, who explained in detail the reasons that had led him to accept the new position.

And what new position is that, Mr. Field, could you tell us?

Mr. FIELD. No; I decline to answer that on the ground that the answer may be self-incriminating.

Mr. MORRIS. That is, in connection with the previous correspondence, the previous part of the letter shows it is in connection with the American Peace Mobilization.

Mr. Parker voiced the feeling of all present when he inquired whether Dr. Jessup felt that Mr. Field could not be persuaded to resume the secretaryship of the American Council. Dr. Jessup replied that he thought Mr. Field's decision was final. Under the circumstances, it was moved that a minute be drafted, indicating the committee's acceptance of the resignation, with deep regret. The minute should include an appropriate appreciation of the distinguished service which Mr. Field had rendered during the 11 years of service with the American Council. The hope was to be expressed, though, when his new task was completed, it would be possible for him to resume active leadership in the work of the American Council.

I would like Mr. Mandel to put into the record all those documents that I made reference to during the series of questions on Mr. Field's writings from 1935 down to 1950.

The CHAIRMAN. All right, Mr. Mandel.

Let us proceed.

Mr. MANDEL. They have been compiled under my direction.

The CHAIRMAN. They may be marked as one exhibit, and then designated.

Mr. MORRIS. It may be that we will finish with Mr. Field, and I wonder if he could come back here at 2 o'clock for a 15- or 20-minute session.

The CHAIRMAN. Two-thirty.

Mr. MORRIS. We have another witness at 2:30.

Mr. RABINOWITZ. Is it possible to clear it up now? There is the problem of getting Mr. Field back to New York, and from the point of view of his physical condition.

The CHAIRMAN. I would think he would rather stay here.

Mr. RABINOWITZ. I don't know. This is more pleasant than perhaps some other places.

Mr. MORRIS. I think, Mr. Chairman, as far as I am concerned, we can let Mr. Field go until some other time when he is more free to come down here.

Mr. RABINOWITZ. We would appreciate that very much.

The CHAIRMAN. I would like to make a little observation here.

Because there has been some misunderstanding about the rule laid down yesterday concerning pictures, television, radio, and so forth, it might be well to make it clear on the record that television cameramen have the same privileges as moving-picture or news photo cameramen with respect to taking pictures before or after the committee sessions, and that these privileges are subject to the important condition previously stated, namely, that pictures are not to be taken of a witness in the hearing room without the permission of the witness. No one need have his picture taken here unless he consents to it.

We will stand in recess until 2:30.

(Whereupon, at 12:45 p. m., a recess was taken until 2:30 p. m., of the same day.)

AFTER RECESS

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will come to order.

TESTIMONY OF EDWARD C. CARTER, NEW YORK, N. Y.—Resumed

The CHAIRMAN. You may proceed, Mr. Morris. Mr. Carter is on the stand, and he has been sworn. You may proceed with your examination.

Mr. MORRIS. Do you know Vladimir Rogov?

Mr. CARTER. Yes; I have known him for a number of years, as a Tass correspondent, formerly as a student in Moscow.

Mr. MORRIS. Did you know that he was the Soviet writer who wrote the article in a Communist publication in Moscow, the War and the Working Class, that signalized a change in Communist policy from support of Chiang Kai-shek to that of opposition to Chiang Kai-shek in August of 1943?

Mr. CARTER. I don't remember it.

Mr. MORRIS. Do you recall that article?

Mr. CARTER. I do not.

Mr. MORRIS. Do you recall, Mr. Carter, that at that time the Communist Party line called for all-out support of Chiang Kai-shek?

Mr. CARTER. That I remember very definitely.

Mr. MORRIS. Do you recall some time after August of 1943, the Communist Party line changed; instead of supporting Chiang Kai-shek, they began to undermine him?

Mr. CARTER. That I didn't know. My impression was they supported him for a much longer period, but I don't read Communist documents, and there is always the possibility that they might announce one policy but continue another.

Mr. MORRIS. Wasn't that your function as a far eastern expert, Mr. Carter, to have observed these changes?

Mr. CARTER. As I have said, Senator, my impression was, wholly apart from what may have been written, that the Soviet Government continued support of Chiang Kai-shek for considerably longer.

Mr. MORRIS. For how much longer?

Mr. CARTER. And with more suspicion of Mao Tse-tung and Communists than of Chiang Kai-shek.

Mr. MORRIS. Who was more suspicious?

Mr. CARTER. The Kremlin.

Mr. MORRIS. It is your testimony that the Kremlin was suspicious of Mao Tse-tung?

Mr. CARTER. They certainly were, and I think they thought he was getting too strong.

Mr. MORRIS. Was there anything ever written to that effect, Mr. Carter?

Mr. CARTER. I don't remember.

Mr. MORRIS. Do you remember when Vladimir Rogov, as I said, who did write this article, in the War and the Working Class, signalizing the change in policy of the Soviet policy toward Chiang Kai-shek from one of support to one of undermining, do you remember he came to the United States early in 1944?

Mr. CARTER. I do. I have forgotten the year, and I know he came during the year on his way to London to join the London office of Tass.

Mr. MORRIS. Now, I would like to introduce into the record, or show you at this time, this article by Vladimir Rogov, and it is reprinted from the Soviet trade-union periodical, The War and the Working Class, and I am showing you a photostatic copy of the editorial page of the Daily Worker of Thursday, August 12, 1943.

I offer that to you, Mr. Carter.

Mr. CARTER. Not being a subscriber or a reader of the Daily Worker, this is the first time I have seen this.

Mr. MORRIS. Were you at all acquainted with that particular article?

Mr. CARTER. I was not.

Mr. MORRIS. You see, the article, even though it is reprinted in the Daily Worker, did appear in the War and the Working Class.

Mr. CARTER. That is apparent from the authenticity of the photostat.

Mr. MORRIS. I would like to offer that into evidence as the next exhibit and have it properly marked.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be inserted in the record and properly marked.

[From Daily Worker, New York, August 12, 1943]

EDITORIALS and COMMENT—SOVIET EXPERT WARNS of APPEASERS in CHINA

(By Vladimir Rogov)

(Reprinted from the Soviet trade union periodical The War and the Working Class)

(By wireless to Inter-Continent News)

MOSCOW, August 11.—During the 6 years of war the Chinese command at the cost of considerable territorial losses, succeeded in saving its troops from defeat. Despite the numerous odds the Chinese Army preserved its capacity for resistance.

The Japanese militarists failed in their plan for a rapid conquest of China. The Japanese proved incapable of breaking the resistance of the Chinese people and bringing them to their knees. The war against China became clearly drawn out, threatening Japan with ever-growing complications.

In defensive battles on an extremely long front the Chinese Army, weakening the Japanese troops, gained the necessary time for reorganizing its troops and strengthening their fighting capacity. Soon after the fall of Wuhan (Hankow) in October, 1938, Chiang Kai-shek outlined a program for the reorganization of the country's armed forces, whose principal points were as follows:

Firstly, China's national policy must become the policy of a long, defensive war.

Secondly, the necessity to develop the guerrilla movement.

Thirdly, for conducting a general counteroffensive it is necessary to create a new, many millions strong army, trained in the use of the most up-to-date war equipment.

Covert Opposition

However, from the outset the intentions of the commander in chief of the Chinese Army, Chiang Kai-shek, met with covert resistance.

Three years have passed since then. The reforms in the army with the aim of training new cadres, reorganizing control and strengthening discipline were not completed, and the task of the creation of their own war economic base was not accomplished. The main reason for this is the diverse work of the appeasers, the defeatists and capitulators.

The war economy resources of National China (Free China) are tremendous and afford an adequate base for the rearmament and supply of the massed army. On its territory National China has all the strategic war materials necessary for the conduct of a prolonged war.

Nevertheless, large-scale construction has not been undertaken since the industrial and financial circles prefer to engage in profiteering rather than invest their capital in the armaments industry.

The unrestrained profiteers advanced the "theories" that the people are weary of war and that it is primarily necessary to satisfy the demand of the population for goods, etc.

This situation leads to the weakening of the army's fighting capacity and greater dependence on the supply of armaments from the United States and Great Britain, which however has encountered serious difficulties since the beginning of the Japanese war against the United States and Great Britain.

The elements favoring capitulation have sabotaged the measures for mobilizing the internal resources with the object of creating their own war economy base, as well as the measures for extending economic warfare against the Japanese invaders.

No Regular Reinforcements

China has no lack of human reserves, but the Chinese Army nevertheless receives no regular reinforcements. There are insufficient trained reserves. There is not even an organized military registration of the population. To this day the law on universal military service is not fully carried out. The army receives a large percentage of men unfit for service.

The main defect of the Chinese Army is the shortage of trained commanding personnel. All foreign military observers who have visited the Chinese Army agree that the Chinese soldier is tenacious and enduring in the field and is unpretentious as far as food and uniforms are concerned; whereas the commanding personnel is extremely weak and backward in military and technical training.

The army's equipment is still at low level. The organization and control of troops are far from perfect. One of the defects of the Chinese Army is the lack of an effective united command and of coordinated operations on the separate fronts. The internal friction and suspicion among the generals could not but affect the fighting capacity of the troops and their discipline.

In Chungking, of course, there are no open advocates of surrender, but this does not mean that there is a lack of capitulators and defeatists there.

The capitulators and defeatists who occupy important positions in the Kuomintang weaken the strength of China by their harmful political intrigues and constitute a serious danger at present.

Since December 1941 the Japanese have centered their attention on the war in the Pacific. The war in China has receded to the background. This has led to the appearance among Chinese military and political leaders of a certain complacency of which the Japanese imperialists took advantage to intensify their "peace offensive."

JAPANESE MACHINATIONS

The Japanese conquerors are now concentrating on deepening and sharpening the internal contradictions in China and are trying in every way to utilize these contradictions to weaken China and strengthen their positions in the struggle against China.

These Japanese plans profit from the maneuvers of the Chinese appeasers, who provoke conflicts and incidents up to armed clashes, do their utmost to undermine the military collaboration of Kuomintang circles with the Communist Party and incite the persecution and rout of the Eighth and Fourth Armies, which as units of China's united national army have inscribed many heroic pages in the history of the resistance of the Chinese people to the Japanese invaders.

These armies consist of the most progressive, tenacious and selfless people of China. They are led by the Chinese Communist Party which enjoys merited prestige among the broad masses of the working people as the organizer of their struggle for national freedom and independence.

Today by direct military pressure new attempts are being made to bring about the dissolution of the Chinese Communist Party and the liquidation of the Eighth and Fourth Armies. The Chinese command has transferred new divisions to the districts where these armies are stationed, with tremendous supplies of munitions and food, obviously in preparation for an attack on the Eighth and Fourth Armies with the aim of liquidating them even at the price of unleashing civil war.

Such an attack of the Chungking generals on the Eighth and Fourth Armies which, moreover, is completely unprovoked by these armies, would be a treacherous stabbing in the back of the Chinese people and play into the hands of the Japanese imperialists who could hope for nothing better.

A number of outstanding Kuomintang leaders oppose such treacherous activities of all sorts of appeasers, capitulators and provocateurs. The Chinese Government, nevertheless, does not exert firmness in overcoming the activities of the capitulators designed to undermine national unity and weaken China's resistance against Japanese aggression.

EYEWITNESS ACCOUNT

In the last few years I have had occasion to visit more than 15 provinces of China. Both on the front and in the deep rear, in occupied Shanghai and Manchukuo, representatives of various circles of China watch with grave concern the criminal activity of the traitors, turncoats, defeatists and saboteurs. Nevertheless they are unanimous in their confidence that all the plans to provoke civil war are doomed to failure since National China, in hard fighting, has accumulated much strength and will not permit the great national liberation cause of the Chinese people to die.

With inexhaustible strategic raw material resources and tremendous manpower reserves at its disposal, China has every possibility for victory over the enemy. The necessary conditions for this victory are the realization of radical measures for reorganizing the entire economy on a war footing, subordinating all economic life to the needs of the front and strengthening the armed forces against capitulation and defeatest moods, and most important, the genuine unity of all national forces in the struggle for freedom and national independence.

On the extent to which Chiang Kai-shek and the Chungking leading circles will understand the importance of this principal condition and succeed in averting the danger of internal struggle in China, tortured by the enemies of the Chinese people—the inevitable consequence of which would be measures directed against the eighth and fourth armies and the Communist Party—rests whether the exhausting war forced upon the Chinese people by Japanese imperialism will be brought to a successful conclusion in the interests of the whole Chinese people.

Mr. CARTER. If I may, Mr. Chairman, if there is an extra copy of that, I would like to read it so as to get up to date on Communist writings, as Mr. Morris has implied I should have.

Mr. MORRIS. We will see an extra copy is made for you, Mr. Carter.

Now, you can recall that Mr. Rogov came to the United States in 1944?

Mr. CARTER. Oh, yes.

Mr. MORRIS. Did you take him to introduce him to important Government officials in Washington?

Mr. CARTER. Yes, I did. I introduced him to some of my colleagues in the IPR, from Canada and the United States and China, and so on, and I had a feeling, Senator——

The CHAIRMAN. Now, listen to the question. It says "important public officials in Washington."

Mr. CARTER. I did.

Mr. MORRIS. I would like to show you a photostatic copy of a telegram that you sent to Alger Hiss, Department of State, dated January 17, 1944, and ask you if you can recall sending that telegram to Mr. Hiss?

Mr. CARTER. I take it that it isn't a very good photostatic job, and I can't read what it says, but just give me a minute, if I may.

The CHAIRMAN. Take your time.

Mr. MORRIS. This may be easier to read, Mr. Carter.

Mr. CARTER. That recalls that I sent the telegram.

Mr. MORRIS. This telegram, Mr. Chairman, reads:

My friend Vladimir Rogoff, Tass correspondent, en route Moscow to London. Will be Washington Wednesday, Thursday, Friday. Knows Chinese language, been China 5 years, was in Shanghai following Pearl Harbor until last March. Perhaps you, Hornbeck, would enjoy meeting him. If so please communicate Tass, Washington.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the date, and who was the addressee?

Mr. MORRIS. January 17, 1944, to Alger Hiss, State Department, Washington, D. C.

I would like to offer that into evidence.

The CHAIRMAN. As to what the word "Tass" means, I think might be explained.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you explain to us what "Tass" was?

Mr. CARTER. I think Tass is the official news, or international news agency at least, of the Soviet Government, and it represents Soviet policy, and it is even more a government press agency than Reuters in England or Havas in France.

Mr. MORRIS. Anyone representing Tass would be a reliable Communist, in your opinion?

Mr. CARTER. So long as he held his job, the Kremlin would think he was reliable.

Department of State,
Washington, D. C.:

My friend, Vladimir Rogoff, Tass correspondent, en route Moscow to London. Will be Washington Wednesday, Thursday, Friday. Knows Chinese language; been China 5 years; was in Shanghai following Pearl Harbor until last March. Perhaps you, Hornbeck, would enjoy meeting him. If so please communicate Tass, Washington.

EDWARD C. CARTER.

Mr. MORRIS. I would like to offer you a similar telegram, Mr. Carter, this one being addressed to Lauchlin Currie, Foreign Economic Administration, Temporary T Building, Washington, D. C., January 17, 1944, and I will ask you if you can recall sending that telegram?

Mr. CARTER. It is practically identical with the other telegram, and it has hand scratchings on it that makes me quite sure that I sent it.

Mr. MORRIS. I would like to have that introduced into the record and properly marked as the next exhibit.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, these markings on here, you do not place any significance on that, Mr. Morris?

Mr. MORRIS. I don't mean to place any significance on that, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The witness called them hand scratchings, and so I wanted to get them designated.

(The document referred to was marked "Exhibit No. 18" and is as follows:)

EXHIBIT No. 18

JANUARY 17, 1944

LAUCHLIN CURRIE,
Foreign Economic Administration,
Temporary T Building, Washington, D. C.:

My friend, Vladimir Rogoff, Tass correspondent en route Moscow to London. Will be Washington Wednesday, Thursday, Friday. Knows Chinese language; been China 5 years; was in Shanghai following Pearl Harbor until last March. Perhaps you would enjoy meeting him. If so please communicate Tass, Washington.

EDWARD C. CARTER.

Mr. MORRIS. Why did you select Alger Hiss and Lauchlin Currie to introduce Rogov around Washington?

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Alger Hiss was at that time, I think, secretary to Stanley Hornbeck, the Chief of the Far Eastern Division, and as Hornbeck undoubtedly was interested, not only in the total China situation but the impact of Russian views on the situation, I thought it would be helpful, if Hornbeck desired it, to get from Rogov a definitely 100 percent Soviet Communist reaction to what was going on.

I ought to add that in my view, Rogov had a particular qualification in that (1) his English was perfect, and (2) his son had been at the American school in Shanghai, and he knew a good deal about American psychology; and also, he had a sense of humor like a good newspaperman, and you could josh him and say, "Now, you know that doesn't strike foreigners very well." And I thought as the Government was trying to get information and different points of view, that it would be useful for Rogov to see Hornbeck.

Mr. MORRIS. May I break in for a minute? May I ask why you sent him to Alger Hiss, if you wanted him to see Hornbeck?

Mr. CARTER. Because Hiss, as Hornbeck's secretary, sat in his outer office and made appointments for him, and I don't know whether he determined who Hornbeck should see; and in the event that Hornbeck had to be out of Washington at that time, I thought probably Hornbeck's assistant secretary, Hiss, would be the best channel in case Hornbeck should want a memorandum on what Rogov had to say.

Mr. MORRIS. Didn't you testify, Mr. Carter, that Hornbeck was a friend of yours, and you knew him very well?

Mr. CARTER. I did.

Mr. MORRIS. Why didn't you send him to Hornbeck?

Mr. CARTER. I thought this was the most courteous way for a humble private citizen to approach really a very important figure, the Chief of the Far Eastern Division.

Mr. MORRIS. Did you know Alger Hiss very well at that time, Mr. Carter?

Mr. CARTER. Not nearly as well as I knew Hornbeck.

Mr. MORRIS. And yet you chose to send this telegram to Hiss to have Rogov meet Hornbeck, rather than to send Hiss down directly to your good friend Hornbeck?

Mr. CARTER. You mean send Rogov?

Mr. MORRIS. Yes.

Mr. CARTER. I chose it, and I don't suppose I debated it for hours, and I thought it was a natural approach to Hornbeck.

Mr. MORRIS. What position did Lauchlin Currie have at that time?

Mr. CARTER. I feel quite certain, as I said yesterday, that he was executive secretary to the President; and as I said yesterday, he was handling a certain amount of Chinese affairs for the President, and he was a man who traveled all over China, and he was—

The CHAIRMAN. He was in the White House at that time, was he not, as one of the assistants to the President?

Mr. CARTER. He was executive assistant to the President, on the White House telephone, in the White House offices.

Mr. MORRIS. At the same time, you knew Mr. Currie was also active in IPR, is that right, Mr. Carter?

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Currie, I think—I am not certain—my impression is—

The CHAIRMAN. I think the question calls for a "Yes" or "No" answer, Mr. Morris.

Mr. MORRIS. You understood that Mr. Currie had been active with IPR up until that time?

Mr. CARTER. I didn't understand it, because I don't believe it is a fact.

Mr. MORRIS. Had Mr. Currie been a member of the IPR conference in 1942?

Mr. CARTER. He had.

Mr. MORRIS. Didn't he have the chairmanship of one of the groups at that conference?

Mr. CARTER. No.

Mr. MORRIS. What is your recollection?

Mr. CARTER. My recollection is that he was a member of the American group, and I do not remember that he had any special status, and I could not remember that he was a member of the IPR. Some people went to conferences as members of the group without being members of the institute, and that I would have to look up.

Mr. MORRIS. You know he was a member of the board of trustees?

Mr. CARTER. Much later, and not all after he left Government service.

Mr. MORRIS. You do know he had an official position at the Mont Tremblant conference?

Mr. CARTER. He was one of 40 Americans, mostly non-Government officials, with the exception of Senator J. A. Thomas, who was a member of the group.

Mr. MORRIS. Was Alger Hiss active in IPR affairs?

Mr. CARTER. Never during his position in the State Department. After he joined the Carnegie Endowment, he became a member of the board of trustees.

Mr. MORRIS. You say he never while he was in the State Department?

Mr. CARTER. He was never on the board when he was in the State Department.

Mr. MORRIS. He was active in IPR affairs?

Mr. CARTER. No. He cooperated, as scores of Washington officials and Congressmen and Senators cooperated.

Mr. MORRIS. I would like to show you, Mr. Carter, a letter that you wrote to Alger Hiss, dated February 5, 1947. You wrote to him at the Carnegie Endowment, and you say here:

DEAR ALGER: Yesterday at your suggestion I had a delightful and illuminating talk with Robert T. Miller, whom I hope to see again. He brought me the good news that you had succeeded Dr. Butler as president of the endowment. I hope this will mean frequent visits to New York, if not permanent residence.

I do hope that Columbia University will be as eminently successful in getting a successor for Dr. Butler as the endowment has been.

The next time you are in New York, I hope you will telephone me, for I would like to have you come along and see our shop. You have done so much for the IPR in cooperation and wise advice that I am hoping this fine relationship can continue in your new post where we have so many common interests and problems.

If you are to be in New York on the evening of February 24, I hope you can accept the enclosed invitation.

Sincerely yours,

EDWARD C. CARTER.

I offer you that, and I will see if you can remember.

Mr. CARTER. I recall it without looking at it, and if I may have the privilege, I will say a word of comment at the appropriate time.

Mr. MORRIS. May I ask a few questions, please. Who was Robert T. Miller?

Mr. CARTER. I don't remember.

Mr. MORRIS. Do you recall that Robert T. Miller was associated with the State Department?

Mr. CARTER. I don't.

Mr. MORRIS. Do you remember Robert T. Miller has, since February 5, 1947, been identified before a Senate congressional committee as a member of an espionage ring?

Mr. CARTER. I didn't know that, and when you read the letter, the only thing in the letter that I couldn't remember was who the dickens Robert Miller was.

Mr. MORRIS. You do not recall who Robert Miller was?

Mr. CARTER. If your files would show what was the subject of the conversation, the whole thing might come racing back.

Mr. MORRIS. I was going to ask you about it. You said that you had a "delightful and illuminating talk with Robert T. Miller, whom I hope to see again," and I am reading your letter.

Did you ever write a letter like that?

Mr. CARTER. I think that I would remember——

The CHAIRMAN. Now, wait a minute. Did you have this meeting with Mr. Miller?

Mr. CARTER. I say so, and I did.

The CHAIRMAN. You were undoubtedly stating a fact when you wrote that letter.

Mr. CARTER. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. By my recalling Robert Miller was in the State Department at that time, can you recall now that conversation?

Mr. CARTER. No; it is just a blank, I am sorry.

Mr. MORRIS. Do you know that Robert Miller has been identified before a congressional committee as a member of an espionage ring?

Mr. CARTER. I never remember hearing it until 2 minutes ago when you stated it.

Mr. MORRIS. Now, you say also in this letter: "You have done so much for the IPR in cooperation and wise advice," and will you tell us the extent of that cooperation and wise advice?

Mr. CARTER. Wasn't there another sentence, that "I wish you could come and visit our shop, our office"?

Mr. MORRIS. That is right.

Mr. CARTER. He never had been to the office, and he wasn't active enough to have come to the office. Repeatedly when I wanted to discuss with Dr. Hornbeck something, I would go along to the State Department office, and Hornbeck was behind on his schedule, and the receptionist would say, "Well, here is Mr. Hiss," and I would chat with him, and at that time he was, as you will remember, Senator, widely accepted as an efficient Government agent, and I would talk with him, whatever was to be my subject with Hornbeck, and then go in and see Hornbeck.

The CHAIRMAN. You were a frequent visitor at Hornbeck's office?

Mr. CARTER. I suppose I was a more frequent visitor at Hornbeck's office than any other official in State, War, Navy, or Treasury.

The CHAIRMAN. And you were a frequent visitor to Hiss' office, naturally?

Mr. CARTER. To the anteroom feature of it, and I saw Hornbeck much oftener than Hiss, because frequently Hiss would be somewhere away, and I would go in direct to Hornbeck.

Mr. MORRIS. Is it your testimony, again, that you cannot recall a conversation with Mr. Miller, or any other dealings with Mr. Miller?

Mr. CARTER. I can't recall it, and I would be interested in finding out what it was about, and whether I brushed him off or whether he had some serious thing.

Mr. MORRIS. You say that you had a long and "illuminating" talk with him, and so you obviously didn't brush him off.

Mr. CARTER. I may have brushed him off, but I give him——

The CHAIRMAN. You illuminatingly brushed him off?

Mr. CARTER. I doubt if I would have brushed off a man whom the new president of the Carnegie Endowment sent to me, whether it was with reference to a building—there was talk of taking a site over at the United Nations for the Foreign Policy Association and the IPR, and the Council of Foreign Relations, and so on, and it may have been real estate, and I haven't any idea.

Mr. MORRIS. Well, Mr. Mandel, will you at this point——

The CHAIRMAN. Just a moment.

Mr. Carter, was not Mr. Hiss assistant to Mr. Hornbeck, and you designate him as a secretary, and he was assistant on the Far Eastern desk, is that not true?

Mr. CARTER. Without looking up the State Department register, I couldn't give a "yes" or "no," and he wasn't more than a stenographer.

The CHAIRMAN. He was not more than a stenographer?

Mr. CARTER. He clearly wasn't much more than a stenographer.

The CHAIRMAN. He was an assistant to Mr. Hornbeck, and is it not true that he had an office of his own, separate and apart from Mr. Hornbeck?

Mr. CARTER. You went in and there were two or three lady secretaries, and receptionists, and so on, and to the right was one of those old State Department lattice doors, and you went in to Hornbeck; and at the left you went in to Hiss, and it was a much smaller office, and as I remember it there was not a lattice door; and that was the geography of it.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Mandel, I wonder if you would identify or introduce into evidence an excerpt from the testimony concerning Mr. Miller.

Mr. MANDEL. Excerpts from testimony in hearings regarding Communist espionage in the United States Government, before the Committee on Un-American Activities, House of Representatives, as follows:

Miss BENTLEY—Elizabeth

This is the testimony of Miss Bentley—

Besides——

Mr. MORRIS. What is the date of that?

Mr. MANDEL. (continuing):

Besides which we have two other people in the same office, so he did not carry on with him very long.

Mr. MUNDT. Who were the other two people?

Miss BENTLEY. One was Robert Miller, who was the head of the Research Division of the CIAA, and the other was Joseph Gregg, who was one of his assistants.

Mr. MUNDT. Was Mr. Miller a Communist?

Miss BENTLEY. Yes.

Mr. MUNDT. Did you collect dues from him?

Miss BENTLEY. Yes.

That is page 531 of those hearings.

The CHAIRMAN. Does that refresh your memory at all?

Mr. CARTER. No. I am also a little vague as to what the CIAA is.

Mr. MORRIS. That is Central Intelligence—we will have that in just a moment.

Mr. CARTER. Don't bother. There is an organization called the Canadian Institute of International Affairs, and I couldn't conceive of that. Don't bother to look it up. I am not so sure.

Mr. MORRIS. Now, to get back to Mr. Hiss, Mr. Carter, Did you consult with Alger Hiss on the selection of delegates for the Mont Tremblant Conference?

Mr. CARTER. I would be likely—I couldn't say definitely—I would be likely to, because, for the first time at IPR conferences, because so many businessmen, journalists, and professors were in Government service, we made an exception and invited a number of Government servants from different countries to attend that conference in a private capacity, and Mr. Currie was one of those, and undoubtedly I would have run over with Hornbeck or——

The CHAIRMAN. The question was: Did you confer with Mr. Hiss?

Mr. CARTER. I don't remember, but it is likely.

Mr. MORRIS. I offer you a telegram sent by Robert W. Barnett to you, Mr. E. C. Carter. The date is November 17, 1942, and it reads:

Hiss expresses admiration of Rajchman's incisive mind. Sees no objection his participating conference.

ROBERT W. BARNETT

I offer that, and ask you if you can recall having received that?

Mr. CARTER. It is not fully addressed, and I am willing to say I received it.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I offer that into evidence, and ask it be marked as the next exhibit.

(The document referred to was marked "Exhibit No. 19" and is as follows:)

EXHIBIT No. 19

[Western Union]

WASHINGTON, D. C., November 17, 1942.

E. C. CARTER,
Institute of Pacific Relations:

Hiss expresses admiration Rajchman's incisive mind sees no objection his participating conference.

ROBERT W. BARNETT.

The CHAIRMAN. I would like to have a word of explanation here, and who is R-a-j-c-h-m-a-n?

Mr. MORRIS. Would you identify Mr. Rajchman?

Mr. CARTER. I am glad you can spell his name. He is a Polish doctor, a health officer in the Secretariat of the League of Nations for many years, and he was invited by Chiang Kai-shek and T. V. Soong to make a public health survey in China, and I have forgotten whether it was in reference to plague or one of the great floods and the fevers that followed; and then, because of his very intimate association with T. V. Soong at the time of the Manchurian business, he lived in Soong's house and he became a friend, and when T. V. Soong was over in this country trying to get maximum aid for Chiang Kai-shek of a military character, T. V. Soong had a purchasing agency, and I don't know the name of it, and he invited several Americans and this Pole, or ex-Pole, Rajchman, to assist him in getting the maximum amount of purchases or lend-lease or military aid.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be inserted in the record.

Mr. MORRIS. Was he a Communist, to your knowledge, Mr. Carter?

Mr. CARTER. He is just about the last man in the world I would picture as a Communist, but in the executive hearing you told me that he was now a member of the Polish Communist Party, and I accept it, but it seemed to me as incredible as if the chairman of this meeting joined the brethren.

The CHAIRMAN. That is rather incredible.

Mr. MORRIS. I don't know whether I described him as a Polish Communist, now, but I would like Mr. Mandel to read into the record——

Mr. CARTER. You said he was.

Mr. MORRIS. I said he was an official of the Polish Communist Government, which is virtually the same thing, but I am being very careful with you, Mr. Carter.

Mr. CARTER. He is in the front door, anyhow.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you read——

Mr. MANDEL. May I first establish the date of the Bentley testimony. It was July 31, 1948.

This is a letter dated July 24, 1951, addressed to the Honorable Pat McCarran, chairman, Internal Security Subcommittee, United States Senate; addressed from the Department of State, from H. J. L'Heureux, Chief of the Visa Division:

MY DEAR SENATOR MCCARRAN: "With reference to Mr. Mandel's inquiry of July 18, 1951, the records of the Department show that a passport visa as a nonimmigrant under section 3 (7) of the Immigration Act of 1924, as amended, was granted at the American Embassy at Warsaw, on October 17, 1950, to Ludwig Rajchman, bearer of Polish Passport No. S–000613, issued by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, with a validity from October 14, 1950, to October 14, 1951, and the bearer of the passport was described as "Polish Government delegate to and Chairman of the Children's Emergency Fund of the United Nations."

Sincerely yours,

H. J. L'HEUREUX.

Mr. CARTER. May I ask, Mr. Mandel, does it state that the visa was granted, or that it was refused?

Mr. MANDEL. It does not state.

Mr. MORRIS. The purpose of that, Mr. Carter, is to show that he is an official of the present Polish Communist Government.

Mr. CARTER. I don't think it is terribly important, from my point of view, but I know for a considerable time he was, I think, the Chairman or the executive officer of the UN Children's Emergency Fund, and I heard of his doing a good deal of work in raising money for that.

Mr. MORRIS. He was the Polish Government delegate to that, wasn't he?

Mr. CARTER. I don't know.

Mr. MORRIS. Well, I mean the official record we have just made is that Mr. Rajchman was the Polish Government delegate to and Chairman of the Children's Emergency Fund of the United Nations.

Mr. CARTER. Then he was both a Polish Government official, and an official of a United Nations committee.

Mr. MORRIS. He is the official Polish Communist——

Mr. CARTER. This establishes also that he was a Pole, and I thought he might have become a Chinese or American citizen.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be inserted in the record.

Mr. MORRIS. Who was Robert W. Barnett, to get back to the other telegram?

Mr. CARTER. He is the son of Eugene Barnett, the national head of the American YMCA, and he was born in China and knew Chinese, and worked for a short time at the Institute of Pacific Relations, and then went out to General Chennault's staff, with the Eighth Air Force, in Kunming.

The CHAIRMAN. I think we had that yesterday, as I recall.

Mr. CARTER. I didn't like to tell Mr. Morris he was asking a second question.

Now he holds some position in the State Department; and I have heard, but I couldn't swear to this, he sits up nights trying to prevent munitions getting to Communist China.

Mr. MORRIS. Now I would like to offer you a memorandum dated November 20, 1942, and the initials are R. W. B., obviously Mr. Barnett, and from you, Mr. Carter, and it reads:

We extended the Mont Tremblant invitation to Rajchman and he was very much pleased. He called to see me today to say that he believes it would be unwise for him to accept. His immigration status is such that he would have to get a reentry permit, and it might take him an unduly long time to get this, and he fears that there might be some embarrassment, because apparently someone in Mr. Breckinridge Long's office is not terribly keen on Rajchman and there might be complications.

Mr. CARTER. That I remember.

Mr. MORRIS. What was the difficulty in Long's office, Mr. Carter?

Mr. CARTER. Well, I don't know whether this is for the record, but I suppose it is, because the gentleman of the press are here, and it is ancient history. And I described earlier, Senator, Dr. Rajchman's close association with T. V. Soong. T. V. Soong is a terribly dynamic man, as you know, a real American go-getter, and some of the people in lease-lend, or whatever the agency he was working with, sort of thought he worked things with a little too much high pressure, and they felt that Rajchman was sort of his intelligence officer, finding out what was going on in Senate committees.

The appropriate person in the State Department didn't think that that was, as the English say, "cricket," and so I think they were rather annoyed, slightly, with Soong, and slightly with Dr. Rajchman, who was non-Chinese and non-American, for being T. V. Soong's handyman.

Mr. MORRIS. It wasn't because of his Communist record?

Mr. CARTER. Personally, I am quite sure that there wasn't a breath of that. T. V. Soong would have him out on his ear if he suspected him of being a Communist.

Mr. MORRIS. He had Dr. Chi around, didn't he?

Mr. CARTER. That was H. H. Kung, also of the Nationalist Government.

Mr. MORRIS. They could be fooled, couldn't they?

Mr. CARTER. And the other thing was, as you remember, there was quite a complicated thing——

The CHAIRMAN. You were asked a question, Mr. Carter.

Mr. MORRIS. They could be fooled, couldn't they?

Mr. CARTER. Well, I won't say anybody couldn't be fooled, but none of us are infallible all of the time.

The CHAIRMAN. I think that that is the answer.

Mr. MORRIS. Now, the last line of this memorandum reads:

You might pass this message on informally and orally to Hiss.

Now, why was it necessary that the message be passed on informally and orally to Hiss, that someone in Breckinridge Long's office was not terribly keen on Rajchman?

Mr. CARTER. I happened to know that Hiss' chief, Hornbeck, was not particularly happy over a remark of Rajchman that T. V. Soong knew within 15 minutes everything that happened in a confidential Senate committee, and that didn't sit very nicely, and I thought that Hornbeck would want to know it.

The CHAIRMAN. This is to go in evidence. We will accept this document in the record.

(The document referred to was marked "Exhibit No. 20" and is as follows:)

EXHIBIT No. 20

NOVEMBER 20, 1942.

RWB from ECC.

We extended the Mont Tremblant invitation to Rajchman and he was very much pleased. He called to see me today to say that he believes that it would be unwise for him to accept.

His immigration status is such that he would have to get a reentry permit. It might take an unduly long time to get this, and he fears there might be some embarrassment because apparently someone in Mr. Breckenridge Long's office is not terribly keen on Rajchman and there might be complications.

You might pass this message on informally and orally to Hiss.

Mr. MORRIS. At this point, this CIAA means Coordinator of Inter-American Affairs.

Mr. CARTER. It wasn't Central Intelligence Agency.

Mr. MORRIS. Why was it necessary to send this message to Mr. Hiss through Barnett?

Mr. CARTER. May I see it again?

Mr. MORRIS. Why was it necessary to send it through Barnett?

Mr. CARTER. Barnett was in Washington, and I was in New York, and Barnett had talked, apparently, about this Rajchman man, and so it went to Hiss just as, frequently, if I had a communication from Mr. Hull, I would send it through Mr. Sumner Welles.

I will say, Senator, that Rajchman never came to the Mont Tremblant Conference. He was not a citizen of a country which was a member of the IPR.

Mr. MORRIS. And, of course, Mont Tremblant was in Canada, and it would require a reentry permit to go up there.

Mr. CARTER. And it would take a lot of time.

Mr. MORRIS. That series of questions was to bring out or in response to the question of Alger Hiss' associations with the IPR, and you recall this all started when we were discussing Vladimir Rogov, and your sending two telegrams to Alger Hiss and Lauchlin Currie to introduce him to certain people in Washington.

Mr. CARTER. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. Now, I show you a letter dated January 17, 1944, and it is addressed to Miss Rose Yardumian, Institute of Pacific Relations, 744 Jackson Place NW., Washington 6.

Would you identify Rose Yardumian?

Mr. CARTER. She was a Radcliffe graduate who for a short time served as a secretary in the Washington office of the IPR, which was maintained for the brief period during the war, because so many members of the IPR from China, Canada, Britain, France, and so on, were in Washington, and we wanted an opportunity to bring them up to date as to contact.

Mr. MORRIS. She was the secretary there in January of 1944, was she not, Mr. Carter?

Mr. CARTER. She was, and that was during the war.

Mr. MORRIS. And she was also the secretary in June of 1945, at the time that the Amerasia case broke, was she not?

Mr. CARTER. In June of 1945, the war was still on; yes.

Mr. MORRIS. So when you say a brief period of time, I wish you would elaborate on that.

Mr. CARTER. I can't tell you.

Mr. MORRIS. Can you approximate it?

Mr. CARTER. I can't remember what year during the war it was opened, and I know it was not opened at the very outbreak of the war.

Mr. MORRIS. Was she a Communist?

Mr. CARTER. I never suspected her of it, and I haven't seen her for many years.

Mr. MORRIS. Where is she now?

Mr. CARTER. I can't testify on that. She went out to UNRRA in China, and I think transferred there to the Chinese Industrial——

Mr. MORRIS. Did IPR help her to get a job with UNRRA?

Mr. CARTER. I very likely would have commended her for it if she asked me to.

Mr. MORRIS. In other words, she worked with UNRRA in 1946, and in all likelihood she went from your office to UNRRA in 1946?

Mr. CARTER. I couldn't be sure, and if you have got testimony to that effect or evidence to that effect, I would gladly accept it.

Mr. MORRIS. I am taking this from one of your own publications here, Biannual Report of the American Council, Institute of Pacific Relations, 1944–46, and on page 11 you say:

> Early in 1946, Rose Yardumian, former Washington representative of the IPR, joined the staff of UNRRA in China, as did several other people.

So I am accepting your authority on that one, Mr. Carter.

Mr. CARTER. I still think, Senator, that IPR publications are reasonably accurate, and I accept that.

Mr. MORRIS. You don't know where Rose Yardumian is now?

Mr. CARTER. Only by hearsay. She was in UNRRA, and she joined one of the agencies that Mr. Lewis and Paul Hoffman had maintained under United China relief, called Indusco, getting handicrafts going, and it is only hearsay, and I understand she married an Englishman and is now living in England, but I couldn't swear to that.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Carter, I would like to introduce into the evidence at this time, and first offer it to you, photostats of two publications, both of them are published in Communist China, and they are the same publications, but you will see the difference in a minute. One is the China Weekly Review, January 14, 1950, published in Shanghai, which was at that time Communist China, and I call your attention to the fact that one of the editors there, one of the three editors there is listed as Rose Yardumian. I offer that, and ask you to make any observation you would like to make on it.

Mr. CARTER. This is the first time I have seen this; and second, it is the first time I have heard that she was on the China Weekly Review; and third, the China Weekly Review, as you know, for many years was edited by a heroic newspaperman, J. B. Powell, and he lost a leg or a heel owing to Japanese torture, and he was pro-democratic.

Mr. MORRIS. Anti-Communist, wasn't he?

Mr. CARTER. Yes. And after his death, or after he left China, his son took over, and I understand his son has gone or left, and this would seem to indicate it. But I do remember a somewhat parallel case, in that the American-owned and edited Shanghai Evening Post and Mercury continued for some time in Shanghai after the Communists took over, and finally the Communists made it impossible for them to operate, and ultimately the American staff got out.

Mr. MORRIS. I would like to offer Mr. Carter the China Weekly Review of December 1950, and the China Monthly Review of December 1950, late in the same year.

Mr. CARTER. Is that something different from the China Weekly Review?

Mr. MORRIS. Apparently the difference is in the time.. One is the China Monthly Review and the other is the China Weekly Review, and the editorial board is much the same.

I call your attention to the list of contributing editors, and here we have the name Rose Yardumian, and this is now December of 1950.

I think, just to describe the character of the publication, I have here in the Letters to the Editor column, under a headline "Brutal invasion," apparently the communication there to the editor:

America's invasion of Korea is many times more brutal and Fascist than Hitler's and Tojo's adventures, judging from the broadcasts by the American captives.

Now, I think that will dispel any doubt that you may have that that is a Communist publication, don't you think, Mr. Carter?

Mr. CARTER. It is following the Communist line, and I haven't studied it.

Mr. MORRIS. In a rather strident way.

Mr. CARTER. It seems to me going it whole hog and a little further.

The CHAIRMAN. I think at this time we will have to suspend for a few minutes. I have to go over and cast a vote, and I will be right back.

(Brief recess.)

Mr. MORRIS. I would like to introduce both the photostat of the China Weekly Review of January 14, 1950, showing Rose Yardumian as one of the three editors as of that time, as well as a photostatic copy of the editorial page of the China Monthly Review of December 1950, showing Rose Yardumian as one of the contributing editors.

Now, before doing so, I would like to point out to Mr. Carter, you will notice among the contributing editors there the name of Hugh Deane. Is that the same Mr. Hugh Deane who was a member of the Washington chapter of IPR?

Mr. CARTER. He may have been, and I don't remember.

The CHAIRMAN. It may be that he is the same, or he may have been a member of the Washington chapter.

Mr. CARTER. Both.

Mr. MORRIS. I would like to have both of those introduced into the record and have them so marked as the next exhibits.

The CHAIRMAN. They will be inserted in the record and so marked.

(The documents referred to were marked "Exhibits Nos. 21 and 22" and are as follows:)

Mr. MORRIS. Was it surprising to you that Rose Yardumian should have turned up as one of the editors for a paper published in Communist China?

Mr. CARTER. Yes, very. She left the IPR, I would say, over 5 years ago, and maybe six.

Mr. MORRIS. Is she related to Guenther Stein?

Mr. CARTER. You reminded me in executive session that her sister married Guenther Stein.

Mr. MORRIS. Who was Guenther Stein?

Mr. CARTER. Well, I don't think you want me to repeat all of the biographical sketch.

Mr. MORRIS. Just tell what Guenther Stein's connections with the IPR have been.

Mr. CARTER. He wrote a number of articles, 6, 9, or 10, for IPR publications, at the time when he was also working for T. V. Soong. He was at one time regarded as one of the top economic journalists, having been on the Berlin Agis Verlag; and, not liking Hitler, went to London, and went to the Far East; and the Japanese militarists didn't like him, and he went to work for T. V. Soong in China. And later he was cited by the illustrious Sorge—a mystery and devilish spy who was shot or hung—and mentioned, Sorge mentioned that Guenther Stein accommodated him, and I think Guenther Stein denied it. And it was mentioned by spokesmen for MacArthur as though Guenther Stein had worked for Sorge. But then an officer at the Pentagon, of our United States Army, apparently withdrew or dissented from the statement.

Mr. MORRIS. In other words, you recall that Guenther Stein was mentioned by General MacArthur's headquarters as one identified by Richard Sorge as a participant in his espionage ring?

Mr. CARTER. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. Do you also recall Guenther Stein was the IPR Chungking correspondent?

Mr. CARTER. He corresponded for us at Chungking, and whether he was labeled "correspondent," or not, I don't remember.

Mr. MORRIS. Do you recall he was a delegate of British IPR to your Hot Springs convention?

Mr. CARTER. I remember that. The British had a very high regard for him, and I think he became a British citizen.

Mr. MORRIS. What is your impression of Guenther Stein today?

Mr. CARTER. The last time I saw him, he was anti-Nazi, and anti-Japanese and anti-Communist.

Mr. MORRIS. When did you last see him?

Mr. CARTER. Oh, I should say very soon after the war, he came to this country. And he was asked to do a study——

The CHAIRMAN. I do not think that that goes to the question. Let us confine this, if we can.

Mr. CARTER. I am trying to recall, through the project that he was asked to undertake, about what the date was, and I would say roughly 1946 or 1947.

Mr. MORRIS. This all started again with this letter to Rose Yardumian, and now I would like to read this letter, and first I offer it to you, Mr. Carter, and I would like to read it:

Here is a copy of a telegram——

The CHAIRMAN. Let us identify this for the record.

Mr. CARTER. It is from Carter to Rose Yardumian, dated January 17, 1944.

Mr. MORRIS (continuing):

Here is a copy of a telegram I have just sent to Alger Hiss. Would you telephone him that I think Hornbeck and he would greatly appreciate a private talk with Rogoff.

I also enclose a copy of a telegram I have sent to Currie. You might phone Currie, too, telling him I think he would like to talk with Rogoff.

Will you telephone Rogoff at Tass Wednesday morning and ask him whether he would like you to arrange for him to visit the Library of Congress, the Mellon Gallery, or the IPR?

Will you also phone Colonel Faymonville in the Ordnance Department of the War Department, to say that I thought he would want to know Rogoff was in Washington. You could explain to Faymonville that Rogoff can be reached at the Tass office in Washington, and that he would be there on Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday.

Why did you think that Colonel Faymonville should want to see Rogoff?

Mr. CARTER. Faymonville had been United States military attaché in the United States Embassy in Moscow for a number of years, and he knew the Russian language, and he was always eager to meet Russians of all points of view, and he later became head of a military assistance program to Russia during the war, in the Embassy in Moscow.

Mr. MORRIS. I would like to offer that in evidence as the next exhibit and have it properly marked.

The CHAIRMAN. It is inserted in the record.

(The document referred to was marked "Exhibit No. 23" and is as follows:)

EXHIBIT No. 23

NEW YORK 22, N. Y., January 17, 1944.

Miss ROSE YARDUMIAN,
Institute of Pacific Relations,
744 Jackson Place N.W., Washington 6, D. C.

DEAR ROSE: Here is a copy of a telegram I have just sent to Alger Hiss. Would you telephone him that I think Hornbeck and he would greatly appreciate a private talk with Rogoff. I also enclose a copy of a telegram I have sent to Currie. You might phone Currie, too, telling him I think he would like to talk with Rogoff.

Will you telephone Rogoff at Tass Wednesday morning and ask him whether he would like you to arrange for him to visit the Library of Congress, the Mellon Gallery, or the IPR.

Will you also phone Colonel Faymonville in the Ordnance Department of the War Department to say that I thought he would want to know Rogoff was in Washington. You could explain to Faymonville that Rogoff can be reached at the Tass office in Washington and that he will be there on Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday.

It may be that you would like to find out from Rogoff whether he would like to meet at the office four or five Congressmen like Judd and Fulbright. But don't make this suggestion if it clutters up the time which you may want to give to more urgent matters.

Sincerely yours,

EDWARD C. CARTER.

Mr. MORRIS. I now offer you a reply letter from Miss Yardumian dated January 20, 1944, and I will ask you if you if you will look at that, Mr. Carter, and ask if you can recall receiving that letter from Rose Yardumian?

Mr. CARTER. I now remember the letter, and it converts, slightly alters something that I said earlier about the article in War and the Working Class, and——

Mr. MORRIS. May I ask you a few questions on it? I want to call your attention to the opening paragraph:

I received your letter of January 17 with copies of the telegrams you sent Mr. Hiss and Mr. Currie. I called Alger Hiss yesterday morning and he told me that he had received your wire but was sure that I would understand that he could not make the first advance in arranging a private talk with Rogoff.

Will you tell us why Alger Hiss thought that she would understand that he could not be the first to make the advance in arranging a private talk with Rogoff?

Mr. CARTER. Because the State Department had received this article of Rogoff's that you introduced earlier, from War and the Working Class, and they didn't like it, and they didn't think it was appropriate for them to go out of their way to receive a guy who had written something that they considered inaccurate.

Mr. MORRIS. You notice that you do recall that there was an article.

Mr. CARTER. This reminds me, and I had completely forgotten about it, because I had never seen it.

Mr. MORRIS. You also recall that the reason why Hiss was disturbed about this was because of the article?

Mr. CARTER. I now recall it, and compliment Hiss for thinking that it was not quite appropriate to run after a fellow who had written this kind of an article.

Mr. MORRIS. How can you so testify, Mr. Carter, when, after prompting your recollection four or five times, you had no recollection whatever of that particular article in War and the Working Class?

Mr. CARTER. What is the date of this?

Mr. MORRIS. January 20, 1944.

Mr. CARTER. I haven't a perfect memory, and I have thought of a good many things since, and I wasn't evading there, Senator. My mind is not an encyclopedia.

Mr. MORRIS. Why would Alger Hiss want not to be the first to make the advance in arranging this private talk?

Mr. CARTER. Well, Hornbeck's principal assistant, and therefore the spokesman for the Department.

Mr. MORRIS. What was the purpose of this meeting?

Mr. CARTER. I thought I indicated that earlier, that I thought—and this was not an initiative on the part of Hornbeck or anyone else in the State Department—I thought it was helpful to know what people who disagree with you think.

Mr. MORRIS. If that were the case, why wouldn't Hiss want it known that he was going to be the first to introduce him? I don't understand that at all, and why should Hiss be afraid to be the first one in bringing Rogoff in to see Stanley Hornbeck?

Mr. CARTER. He was a subordinate, and you would have to ask him, and I can't reconstruct Alger Hiss' mind.

Mr. MORRIS. It does give you a wrong impression when you read a letter like this, or maybe the right impression, doesn't it, Mr. Carter?

Mr. CARTER. Well, it gave me the impression that Hiss was being correct and didn't want to involve the United States Government in a conversation with a man who technically, in the Russian sense, was not a representative of the Russian Foreign Office or of the Soviet Embassy here.

Now, you and I recognize Tass as part and parcel of the Soviet Government, but from—

Mr. MORRIS. Who would know if he brought him in to see Hornbeck?

Mr. CARTER. Well, I frequently meet alert men of the press who would coast down the aisles of the old Senate Building, or the old State Department Building, looking for something the American public could be interested in, and they were doing their job.

Mr. MORRIS. If Hiss was doing his job with Hornbeck and really out to get information out of Rogoff, why should he be so ashamed of that fact?

Mr. CARTER. I don't know that he was. He thought it was inappropriate, and it may have been simply the diplomatic thing of making an appointment to see a Soviet citizen who wasn't accredited as representing the Soviet Embassy.

Mr. MORRIS. Was Alger Hiss always, to your knowledge, as correct in all of his dealings as you claim on that occasion?

Mr. CARTER. Personally, I never remember his doing a diplomatically incorrect thing, and I thought he was pretty well trained in State Department poise.

Mr. MORRIS. You see in the next sentence:

He mentioned the Rogoff articles in War and the Working Class and that Rogoff's material had caused considerable controversy in circles here.

Mr. CARTER. Naturally.

Mr. MORRIS (continuing):

He said that if Larry Todd wanted to bring Rogoff to Hornbeck's office, they would not refuse to see him.

Will you explain that, Mr. Carter?

Mr. CARTER. Well, certainly most State Department people in those days received foreign newspapermen from any country if they asked to see them.

Mr. MORRIS. I see in the next sentence Miss Yardumian said:

I am not sure that I understand the machinations of our State Department.

Mr. CARTER. I think that there have been other people in this room who take that same position.

The CHAIRMAN. You could have heard that on television last night.

Mr. MORRIS. In the next paragraph you have:

Mr. Currie has arranged to see Rogoff at 12 o'clock today.

Do you know what happened at that particular conversation?

Mr. CARTER. No.

Mr. MORRIS (continuing):

Colonel Faymonville is returning to Washington from New York this morning and is supposed to get in touch with our office then.

Do you remember what happened at the conversation with Faymonville?

Mr. CARTER. I don't remember.

Mr. MORRIS. Now, I would like to turn over to the next page, Mr. Carter, and I draw your attention to the P. P. S. on this:

Rogoff and Bill have been at the Cosmos Club for the last 2½ hours talking with Lattimore, Remer, and Vincent.

Will you identify the people mentioned in that postscript?

Mr. CARTER. I don't know who the "Bill" was, but something may reveal it; and Lattimore has been mentioned once or twice, and I think this committee has seen him in executive session; and Remer is a high-ranking professor of economics at the University of Michigan.

Mr. MORRIS. What was he at that time, do you know, Mr. Carter?

Mr. CARTER. I think probably he was in some Government agency, and I haven't any idea.

Mr. MORRIS. Was he the head of the Far Eastern Section of OSS?

Mr. CARTER. He might have been. I should think he would be more in an economic job, but OSS tried to do everything.

Mr. MORRIS. That was January 20, 1944. What was Mr. Lattimore's assignment, do you know?

Mr. CARTER. I have quite forgotten the dates.

Mr. MORRIS. Who was "Vincent" mentioned there?

Mr. CARTER. Presumably Mr. John Carter Vincent, who has a middle name like mine, no blood relation.

Mr. MORRIS. What was his position in early 1944? Was he head of the China Desk then?

Mr. CARTER. I should think so, and the record would show, and at one time he was head of the China Desk succeeding Max Hamilton, who immediately succeeded Stanley Hornbeck.

Mr. MORRIS. Now, could "Bill" there be Bill Johnstone, who is mentioned in another part of the letter?

Mr. CARTER. It might very well be, because Johnstone then, who was at the university here, was quite active in the Washington branch of the Institute of Pacific Relations, and I think a member of our national board.

Mr. MORRIS. Do you know what transpired at that particular meeting, Mr. Carter?

Mr. CARTER. I don't think that I was ever sent any report.

Mr. MORRIS. Even after you had sent Rogoff down there to arrange for all of these conferences?

Mr. CARTER. No. I was not interested in the outcome. I thought it was a useful opportunity for people to meet a Russian who spoke good English and who knew China thoroughly well, and who had a sense of humor and could crack little jokes in the American vernacular, and he never stood on a high horse the way most of the Soviet diplomats did.

Mr. MORRIS. Now, Mr. Chairman, do you have any questions on that particular thing?

The CHAIRMAN. I have no questions at this time, no.

Mr. MORRIS. I would like to offer you a letter dated June 20, 1941, and it is from you to Owen Lattimore, and it reads here:

> If you have time while in San Francisco, you and Bill Holland may want to arrange a private talk with Col. Philip R. Faymonville, whose present address is Headquarters of the Fourth Army, Presidio of San Francisco, Calif. He would, I think, have been thoroughly at home and at ease if he had lunched with us at the Mayflower on Wednesday. I think you get the idea. It may be that if you get the same favorable impression of him which Harriette Moore and I have, he might be someone who could be exceptionally useful to you and the Generalissimo at some future time in Chungking.
> If you wish me to, I will wire him for an appointment.
>
> Sincerely yours,
>
> EDWARD C. CARTER.

And I offer you that, and ask you if you can recall that particular letter?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Do you recall that letter?

Mr. CARTER. I recall the letter.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you comment on it?

Mr. CARTER. I would be delighted.

As indicated, Philip Faymonville became Brigadier General Faymonville, and was a very highly rated ordnance officer who was then in the Presidio in California.

As I indicated earlier, he had unusually wide knowledge of the Russian language, the Russian people.

As I did not indicate earlier, he had been our attaché in Japan and had learned Japanese and thus knew a good deal of the Far Eastern complex.

Would this, Mr. Morris, have been just before Lattimore went to Chungking for Chiang Kai-shek?

Mr. MORRIS. Yes, that was before that time.

Mr. CARTER. When it was under consideration, presumably?

Mr. MORRIS. That is right.

Mr. CARTER. Here I say that I think Faymonville might be exceptionally useful to Lattimore and Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek at some future time in Chungking.

What I had in mind then was that the Generalissimo's two question marks—one was Japan, and the other was Russia—Chiang Kai-shek was in quite intimate relations with the Soviet authorities.

Mr. MORRIS. I have identified Colonel Faymonville here. You say:

He would, I think, have been thoroughly at home and at ease if he had lunched with us at the Mayflower on Wednesday.

Can you remember what luncheon that was?

Mr. CARTER. I think the luncheon we had with a number of our Kuomintang friends.

Mr. MORRIS. This is June 1941. Perhaps I might help your recollection by pointing out this is 2 days before the Hitler invasion of the Soviet Union. Can you remember whom you had lunch with at that particular time?

Mr. CARTER. I remember talking with a number of Chinese friends, Nationalist Chinese friends, and the latter part makes me wonder whether it wasn't at a time when all Americans wanted to help Chiang Kai-shek in being as strong as possible and having as many allies as possible in withstanding aggression.

Mr. MORRIS. Who was Harriet Moore?

Mr. CARTER. Harriette Moore had been, or was, at that time, a member of the IPR staff, a graduate of Bryn Mawr, who worked competently on our staff for some time.

Mr. MORRIS. Was she a Communist?

Mr. CARTER. No.

Mr. MORRIS. You were associated with Russian War Relief?

Mr. CARTER. I was.

Mr. MORRIS. Do you remember if she was secretary of Russian War Relief?

Mr. CARTER. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. Do you remember David Dubinsky, the head of the International Ladies Garment Workers Union who refused to make any contributions to that as long as Harriet Moore remained as secretary?

Mr. CARTER. I remember. I remember he was photographed with me, handing me a check of $25,000 or $50,000 for Russian relief.

Miss Moore was still on the board.

Mr. MORRIS. Miss Moore was no longer secretary?

Mr. CARTER. No. She insisted if Dubinsky did not like it, or he wanted to get her to resign that she remain on the board, even though members of the board thought she was invaluable and she wasn't a Communist. She insisted for the good of the organization to resign as secretary.

Allen Wardwell, a very distinguished New York lawyer, succeeded her. She remained on the board until the end. She was mixed up with another Harriette Moore.

Mr. MORRIS. Not by Mr. Dubinsky?

Mr. CARTER. Oh, yes. I had several hours with Mr. Dubinsky later after he made his protest. He conceded there must have been another Harriet Moore. That Rarriet Moore was 10 years older and 6 inches shorter than the other Harriet Moore.

I have in the other room a statement from the Garment Workers in warm support of what we were aiming to do in cooperating with our Soviet allies.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I do not think we should take a break at this time to introduce any testimony on Harriet Moore. We will come to that later.

Let us go back to this letter.

Harriette Moore and you had a favorable impression of Colonel Faymonville. What was that impression?

Mr. CARTER. Very competent as an ordnance officer in which we were not experts; a man who knew Japan and Russia and was an American.

Mr. MORRIS. It is your recollection that the occasion that you had lunch on the previous Wednesday was that you had it with some Chinese officials?

Mr. CARTER. That is my memory, but I couldn't swear to it, Senator.

Mr. MORRIS. I would like to introduce another letter at this time, into the record. I would like to offer that, a letter dated June 23, 1941. This is a letter to Philip Jessup, care of American Express, Santiago, Chile. It is sent by Edward C. Carter. The date is June 23, 1941. The last paragraph reads (and in the meantime this same week end Hitler has invaded the Soviet Union):

I wonder whether you happened to hear Churchill's speech yesterday.

That is Churchill's speech announcing that the British people, or, rather, the British Empire, was going to support the Soviet Union against Hitler.

Mr. CARTER. It was one of the greatest offerings in English literature and democratic statesmanship.

Mr. MORRIS (reading):

Hitler, Stalin, and Churchill managed quite a spectacular week end. It so happened that last week I had lunch with Oumansky in Washington on Wednesday. We talked for a couple of hours.

That is the same date, is it not?

Mr. CARTER. (Nodding affirmatively.)

Mr. MORRIS (continuing):

We talked for a couple of hours. I was fortunate in getting Lattimore over from Baltimore, as I thought it was pretty important for him to have a long talk with Oumansky, in view of his job and the evolving world situation. It was a most illuminating 2 hours.

Will you concede that was the same luncheon?

Mr. CARTER. I would want to look at the record a little further. If you have got things that will refresh my mind——

Mr. MORRIS. Do you have a copy of that second letter in front of you?

Mr. CARTER. No.

Mr. MORRIS. Would you look at the dates of both letters—June 23, 1941, and June 20, 1941?

Mr. CARTER. Yes. Apparently quite clearly I wrote that letter.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you concede that the Wednesday preceding both of those dates was June 18?

Mr. CARTER. I would say it is likely. I can't prove it.

Mr. MORRIS. You are talking about the same luncheon in both cases, are you not?

Mr. CARTER. Occasionally in Washington I happened to have two luncheons.

Mr. MORRIS. This lunch lasted 2 hours.

Mr. CARTER. I think you are pretty sure that it was the same luncheon. I am willing to take your view.

Mr. MORRIS. In other words, it wasn't a luncheon you had with some Communists, Chinese Communist officials?

Mr. CARTER. Chinese nationalists.

Mr. MORRIS. I am sorry. It was a luncheon you had with Mr. Oumansky.

The CHAIRMAN. Let the record show the witness nodded his head affirmatively to that last question.

You cannot get that into the record.

Mr. MORRIS. I notice you say:

He would, I think, have been thoroughly at home and at ease if he had lunched with us at the Mayflower on Wednesday.

Will you describe the atmosphere that prevailed at the luncheon with Mr. Oumansky in Washington on the previous Wednesday?

Mr. CARTER. Which paragraph is that "at home" business?

Mr. MORRIS. This is on the June 20 letter.

Mr. CARTER. Faymonville had a principal interest on the part of the United States Government for several years. His interest was Russia. He was eager to meet all sorts of Russians who could bring him up to date. He was particularly interested because Oumansky at that time, if I remember rightly, saw little chance of America going to war with Japan, and I was, myself, certain that Japan was going to take the initiative and we would be in a state of war with Japan.

Mr. MORRIS. I would like to call your attention to the time of this. It is June 20, 1941. This is during the Hitler-Stalin pact. That was not at a time when the Soviet Union was friendly with the United States.

Mr. CARTER. Quite the opposite.

Mr. MORRIS. Yet, you say at luncheon the political atmosphere was one that you would say that you were at ease with Mr. Oumansky?

Mr. CARTER. Because Mr. Lattimore and I were telling Oumansky that we thought that he was all wet in thinking that a state of war between Japan and the United States was not imminent. We thought it was.

Faymonville, having been in Japan, knew a great deal about the Japanese military expansion movement, and Oumansky at that time and all times was a persona non grata, to say the least, with most American correspondents.

Mr. MORRIS. He wasn't persona non grata with you?

Mr. CARTER. He wasn't a very useful contact.

Mr. MORRIS. Was he at ease at luncheon?

Mr. CARTER. He is always at ease.

The CHAIRMAN. Was he at ease at luncheon?

Mr. CARTER. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. Why do you use the expression "he would have been thoroughly at home and at ease if he had lunched with us at the Mayflower on Wednesday. I think you get the idea"?

What do you mean by that?

Mr. CARTER. There would be a scrap on, and Oumansky in his very dogmatic self-assured way would take one position that Lattimore and I would consider in a different vein and would take a diagonally opposite position.

Mr. MORRIS. Why would Colonel Faymonville be at home?

Mr. CARTER. Because it was two Americans against a Russian, and the two American happened to be right, and the Russian was wrong.

Mr. MORRIS. Do you recall that very well now?

Mr. CARTER. It comes back to me.

Mr. MORRIS. At the time you had no recollection?

Mr. CARTER. I thought it was another luncheon. I nearly always try to break all the hygienic rules by using the luncheon time to see people.

Mr. MORRIS. Who was Mr. Oumansky? Tell us who he was at that time.

Mr. CARTER. Some people at the press table could give a better picture.

The CHAIRMAN. Never mind. Tell us.

Mr. CARTER. Oumansky was a Russian Communist, a militant Communist. He had been, I think, press officer for the Russian Foreign Office in Moscow. Later he came as Ambassador to this country.

It so happened in one of my several visits to Moscow, trying to get the Soviet scholars interested in the Orient to form a Soviet chapter of the IPR, I was finally channeled to Oumansky's office. I had a long talk with him.

The Soviet officials had been negative before Oumansky listened, asked for IPR documents; said that he thought the IPR had proved itself as a scholarly and useful organization and that he had no power to say whether or not a decision would be made to form a Soviet IPR, but he would take it up with the highest quarters.

You can guess who that was.

That I might never hear from him again, or I might be called back, he said.

A few months later I was called back and the Soviet IPR was organized.

The CHAIRMAN. Was it organized in the highest quarters at that time when you were called back?

Mr. CARTER. Apparently high quarters approved the idea. The people I met were so-called researchers on Asia and the Pacific.

Mr. MORRIS. Did you realize at the same time that Mr. Oumansky was an important intelligence agent for the Soviet Union?

Mr. CARTER. He was in the Foreign Office. I think his contact with the foreign press was not only to give hand-outs to the Times and the Tribune and Writers, et cetera, but to get as much dope as he could from them.

They were always working on a two-way proposition.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, do you have any more questions?

The CHAIRMAN. No.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Sourwine?

Mr. SOURWINE. I would like to have the record made clear on a very small point.

Have you been here describing what you meant by your reference "being at home" in the letter that has been discussed at some length, or have you been only describing what you might have meant?

Mr. CARTER. It is a darn good question.

What year was this?

Mr. MORRIS. This is 3 days before the Soviet invasion by Hitler, during the Hitler-Stalin pact, June 20, 1941.

Mr. CARTER. My memory is pretty accurate on that thing. It was a big historic moment. Some of us saw the Japs were all ready. I had so much contact with the Japanese to know what their time table was.

The CHAIRMAN. I don't think you are answering the question at all. I think you had better get to the question.

Mr. SOURWINE. I thought he was getting around to it, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. We do not want to be here all afternoon.

Mr. CARTER. I am speaking from memory, not hypotheses.

Mr. SOURWINE. You have now testified as to what you did mean by your reference to the fact that Colenel Faymonville would have been very much at home at this luncheon?

Mr. CARTER. Correct.

Mr. SOURWINE. When you were a moment or so earlier testifying on the theory that the luncheon had been with a group of Chinese nationalists, that was testimony as to what you might have meant?

Mr. CARTER. Yes. I gave that provisionally. I said I am not sure, but I thought it might have been that.

Mr. MORRIS. The two statements, one that you have a very vivid recollection of what happened in view of the particular crisis in history does not square with your statement earlier when it was recognized you had luncheon with some Chinese officials at that time.

Mr. CARTER. I think the human mind remembers some things very much more vividly than others. It is a sort of automatic psychological process.

Mr. MORRIS. What do you mean by that? Follow that through, please.

Awhile ago you demonstrated you did not recall what had happened at that particular occasion.

Mr. CARTER. You remember when you married your wife, but you cannot always remember the birthday of your ninth child.

Mr. MORRIS. Is that your answer?

Mr. CARTER. I have not nine children; I wish I had.

The CHAIRMAN. Let's go ahead.

Mr. MORRIS. Would you tell us what your relations have been with Harry Dexter White?

Mr. CARTER. Very slight.

At a time when it looked to some that Mr. Hull, to prevent war between the United States and Japan, might concede certain Japanese demands, Mr. White——

Mr. MORRIS. This must be November 1941; is it not?

Mr. CARTER. I should imagine so. That was when, I think, Nomura was here following Horiunuchi as Japanese Ambassador.

I got an urgent telegram from Harry White asking me to come to Washington. I had no idea what he wanted.

Mr. MORRIS. How well did you know him at that time?

Mr. CARTER. As I remember, he was only a name of a financier who was influential in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The CHAIRMAN. I do not want to get to that again. I want you to answer that question fully.

Mr. CARTER. I didn't know him well.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you continue, please?

Mr. CARTER. I got down and saw him. He apologized. He said that the situation was such that every friend of China could be satisfied. They were not going to concede China to the Japs and they were telling or had told the Japanese that they could not accept the Japanese terms by which Japan would have a predominant influence in China.

I also met him after the war. I was returning from a trip to the Far East and to the Near East and the Soviet Union on Mr. Harriman's plane with Donald Nelson and Colonel Kessler and John Hazard. We stopped to refuel and rest in Cairo.

We dined at the American Embassy or Legation in Cairo. Mr. White was coming or going on some Government mission. We had dinner at the Embassy with 20 guests. I may have had 5 minutes' conversation with him. I may have seen him once or twice since.

Mr. SOURWINE. When was this?

Mr. CARTER. The Cairo dinner must have been shortly after VE-day and VJ-day.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. White had asked you to come to Washington to help persuade Mr. Hull from making this proposal, or accepting this proposal?

Mr. CARTER. To talk it over to see if there was anything that private citizens or Government servants could do to make certain we did not sell out China to Japan.

Mr. MORRIS. Are you making reference now to the proposed modus vivendi which was widely discussed at that time? I think you recall that was a proposition that there be a truce effected between Japan and the United States. It was first advanced by the American military authorities on the grounds they wanted more time to prepare for what they thought was the impending attack by the Japanese?

Mr. CARTER. I don't at the moment remember that aspect of it.

There were rumors that Mr. Hull, who had been playing golf with, I think, Admiral Nomura, or the top Japanese representative in this country, playing golf week ends, that he was being persuaded by the Japanese that by right of conquest and because Japan was so much more civilized they should really be in China as the British were in India; they had a God-given mission of civilization to give to the poor Chinese.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Carter, what did you do to dissuade Mr. Hull from accepting that?

Mr. CARTER. I did nothing, because when I arrived the next morning, after getting the telegram, Mr. White assured me that everything was all right and there was going to be no sell-out of China through Japan.

Mr. MORRIS. Did you discuss this with Mr. Currie at that time in Washington?

Mr. CARTER. I haven't the faintest memory. I may have, and may not.

Mr. MORRIS. That is a crucial time.

Mr. CARTER. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. You had testified awhile ago you have a short memory when it comes to great events in history. It is a few days before the attack on Pearl Harbor.

Did you discuss this with Mr. Currie?

Mr. CARTER. I can't answer "yes" or "no." It would be very likely because Currie was worried as a friend of China.

Mr. MORRIS. How do you know he was worried?
Mr. CARTER. I talked with him long before.
Mr. MORRIS. How long before?
Mr. CARTER. I can't remember.
Mr. MORRIS. So, you did discuss this?
The CHAIRMAN. Of whom are you speaking?
Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Currie.
You did discuss this with Mr. Currie?
Mr. CARTER. Not necessarily the White-Hull business, but the trend in certain sections of the American public was "let's wash our hands of the whole Far East and let the Japs run China."
Mr. MORRIS. I would like to show you a letter you sent to Mr. Tarr on November 29, 1941.
Who was Mr. Tarr?
Mr. CARTER. Mr. Tarr at various times had been governor of the Bank of Canada in Ottawa. He is head of the second- or third-largest insurance company—I have forgotten its name—with headquarters in Winnipeg. He had been for many years chairman of the Canadian affiliate of the IPR and for some years chairman of the Pacific Council, one of the wisest, most intelligently conservative of Canadians consulted constantly by Canadian Prime Ministers of different political parties.
Mr. MORRIS. I would like to read a paragraph from this letter. This is November 29, 1941, and the second paragraph reads:

Yesterday Elmhirst and I saw Currie who, as I wired you——

The CHAIRMAN. By whom is this letter written?
Mr. MORRIS. This is Mr. Carter's letter.

Yesterday Elmhist and I saw Currie who, as I wired you, has not yet been able to see the President. I should think that Currie probably had a terribly anxious time for the past week. For a few days it looked as though Hull was in danger of selling China and America and Britain down the river. Currie did not say this, but I learned it from other high sources. Currie was a little apologetic for not having pressed our idea further, but I knew something of his difficulties and they are not due to lack of interest.

Does that refresh your recollection, Mr. Carter? I offer you this.
Mr. CARTER. He was my chief at that time; at least an old friend.
Do you want me to identify Elmhirst?
Mr. MORRIS. No.
The CHAIRMAN. What is the question now?
Mr. MORRIS. Does that refresh your recollection, Mr. Carter?
Mr. CARTER. Yes. I mentioned a lot of friends—General McCoy, Whitney Shepardson——
Mr. MORRIS. I don't mean those names. You recall you did discuss this matter with Currie?
Mr. CARTER. Clearly, because I say so.
Mr. MORRIS. Do you recall what you discussed with Currie?
Mr. CARTER. That is a little more difficult in spite of this.
Mr. MORRIS. Try to recall without reading the rest of the letter, Mr. Carter.
You are not responsive. Mr. Holland does not need that, Mr. Carter. I am asking you for your recollection of that particular occasion. I wish you would not look at the rest of the letter.
Please recall what you can at this juncture without looking at the rest of the letter.

Mr. Chairman, the witness is being unresponsive.

The CHAIRMAN. He is trying to get his recollection.

Mr. MORRIS. I am asking for his reaction without his reading the letter.

Mr. CARTER. Could I react to the letter if I don't know what is in it?

The CHAIRMAN. The human mind is rather peculiar. A man can remember whether he dined in Cairo and who was present, but he might not remember some other great event. So we have to be patient on this.

Mr. CARTER. I think at that time we were being urged by a certain Frenchman and some other British and some Dutch to hold a North Atlantic conference. People in Europe who knew the IPR believed that the IPR rendered as an unofficial organization very real service to the public in its research and conferences on the Pacific.

Mr. MORRIS. Without breaking in, this question concerns your conversation with Mr. Currie about the possible sell-out, as you put it, of China on that particular occasion?

The CHAIRMAN. I think you ought to address your answer to the question, Mr. Carter.

Mr. CARTER. The British and French were concerned with the sell-out in China, as well as ourselves. The British and French at the same time thought that unofficial gatherings of people in the Atlantic would be helpful as they had been in the Pacific. They were talking with a number of people.

Currie himself was originally a Canadian.

Mr. St. Laurent, the present Prime Minister of Canada, attended that meeting, though he was not in office at that time.

Mr. MORRIS. Did you know that Owen Lattimore was strongly urging the rejection of the modus vivendi that had been proposed by the American military authorities?

Mr. CARTER. I don't, because I don't remember that 90-day proposal.

Mr. MORRIS. I would like to introduce into the record at this time, Mr. Chairman, a dispatch to Lauchlin Currie from Chungking on November 25, 1941.[1]

CHUNGKING, November 25, 1941.

LAUCHLIN CURRIE: After discussing with the Generalissimo the Chinese Ambassador's conference with the Secretary of State, I feel you should urgently advise the President of the Generalissimo's very strong reaction. I have never seen him really agitated before. Loosening of economic pressure or unfreezing would dangerously increase Japan's military advantage in China. A relaxation of American pressure while Japan has its forces in China would dismay the Chinese. Any modus vivendi now arrived at with China would be disastrous to Chinese belief in America and analogous to the closing of the Burma Road, which permanently destroyed British prestige. Japan and Chinese defeatists would instantly exploit the resulting disillusionment and urge oriental solidarity against occidental treachery. It is doubtful whether either past assistance or increasing aid could compensate for the feeling of being deserted at this hour. The Generalissimo has deep confidence in the President's fidelity to his consistent policy but I must warn you that even the Generalissimo questions his ability to hold the situation together if the Chinese national trust in America is undermined by reports of Japan's escaping military defeat by diplomatic victory.

LATTIMORE.

[1] Hearings Before the Joint Committee on the Investigation of the Pearl Harbor Attack, pts. 13–14, 1945, p. 1160.

Mr. MORRIS. What was Mr. Lattimore's position at that time, November 25, 1941?

Mr. CARTER. Was he political adviser to Chiang Kai-shek?

Mr. MORRIS. I am asking you.

Mr. CARTER. If you understand it that way, it is my understanding.

Mr. MORRIS. Who was Lauchlin Currie? What position did he have at that time?

Mr. CARTER. I am quite sure he was executive assistant to the President of the United States.

Mr. MORRIS. Here is a dispatch dated Chungking, November 25, 1941, and it reads:

After discussing with the Generalissimo the Chinese Ambassador's conference with the Secretary of State, I feel you should urgently advise the President of the Generalissimo's very strong reaction. I have never seen him really agitated before. The loosening of economic pressure or unfreezing would dangerously increase Japan's military advantage in China. A relaxation of American pressure while Japan had its forces in China would dismay the Chinese. Any modus vivendi now arrived at with China would be disastrous to Chinese belief in America and analogous to the closing of the Burma Road which permanently destroyed British prestige.

I would like to offer this dispatch if I have not already done so.

The CHAIRMAN. It has been received.

Is that the dispatch from Mr. Currie?

Mr. MORRIS. From Lattimore to Lauchlin Currie, who was then executive assistant to the President. It is dated November 25, 1941. I introduced it in connection with Mr. Carter's testimony that he did have a discussion with Mr. Currie; also in connection with this letter which I now introduce into evidence from Mr. Carter to Mr. Tarr to the effect that Mr. Currie was very much disturbed and had been taking action against the modus vivendi, and connected with the fact that Harry Dexter White called you to Washington from New York and asked you in your representative capacity if you would go down and use your influence to prevent the modus vivendi from being accepted, at least prevent any truce with Japan to be accepted.

The CHAIRMAN. That letter will be received.

EXHIBIT NO. 25

NEW YORK, N. Y., November 29, 1941.

EDGAR J. TARR, ESQ.,
Monarch Life Assurance Co.,
Winnipeg, Manitoba, Canada.

DEAR TARR: Lockwood has talked to Shepardson and McCoy, who seemed favorable but not yet enthusiastic. I imagine a reenactment of the Gladstone meeting is essential to get them to see the significance of the proposed conference.

Yesterday Elmhirst and I saw Currie who, as I wired you, has not yet been able to see the President. I should think that Currie probably had a terribly anxious time for the past week. For a few days it looked as though Hull was in danger of selling China and America and Britain down the river. Currie did not say this but I learned it from other high sources. Currie was a little apologetic for not having pressed our idea further, but I knew something of his difficulties and they are not due to lack of interest.

In order to keep the matter alive I asked Currie whether he would be willing to spend a couple of hours some evening with a few of us, examining the whole problem, and he said he would be delighted to do this. Now your letter of November 27 has come indicating that you could be here on the morning of the 5th. If I did not have to go to Cleveland I would propose immediately to Currie that we have the little meeting I proposed to him in Washington on the 5th, but as Holland and I are committed to the week-end conference in Cleveland that seems to be ruled out. As a substitute I have suggested to Emeny that he invite Currie and you to the IPR week-end conference in Cleveland on the sixth and seventh in the hope that the Washington meeting might be arranged between sessions there. I might be able to get Currie for an evening meeting on December 8 in Washington, if you could stay in the East that long. Won't you wire me on receipt of this letter?

Wherever the meeting is held, I would hope that you and Lockwood and Holland and Elmhirst could be present, and if in Washington we would make every effort to have Shepardson and McCoy present. Perhaps the best plan would be to take it in two jumps, namely to call a long luncheon meeting for Friday, December 5, here in New York to be attended by McCoy, Shepardson, Elmhirst, Lockwood, Holland, and Tirana and myself. I think we might get Dellard and Willite to come to such a meeting, though personally I am not at all worried about getting the meeting financed so long as it is agreed that the meeting is desirable.

I am asking Lockwood to see whether he can get McCoy and Shepardson for lunch on Friday provided you can join us. Will you wire me as to whether you could come to New York for such a luncheon discussion as I have just proposed?

Sincerely yours,

EDWARD C. CARTER.

Mr. CARTER. I did not say that. I did not recall the details of this trust, but apparently I was following the Chiang Kai-shek-Lattimore-Currie line that any concession to Japan was hostile to the best interest of either the United States or Nationalist China and that we ought to continue to aid Chiang to the maximum of our ability.

Mr. MORRIS. You had known Owen Lattimore for a long time?

Mr. CARTER. Since 1933.

Mr. MORRIS. Have you ever since 1943 noticed any concern on Mr. Owen Lattimore's part or the generalissimo?

Mr. CARTER. Oh, yes.

Mr. MORRIS. You mean he is well disposed?

Mr. CARTER. Since 1933, you mean?

Mr. MORRIS. 1943.

Hasn't Owen Lattimore been one of the principal opponents of the generalissimo since 1943?

Mr. CARTER. Well, I would have to look up the record, or ask you to refresh me. I know that since the war he has expressed doubt as to whether Chiang Kai-shek has the ability to keep the businessmen, the bankers, and intellectuals and masses of China behind him.

Mr. MORRIS. Do you know what Harry Dexter White's attitude toward Chiang Kai-shek was since 1943?

Mr. CARTER. I have never read or heard anything one way or the other on that.

Mr. MORRIS. How about Mr. Currie's attitude toward Chiang Kai-shek after 1943?

Mr. CARTER. You would have to ask him, unless you have something I have read, which I don't remember having done.

Mr. MORRIS. Have you read the congressional disclosures and testimony before the congressional committees that Harry Dexter White was a Communist?

Mr. CARTER. I have not read the original text. I read some of the newspaper summaries and, personally, it was inconceivable to me that Harry Dexter White should be a Communist.

Mr. MORRIS. Have you heard the testimony before congressional committees that Lauchlin Currie gave information to an espionage ring in Washington?

Mr. CARTER. No.

The CHAIRMAN. Your telegram was to be inserted in the record?

Mr. MORRIS. That has been introduced, Mr. Chairman.

If necessary, Mr. Chairman, we have Mr. Mandel, who can read the testimony about Mr. Harry Dexter White.

The CHAIRMAN. I do not think so.

Mr. MORRIS. I might say, Mr. Chairman, on these issues, we are going to have testimony later on. I do not think we should break in at this time.

I would like to ask you, inasmuch as you mentioned J. B. Powell in a favorable vein, as anti——

Mr. CARTER. Anti-Japanese, anti-Communist. That is the father, the senior.

Mr. MORRIS. Do you recall an article that J. B. Powell and Max Eastman wrote in the Reader's Digest in 1945?

Mr. CARTER. You have got a copy.

Mr. MORRIS. No. I am asking you to go back to your often vivid recollection.

Mr. CARTER. I don't remember it specifically. I would have to see it. It probably might flash back to me.

Mr. MORRIS. I am going to offer you a letter. It is from you, Edward C. Carter, to Owen Lattimore. The date is June 19, 1945. It reads:

DEAR OWEN: Here is a typed copy of the draft you handed me yesterday. Late last evening I went up to the One Hundred and sixty-sixth Street and saw the son. I discovered that, alas, his father left yesterday for Maine and probably will be gone all summer. I explained the general situation to the son, and said that I would like his advice as to who would be the best single person or group of three or four to sign such a letter. He made some academic suggestions and finally suggested the possibility of his father. He thought it would be better for me to approach him than for him to do so, so he said the chances weren't very good because his father is fatigued and doesn't usually like to take on extra burdens during his holiday.

He also confirmed what I suspected, that the father likes to do his own writing. I am, however, prepared in 2 or 3 days to send the draft to him with as strong and tactful letter as I can write on the off chance that he might be willing to do something.

Does that now recall anything to you?

Mr. CARTER. I remember considering a letter that might conceivably be signed by Thomas W. Lamont of J. P. Morgan & Co. He occasionally writes a rather thoughtful letter to the New York Times. He found I was not in North Haven, Maine. I found his banker son, Thomas S. Lamont, was away and so I went to the third string, his other son, who is a professor at Columbia, his first name being Corliss.

This is the report on that.

Mr. MORRIS. What particular letter did you want written at this time?

Mr. CARTER. What is the date of this?

Mr. MORRIS. This is June 19, 1945. I have already refreshed your recollection, Mr. Carter, to the extent we are talking about J. B. Powell and Max Eastman.

Mr. CARTER. Undoubtedly it was some possible trend in American Government policy that I didn't think was in the American interest. At the moment I can't recall what the issue was.

Mr. MORRIS. Why is it necessary for you to write to Owen Lattimore in this fashion?

Here is a typed copy of the draft you handed me yesterday. Late last evening I went up to One Hundred Sixty Sixth Street and saw the son.

Why is it necessary to use that language? That is an extraordinary way to address a letter.

Mr. CARTER. I don't think so. Ghost writing isn't always publicized. I mean the ghost isn't.

Mr. MORRIS. You are writing to an old friend of yours, Owen Lattimore. Why should it be necessary for you to call Lamont as the son? Were you doing something you didn't want anyone else to know about?

Mr. CARTER. I didn't make it confidential.

Mr. MORRIS. No, it is not marked confidential.

The CHAIRMAN. You might answer that question: Were you doing something you didn't want anyone else to know about?

Mr. CARTER. I think undoubtedly someone in our shop was to do some ghost writing for another person—I have never known it was good etiquette to advertise that very usual American procedure.

Mr. MORRIS. Did you know Corliss Lamont?

Mr. CARTER. No.

Mr. MORRIS. Have you spoken on the same platform with him?

Mr. CARTER. I think once in a war relief—I think on one ocassion, something that used to be Mecca Temple where I spoke on the same platform, but under what auspices I think I would say it was Russian relief, but it may have been some other organization.

Mr. MORRIS. Is Corliss Lamont a Communist?

Mr. CARTER. No.

Mr. MORRIS. How can you be so sure of that?

Mr. CARTER. I think he has done a great deal to put certain aspects of Russian policy in a good light before the American people, but it would take a long time to build up piece by piece why I do not think he is a Communist.

Mr. MORRIS. You were fooled on Dr. Chi, were you not?

Mr. CARTER. I will not admit that I was fooled, that Dr. Chi was a Communist while he was working for the IPR. Many years later, like hundreds of Chinese Nationalists, he went over to the Communists.

I think the fact that a man eventually becomes a Communist does not prove that he was always a Communist any more than it proves that a person who has been a Communist is always a Communist.

Mr. MORRIS. Have you any comment to make on the articles we introduced under the pseudonym of Han-Seng Chen? I mean in a Communist publication by Dr. Chi.

Mr. CARTER. I have not read the article, so I wouldn't like to comment.

Mr. MORRIS. I also would like to introduce at this time an additional letter. I might say, Mr. Chairman, that this letter from Rose Yardumian as well as the one from Mr. Carter, may have been properly introduced, but if not, may I introduce them now?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

(The document referred to was marked "Exhibit No. 26" and is as follows:)

EXHIBIT No. 26

AMERICAN COUNCIL,
INSTITUTE OF PACIFIC RELATIONS,
Washington, January 20, 1944.

Mr. EDWARD C. CARTER,
International Secretariat, Institute of Pacific Relations,
1 East Fifty-fourth Street, New York 22, New York.

DEAR MR. CARTER: I received your letter of January 17 with copies of the telegrams you sent Mr. Hiss and Mr. Currie. I called Alger Hiss yesterday morning and he told me that he had received your wire but was sure that I would understand that he could not make the first advance in arranging a private talk with Rogoff. He mentioned the Rogoff articles in War and the Working Class and that Rogoff's material had caused considerable controversy in circles here. He said that if Larry Todd wanted to bring Rogoff to Hornbeck's office, they would not refuse to see him. I am not sure that I understand the machinations of our State Department. Bill Johnstone saw no point in my trying to get in touch with Mr. Hornbeck directly, since presumably Hiss had consulted with Hornbeck.

Mr. Currie has arranged to see Rogoff at 12 o'clock today. Colonel Faymonville is returning to Washington from New York this morning and is supposed to get on touch with our office then.

Rogoff visited our offices yesterday afternoon and Bill and I had a little talk with him about the small meeting which we had hoped to hold Thursday at 5:30. Rogoff said that he thought that it was unwise for us to hold the meeting; that certain Chinese groups in Washington were very distressed at the fact that he was talking so much. He thinks that it would be bad for the Institute of Pacific Relations to have him speak under its auspices. Bill and Anne Johnstone had hoped to get a small group of people together at their home this evening—the Hornbecks, Remers, Blakeslees, and a few others—but time is very short and many of these people have already made plans for this evening, so the Johnstone idea will probably not come off. However, Rogoff is coming in to our office at 2 o'clock today; Bill is planning to take him to the Cosmos Club to talk with Owen Lattimore, Carl Remer, and John Carter Vincent. After he talks with these people, we are making arrangements to take him to the Library of Congress and a few other places.

I am sorry that our meeting did not work out for him as I know that there are many people here who would have enjoyed hearing him.

Sincerely yours,

Rose,
ROSE YARDUMIAN.

P. S.—I am enclosing a list of the Army-Navy people who have accepted to date.

P. P. S.—Rogoff and Bill have been at the Cosmos Club for the last 2½ hours talking with Lattimore, Remer, and Vincent.

BALLARD LITTLE.

Mr. MORRIS. I would like to introduce by reference one more document, and that is a photostat from the Workers Monthly. This has an early date on it. This is December 1925.

(The document referred to was marked "Exhibit No. 27" and is as follows:)

EXHIBIT No. 27

Positive print of workers monthly with picture of C. T. Chi.
(Filed in biographical folder.)

Mr. MORRIS. This is a picture of C. T. Chi, according to this.

I offer that picture and ask you if you can identify this man here. Is that your friend, Dr. Chi?

Mr. CARTER. It is a damn poor picture. I wouldn't want to stand up and swear that is Chi.

Mr. MORRIS. That is 1925.

Mr. CARTER. Yes; but it is quite a different head, hair cut and avoirdupois, et cetera.

Mr. MORRIS. That is an unusual name, C. T. Chi.

Mr. CARTER. Oh, no.

Is Smith an unusual name?

Mr. MORRIS. I would like to read the inscription with this caption here:

The world of imperialism is passing. Let us join hands with all enemies of imperialism, disregarding race, creed, or nationality—C. T. Chi of the Chinese students alliance who addressed the Congress on anti-imperialism.

Mr. Mandel, would you testify as to the nature of this publication we are discussing?

Mr. MANDEL. The Worker's Monthly, a copy of which I have here, on its masthead, states that it is published by the Daily Worker Society.

At that time that was a Communist publication. The picture was published in connection with an article on the first Negro Workers Congress by Robert Minor, a leader of the Communist Party at that time.

Mr. SOURWINE. If I may interrupt, please, Mr. Mandel has stated that he has the original there. If Mr. Carter could look at the picture in the original which would be black on white instead of white on black, he might make the identification.

Mr. CARTER. This is even more unlike him, in my view. To satisfy me, which is not your business, I would want a little more documentary evidence.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, we have a witness who will testify on this particular score, but I prefer not to introduce this testimony at this time.

May I get back to this letter of June 1945. This is the second paragraph.

There is just one section of your draft that I question slightly, and this is at the bottom of page 3 and top of page 4. This possiblity is precisely what your critics are always advancing. They say that the Soviet Union is definitely going to annex Manchuria, etc. While you put it in reverse, I would hate to have your critics pounce on this and announce that even Lattimore admits that Manchuria is to become a part of the Soviet Union. Do you see any way of avoiding this?

Does that refresh your recollection?

Mr. CARTER. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. You now recall the article in question?

Mr. CARTER. Yes; I have already.

Mr. MORRIS. To what extent?

Mr. CARTER. I have not been able to remember the contents of the Reader's Digest article, or whether I saw it or not.

Mr. MORRIS. Whom did you see in this matter? Who worked on this project? Isn't it so this is a joint effort between you and Mr. Lattimore to draft a reply that you were hoping Thomas Lamont was going to insert in the New York Times?

Mr. CARTER. That was the proposal. It was never carried through. It was never accepted by Mr. Lamont, and, therefore, never published.

Mr. MORRIS. Whom else did you work with on this matter?

Mr. CARTER. I don't remember, except as I indicated earlier, I consulted Corliss Lamont, the second son.

Mr. MORRIS. Do you know a man named T. A. Bisson?

Mr. CARTER. Very well.

Mr. MORRIS. Did you take this matter up with Mr. Bisson?

Mr. CARTER. I don't remember, but if you have got something that will refresh my mind, I will be glad to comment.

Mr. MORRIS. I have here a memorandum "TAB from ECC." That is Mr. T. A. Bisson and that is your nomenclature?

Mr. CARTER. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS (reading):

> What would you think of one of us writing to the Times some such letter as the enclosed first draft? If we should send such a letter I think a final paragraph should be added putting in a plea for a strong united independent China, a China which would inspire the confidence of the world in general and a China which would give confidence to those businessmen who seek mutually advantageous trade between their country and China.

Mr. CARTER. That is a splendid objective.

Mr. MORRIS. I offer this letter to you and ask you to make a comment on that.

Mr. CARTER. I wrote some pretty good stuff.

Mr. MORRIS. Whose reply is on there? Do you recognize the handwriting there?

Mr. CARTER. It is in pencil. I can't make out the initial.

Mr. MORRIS. "TAB."

Mr. CARTER. That is Bisson.

Mr. MORRIS. He thought it was a beautiful piece.

Mr. CARTER. Yes. Clear, objective, uncompromising.

Mr. MORRIS. Is Mr. Bisson a Communist?

Mr. CARTER. No.

Mr. MORRIS. How do you know that, Mr. Carter?

Mr. CARTER. The same way I know my wife is a Communist.

Mr. MORRIS. You mean the same way your wife is not?

Mr. CARTER. Is not a Communist.

Mr. MORRIS. I would like the record straight on that.

Mr. CARTER. Thank you very much.

Mr. MORRIS. I don't quite understand the remark, but I would like you to explain it.

Mr. CARTER. I have known Bisson for a great many years, naturally not as well as I know my wife. I think he is a 100 percent American, very conscientious, very honest, and apparently was so considered.

Mr. MORRIS. Was Mr. Bisson one of the editors of China Today?

Mr. CARTER. I don't remember. You may refresh my memory on that by showing me the masthead of China Today at the time when it was more inclusive than you would expect; I mean in its editorial staff when it included people who were non-Communists quite definitely.

Mr. MORRIS. If you saw T. A. Bisson's name on this publication China Today, you would say that China Today at that time also included non-Communists? Was that your answer?

Mr. CARTER. If his name was on China Today in the early days of that magazine, I would conclude that they were doing perhaps the usual game of including non-Communists as a sort of front.

But whether it was Communist controlled, or not, I don't happen to know because I didn't subscribe to the paper and wasn't intimately familiar with it.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Carter, you do remember Mr. T. A. Bisson's very controversial article published by IPR in 1943, which divided China into two Chinas—one Mr. Bisson called feudal China and one democratic China?

Feudal China he identified as Nationalist China and democratic China he identified as Communist China?

Mr. CARTER. That is right.

Mr. MORRIS. Do you think that is the writing of a man who you could be so sure is not a Communist?

Mr. CARTER. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. Do you think that is the division of China, or was the division of China in 1943?

Mr. CARTER. Certainly not today.

Mr. MORRIS. In 1943, was it?

Mr. CARTER. In 1943 Nationalist China because of the war and other causes was pretty feudal. Chiang Kai-shek admitted a little later that China was feudal and had to modernize.

At that time in 1943 Chinese Communists were not carrying on the rough dirty stuff they are today. They were getting in the villages and the counties something more like a democratic pattern than anything that was happening in Kuomintang China.

I told Bisson I thought that was too much a black and white division; that it was more gray, but I didn't see the article until after it was published.

So my disagreement with him on that terminology had no influence because it was over the dam.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to introduce into the record at this point the article, China's Part in a Coalition War, by T. A. Bisson, wherein he describes the two Chinas, one as feudal China and one as Communist China.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be inserted in the record.

(The document referred to was marked "Exhibit No. 28" and is as follows:)

EXHIBIT NO. 28

[From Far Eastern Survey, American Council, Institute of Pacific Relations, July 14, 1943, vol. XII, No. 14]

CHINA'S PART IN A COALITION WAR

(By T. A. Bisson)

Article starts by recognizing how long China fought alone; then strongly reprimands the China Nationalist Government for demanding that Japan, not Germany, be defeated first. Says this demand plays into the hands of American isolationists. Also reproves China for saying she is near to collapse. Then proceeds (pp. 138–141):

"Still more, it left questions in the minds of many Americans as to what lay behind the ineptness of the political tactics applied to Chinese relations with this country. The answers to these questions must be sought, in large part, in the changes which have occurred in China's political and economic life during the past few years.

"TWO CHINAS

"At the outset of such an analysis, it is necessary to repeat an important generalization stressed by many commentators on Chinese affairs—that the early promise held out by the war for the broadening and deepening of Chinese national unity through the achievement of liberal political and economic reforms, has not been fulfilled.[1] This promise, in fact, died early in the war.

[1] See, for a recent example, Pearl Buck, A Warning About China, Life, May 10, 1943, pp. 53–56.

"It received its best documentary expression in The Program of National Resistance and Reconstruction adopted by an emergency session of the Kuomintang Congress at Hankow, on March 29, 1938.[2] The democratic provisions even of this program, which was not without shortcomings, were not carried out, and this high point of the first year of the war soon became a melancholy landmark.

"Early in 1939 the Kuomintang conservatives became alarmed at the rapid reconquest and reorganization of territories behind the Japanese lines by the Eighth Route and New Fourth, Communist-led armies.[3]

"Clashes, at first sporadic, soon became more frequent. Early in 1941, the New Fourth Army was outlawed by the Chungking military authorities, following an abortive effort to destroy its headquarters corps and crush its leadership. Central Government aid to the Eighth Route Army had meanwhile lapsed; and the blockade of the Shen-Kan-Ning border region by Kuomintang forces, numbering some 500,000 and commanded by Gen. Hu Tsung-nan, has since continued.

"A year or more before Pearl Harbor, therefore, two Chinas had definitely emerged. Each had its own government, its own military forces, its own territories. More significant, each had its own characteristic set of political and economic institutions. One is now generally called Kuomintang China; the other is called Communist China.

"However, these are only party labels. To be more descriptive, the one might be called feudal China; the other, democratic China.[4] These terms express the actualities as they exist today, the real institutional distinctions between the two Chinas.

"COMPARISON OF CASUALTIES INFLICTED

"In an attempt to analyze these differences, it should be recognized at once that one is not dealing with irrelevant abstractions. The institutions which characterize one China as feudal and the other as democratic have the most practical relevance to the leading problems of the day. They are, in fact, the determinants of all policies, domestic and international, espoused by the two Chinas. They explain, as will be indicated, why Kuomintang China is compelled to demand immediate aid on a scale so great as to necessitate reversal of United Nations' global military strategy. They also explain the declining rate of casualties inflicted on the Japanese by the Kuomintang Armies, as contrasted with the increasing rate of casualties inflicted by the Eighth Route and New Fourth Armies.

"According to official reports, the Kuomintang Armies have inflicted on the Japanese average annual casualties (in a total of 66 months) of 354,935, while the combined annual average for the Eighth Route (58 months' total) and the New Fourth (48 months' total) amounted to 113,338. For the last comparable year (July 1941–June 1942), however, the absolute figures are respectively 182,094 and 130,010. In other words, the Kuomintang Armies show an average annual record of 76 percent of total casualties inflicted, but in 1941–42 their achievement falls to only 58 percent of the total. On the other hand, the record of the Eighth Route and New Fourth Armies was lifted to 42 percent of the total in 1941–42, as against an annual average of 24 percent.

"The significance of this comparison is that it excludes the problems of blockade and foreign aid. Indeed, in these respects, the advantage lies entirely on the side of the Kuomintang Armies. They are supported by incomparably larger populations and richer territories. They have enjoyed the benefit of virtually all the military and economic aid rendered China by foreign nations. Since before Pearl Harbor, the Eighth Route and New Fourth armies have been doubly blockaded, by the Japanese on one side and by the Kuomintang Armies on the other.

"The differences indicated by the casualty figures must therefore be explained solely on the basis of efficiency or lack of efficiency in the mobilization of the human and material resources of the two Chinas. This question forces one back to an examination of the institutions which differentiate the two regions.

[3] It is important to note that the "reorganization"—involving land reforms and electoral procedures in local government—was as much opposed as the "reconquest." For the emergence of effective political unity in China required, on the part of the Kuomintang, the acceptance of at least these minimal land and electoral reforms.

[4] The term "feudal," as here used, is intended to define a society in which the landlord-peasant relationship is dominant and autocracy in government centers around this relationship.

"DEMOCRATIC CHINA

"The key to the successful mobilization of the war potential of so-called Communist China lies in the extent to which its leaders have thrown off the feudal incubus which has weighed China down for centuries. No single measure can be pointed to as the open sesame which has increasingly achieved this objective. Economic reforms have been intertwined with political reforms, the one supporting the other. Basic to the whole program has been the land reform which has freed the peasant—the primary producer in these areas, and, indeed, over most of China—from the crushing weight of rent, taxes, and usurious interest charges as levied by a feudal economy.

"But the ingenuity of this reform, without which it could hardly be made to work, is that the newly introduced procedures of local democracy serve as the final sanction. The landlord and entrepreneur are not excluded from this process, but neither are they permitted to dominate it. Tax assessment committees, for example, are controlled by a majority of local members and exercise a strictly local jurisdiction. Farmers know well what their neighbors own.

"Over wide areas of this new China, elected councils—village, town, and district—and elected executive officials have completely supplanted the old autocratic system of feudal agrarian China. These councils and officials are either unpaid or receive mere pittances which leave them no better off economically than their fellow citizens.

"It is this democratic process, finally, which permits a large measure of free competition to operate over the whole of the economy. Bureaucratic price controls are not attempted. They are as unnecessary in this society as they would be in a New England town meeting. No landlord or merchant, with the watchful eyes of his neighbors upon him, can engage in hoarding or speculation. Within limits set mainly by local democratic checks, the individual landlord or entrepreneur is free, and is even encouraged, to expand his operations, and many are doing so.

"By no stretch of the imagination can this be termed 'communism'; it is, in fact, the essence of bourgeois democracy, applied mainly to agrarian conditions. The leaders in Yenan see in this program more than the answer to China's immediate problem of efficiently mobilizing her resources for the war against Japan. They see in it also the means of throwing off China's feudal shackles, the transition to modern nationhood.

"FEUDAL CHINA

"The declining curve of military achievement by the Kuomintang Armies is correlated with a progressive decrease in the economic strength of Kuomintang China. While this decrease is notable, there is no need to adopt the alarmist view that collapse is inevitable. The human and material resources of Kuomintang China are large. Its economic reserves are still considerable. So also are its military reserves and potentialities.

"General Ch'en Ch'eng's use of the term 'negligence' clearly implied that more could be done with the military resources at hand than was being done. Concentration on the demand for more planes and guns from abroad, in other words, was getting in the way of full utilization of the weapons and forces at hand. General Ch'en Ch'eng has since given a specific illustration of this situation by pointing out that the American planes were based too far from the fighting fronts to be fully effective in the Hupeh campaign.[5] An attitude of military passivity is revealed by this failure to develop facilities for air action near the front. The alert, active seizure of opportunities open even to limited means is evidently lacking.

"These considerations also apply to the economic sphere, although the problem is far more complicated and difficult. Here, too, General Ch'en Ch'eng's comments go straight to the nub of the issue. He states that 'there should be unrelenting vigilance and intensified preparations for counterattacks through military, political, and economic coordination.[6]

"This is a demand for more vigorous action on the home front, with an emphasis sharply different from pleas for help from outside. As has already been seen, questions of blockade and outside aid are not necessarily decisive for effective military resistance, providing an efficient economic mobilization is accomplished.

[5] New York Times, June 28, 1943. The same paper on June 29 carried Ch'en Ch'eng's statement that China needed "guns and equipment of all kinds," and would welcome "even one-thousandth part of 1 percent" of United States production.

[6] China Daily News, June 19, 1943.

"In Kuomintang China, such a mobilization is severely handicapped by the leaders' unwillingness to challenge the basic postulates of the feudal system. No serious effort has been made to uproot the landlord-usurer system. With the port cities and their nascent bourgeois class removed, the landlords have become the economic mainstay of the Kuomintang regime.

"BUREAUCRACY TIGHTENS HOLD

"At the same time, the bureaucracy has taken over administration of a considerable slice of industrial production. Many industries have become government monopolies, not forced to maintain themselves in competition with private industry. Industrial development under private initiative, valuable as an offset to feudal relations, and needed in an economy of scarcity, was thus choked off at the very time when stimulation of the entrepreneur was justified. The declining numbers and strength of the industrial class weakened its challenge to the landlord-bureaucrat regime thereby putting new props under the tottering structure of Chinese feudalism.

"In these circumstances, there could be no real progress toward democratic reform or wider civil liberties. Inauguration of constitutional government, considered for a time in 1938, was eventually shelved for the duration. Non-Kuomintang representatives on the People's Political Council, which could have evolved into a national legislature, have steadily decreased. Over the new Political Councils in the provinces, Kuomintang control is carefully maintained. In the so-called 'new Hsien system,' embodying the program for instituting representative local government, candidates will be limited to those who have acceptably passed through Kuomintang training schools, while suffrage will be indirect and linked to the household units of the pao-chia system. These developments do not promise to create effective popular checks on the Kuomintang bureauracy.

"With no effort at reform of the land system or initiation of democratic processes, the two basic prerequisites for an efficient wartime economic mobilization were lacking. As conditions deteriorated, successive measures looking toward the institution of a 'controlled economy' were introduced. The bureaucracy steadily expanded until its relative cost, measured against the limited output of the productive system, itself became a drag on the war effort.

"Even so, it could institute neither price nor commodity controls that were adequate to stay the course of inflation. Grain hoarding and speculation, the key factor in Kuomintang China's inflationary problem could be curbed by nothing less than genuine popular participation in application of the controls. This solution was barred. In a country predominately agrarian, with the landlords still entrenched in their feudal positions, no centralized government organ could send out the multitude of agents required to enforce its paper controls. Turn as it would, the bureaucracy could not solve this problem, and the economic foundations of the war effort were increasingly undermined.

"It is at this point that the true relevance of foreign aid to an economy of the Kuomintang model becomes evident. In order to conduct war on the basis of such an economy, access to the outside world is imperative. Steady injections of foreign supplies were in fact pumped into Kuomintang China up to Pearl Harbor, although in declining amounts after 1940.

"This extreme dependence on aid from the outside is a key which unlocks many mysteries. It provides an adequate explanation for the declining rate of the Kuomintang armies' military achievements. It also explains the persistent outcry in Chungking for a reversal of United Nations' strategy, as expressed in the editorials of its leading papers.[7] The desperate need for outside assistance felt by Kuomintang China could only be met by such a reversal of strategy, since this alone would bring aid quickly on a large scale. And, finally, this appeal was logically transferred directly to the United States in the propaganda campaign conducted last winter.

"Obviously, the resources available in free China are much too limited to encompass the defeat of Japan. Large amounts of outside supplies are essential if the Chinese armies are to be equipped for successful offensives. Until then, however, the need is for the most effective utilization and development of the resources at hand.

"Elements within Kuomintang China are making efforts to achieve this end, as indicated by the forthright statements of General Che'en Ch'eng. Strong forces are working to establish greater freedom for the entrepreneur, as a means to increase industrial production. The industrial cooperative movement, once freed of bureaucratic restrictions, would be able to forge ahead more rapidly. With proper encouragement, these sound elements within Kuomintang China can do much to overcome current economic weaknesses, although more thoroughgoing reforms are necessary in order to effect complete mobilization.

[7] See excerpts in article by Guenther Stein, Far Eastern Survey, June 14, 1943, p. 117.

"A COALITION WAR—AND ITS REQUIREMENTS

"The United States, as the arsenal of democracy, bears a heavy responsibility for the war program of the United Nations. Its immense productive effort has begun to register with increasing effect on the war fronts. As the German tide in Europe recedes, the pressure on Japan will steadily increase. It is clearly essential that China, which has borne the heat and burden of the defensive in the Far East, should have a full and significant share in the victorious offensives that are now in the making. Toward this end, it would be advisable that China be given an adequate voice in framing the decisions on strategic policy. But China herself must change, if she is to make her full contribution to a coalition war.

"Realistic thinking on this problem will be stimulated if there is candid recognition that two Chinas exist at the present time. The task of statesmanship is to merge these two Chinas into one. To be sound and effective, such unification must come on the high plane of social advance and democratic reform. Until unification is achieved on this plane, China's full strength cannot be placed behind the war effort.

"It is also necessary to recognize that Kuomintang China is passing through a serious crisis. The challenge is for a renewal of the forward-looking elements in the party of Sun Yat-sen and a bold cutting loose from an archaic past. Defections of allegiance, already occurring, will tend to increase as reform is postponed, and the leadership of the China of the future may well pass to the progressive forces outside the Kuomintang.

"These issues in China pose a delicate and difficult problem for the other members of the United Nations. They are issues of such fundamental importance, however, that they cannot be ignored. Not only does the effective prosecution of the war during its final phase depend on the answers—the future status of China as a healthy and vigorous Nation, in which the people's livelihood is safeguarded by democratic processes, is at stake. Only such a China, moreover, can bring to the family of nations that level of constructive statesmanship that will be needed to guard the peace that the war has won."

Mr. CARTER. I hope you will emphasize the bouquets he gave to Chiang Kai-shek's government.

Mr. MORRIS. I would also ask Mr. Mandel if he would report to us, or testify for us, on the question of whether or not Mr. T. A. Bisson's name appeared as one of the editors of China Today.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Mandel, what does your record show?

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Mandel does not have the information on China Today with him at this time, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to introduce into the record the letter of E. C. Carter to Mr. Lattimore, dated June 19, 1945, and the memorandum of Mr. Bisson, and I think in all fairness to Mr. Lamont, I would like to introduce into the record his reply which he wrote on July 5, 1945, to Mr. Carter, in which he told him very strongly that he would not be willing to put his name to a draft of an article, the draft you, Mr. Bisson, and Mr. Lattimore, had worked on, Mr. Carter.

The CHAIRMAN. The documents will be received.

(The documents referred to were marked "Exhibits Nos. 29, 30, and 31," inclusive, and are as follows:)

EXHIBIT No. 29

JUNE 19, 1945.

OWEN LATTIMORE, ESQ.,
Roland View Road, Ruxton 4, Md.

DEAR OWEN: Here is a typed copy of the draft you handed me yesterday. Late last evening I went up to the One Hundred and Sixty-sixth Street and saw the son. I discovered that, alas, his father left yesterday for Maine and probably will be gone all summer. I explained the general situation to the son and said that I would like his advice as to who would be the best single person or group of three or four to sign such a letter. He made some academic suggestions and then finally suggested the possibility of his father. He thought it would be better for me to approach him than for him to do so, though he said the chances weren't very good because his father is fatigued and doesn't usually like to take on extra burdens during his holiday. He also confirmed what I suspected, that the father likes to do his own writing. I am, however, prepared in 2 or 3 days to send the draft to him with as strong and tactful a letter as I can write on the off-chance that he might be willing to do something.

There is just one section of your draft that I question slightly and this is at the bottom of page 3 and top of page 4. This possibility is precisely what your critics are always advancing. They say that the Soviet Union is definitely going to annex Manchuria, etc. While you put it in reverse, I would hate to have your critics pounce on this and announce that even Lattimore admits that Manchuria is to become a part of the Soviet Union. Do you see any way of avoiding this?

Sincerely yours,

EDWARD C. CARTER.

P. S.—May I make one more suggestion? That is, that you add a final paragraph in which the author puts in a plea for a strong, united, independent China; a China which would inspire the confidence of the American people in general and a China which would give confidence to those American businessmen who seek mutually advantageous trade between the United States and China.

EXHIBIT No. 30

JUNE 20, 1945.

T. A. B. from E. C. C.

What would you think of one of us writing to the Times some such letter as the enclosed first draft? If we should send such a letter I think a final paragraph should be added putting in a plea for a strong, united, independent China; a China which would inspire the confidence of the world in general and a China which would give confidence to those businessmen who seek mutually advantageous trade between their country and China.

At the bottom of page 3 and top of page 4, I am wondering whether Eastman and company might pick up the reference to north China's adhesion to Russia and shout that it just proves his point that Russia plans to annex Manchuria.

This is a beautiful piece—clear, objective, uncompromising. It should have a big effect in the Times.

I would not change the page 3–4 statement. The threat developing should be made clear in all its dimensions, as this statement does.

The end could be strengthened just along the lines you say.

In short, I agree with your whole piece, with a few changes as indicated, but these are not material, if you dislike them.

T. A. B.

EXHIBIT No. 31

NORTH HAVEN, MAINE, July 5, 1945.

EDWARD C. CARTER, ESQ.,
Institute of Pacific Relations,
New York 22, N. Y.

MY DEAR CARTER: Many thanks for yours of June 29. You are too flattering about my casual letters to the New York Times. I, too, have been concerned over the steady drip against Russia by various commentators. Max Eastman has always been a weather cock, veering from pro-Trotsky to bitter anti-Soviet. Powell I had thought better of.

I have read the Reader's Digest article and have gone over with care your memorandum. In effect I think you are suggesting that I write to the Times a letter urging our Government to alter its apparent present policy, and to make available lend-lease supplies to the so-called Communist armies in northwest China. Quite aside from any question of transport to such a remote region, the principle involved seems to be that I should assume knowledge of the situation, and of the proper policy to be drawn from same—more adequate than our Government has.

Of course, I have no such knowledge and could not justify myself in attempting to correct the policy adopted. My way would always be first to seek information from the Department at Washington. As a matter of fact, even in my letters to the Times when any possible question of current policy was involved, I have first shown the letters to the Department of State, not for approval but for clearance as to any question of crossing wires.

You know your China better than I do, for my stay there was hardly more than a month or two. But we both realize how exceedingly complicated the situation is and is bound to be. Chiang's government now loosely rules all eastern and southern China (subject to Japanese occupation). The area includes all the great cities. Now, if Chiang has his doubts as to the effectiveness of the Chinese Communist armies against the Japanese—and such question has been many times raised—and if Chiang is fearful that once Japan is ousted, then those northern armies will turn on him, perhaps he is justified in feeling that the meager supplies available for China should be furnished for his armies and not for the other boys. In your memorandum you point out that Russia has been scrupulous to send supplies to Chiang alone. Well, if that be true, why is that not additional argument for us to do the same?

I am really discussing things about which I have no first-hand information. And in reading your memorandum I may well have just been stupid. Am I all wrong?

With personal regards,

Sincerely yours,

T. W. LAMONT.

(Written but not signed by Mr. Lamont.)

The CHAIRMAN. This piece of paper I hold in my hand dated June 20, 1945, TAB from ECC, with some handwriting on the bottom, what do you want to do about that?

Mr. MORRIS. That was introduced, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. What are you going to do with the handwriting on the bottom?

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Carter, it could be the handwritten reply of T. A. Bisson?

Mr. CARTER. I think so; yes.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

Mr. MORRIS. When you use the expression that, "A former White Russian is currently pink," what do you mean?

Mr. CARTER. What year and who was the guy?

Mr. MORRIS. I am going to introduce a letter that you wrote to Harriette Moore. I think we have discussed Harriette Moore before.

On 12–10–45—that is December 10, 1945—I would like to call your attention to the last sentence on the first paragraph that ends on page 2.

Mr. CARTER. Is there a white copy of this?

The CHAIRMAN. I am informed it is in the other room.

Mr. CARTER. Do you want me to comment on it?

Mr. MORRIS. Why do you call a White Russian wholesomely pink?

Mr. CARTER. I didn't.

The Master of Balliol—that is the head of Oxford, a most ancient college. He had told me that this guy, Kovanolov, though a White Russian, was now wholesomely pink and he would have to ask the Master of Balliol and me what he meant.

Mr. MORRIS. Didn't you agree with that interpretation at the time? Will you read the preceding paragraph?

The CHAIRMAN. Was there an article by Bisson?

Mr. MORRIS. It was inserted in the record, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. CARTER. Here I am reporting on varied activities in England where I sought to establish contact with Englishmen interested in Russian studies. I saw the heads of various colleges and London institutions.

Also the editor of the London Times, and several others.

A proposal was made that a full professor of Russian at Oxford now at New College, Oxford, one time was at Birmingham University, whom I saw and that he was a great pal of Samuel Cross at Harvard, who was a great Slavic scholar and highly regarded.

They asked the Academy of Science in Moscow to send a philologist for a year to Oxford.

Mr. MORRIS. The expression in the fourth paragraph of the letter is:

Kovanolov, the new full professor of Russian at Oxford, is now at New College. He is a White Russian who left the Soviet Union legitimately in the early days on the advice of Gorki.

What do you mean by that?

Mr. CARTER. I was told in Oxford he was not an emigre from the Soviet Union, as what the Bolsheviks would call a flow of the people.

Mr. MORRIS. He was in good graces with the Soviet Union?

Mr. CARTER. He was in good graces enough to get out.

Mr. MORRIS. And he had the advice of Gorki?

Mr. CARTER. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. Who was the Master of Balliol?

Mr. CARTER. I don't remember. I think it was——

Mr. MORRIS. Was it Michael Lindsey's father?

Mr. CARTER. Was it H. A. L. Lindsey who has a son called Michael, whom I did not meet at that time?

Mr. MORRIS. Wasn't Michael Lindsey active in IPR?

Mr. CARTER. He wrote one or two articles for the IPR. He was a member of the Royal Institute of International Affairs in England, and did a great deal of work for the British Foreign Office, bringing out information from Communists and Nationalist China to aid in the British war effort.

Mr. MORRIS. Was Michael Lindsey a member of the Communist Party?

Mr. CARTER. I never heard of it.

Mr. MORRIS. When you wrote here that the Master of Balliol: "told me that Kovanolov, though a White Russian, was now wholesomely pink," what did you understand it to mean by Kovanolov?

Mr. CARTER. I cannot speak for the most distinguished head of an Oxford College.

The CHAIRMAN. The question was what you meant when you used that language.

Mr. MORRIS. When you were writing to Harriette Moore.

Mr. CARTER. I was quoting someone else. Now I am going to do what Sourwine says I shouldn't, try to reconstruct because I don't remember. If I am allowed to reconstruct——

Mr. MORRIS. By all means.

Mr. CARTER. Several types of people come out of Russia—those who like Russia but hate the Communist system; those who are fed up and never want to go back, and those who don't like the Communist system, but want to go back when the present gang is thrown out.

This fellow is a philologist, so interested in philology, astrometry, or what not, that they spend their time on their profession instead of becoming professional anti-Soviet agitators.

I know quite a number of Russians who want to keep off of political questions and go on with their scientific job. I assume that is what the Master of Balliol meant.

Mr. SOURWINE. Since you have brought up the subject of reconstruction, I would like to go even back of that and ask you if you can recall whether the Master of Balliol actually used these precise words to you?

Mr. CARTER. I can't recall.

The CHAIRMAN. What is that?

Mr. CARTER. I cannot recall whether he used those.

This reads:

The Master of Balliol had told me that Konaolov, though a White Russian, was now wholesomely pink.

Mr. SOURWINE. Did he use to you the words "wholesomely pink"?

Mr. CARTER. I can't swear to it. I don't think I would have invented it if he hadn't used it.

Mr. SOURWINE. If he didn't use the words "wholesomely pink," he used something else that meant the same thing to you?

Mr. CARTER. I was trying to recall the impression I got out of what he was driving at.

Mr. SOURWINE. Don't you usually put quotation marks around somebody else's words when you are trying to convey the fact you are quoting them?

Mr. CARTER. Not always; sorry to say.

Mr. SOURWINE. In this case you were attempting to convey your memory of the precise words that had been used by the master of Balliol to you?

Mr. CARTER. That is right. This was written from London clearly after a very recent visit to Oxford.

Senator O'CONOR. Mr. Carter, there is another letter, a copy of which is before me, and I would be very pleased to have you read it, if you so desire, and one which I do not think has previously been examined by you during this interrogation. It is under date of April 12, 1943. It is addressed to the Honorable John H. Kerr, chairman of the Subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

It is regarding T. A. Bisson. If I make references, I would be glad to make it available to you.

The specific point I would like to bring out has to do with the question of the time when Dr. Jessup was in part control or sole control of the editorial policy of IPR.

Was there such a period?

Mr. CARTER. There was no period where he was editor or chairman of the research committee.

There were periods when he was chairman of the American IPR and another period when he was chairman of the Pacific Council.

He was never on the paid staff.

Senator O'CONOR. Wasn't he chairman of the research advisory committee of the American Council?

Mr. CARTER. He was.

Senator O'CONOR. What time was that?

Mr. CARTER. I can't give you the date without looking.

Senator O'CONOR. This letter from you to Mr. Kerr contains this reference:

Dr. Philip Jessup was chairman of the institute at that time. This assignment was given to Mr. Bisson with Dr. Jessup's full approval.

Under separate cover I am sending you a copy of the book in order that you may familiarize yourself with the quality of his writing. This book has high praise from a good many American experts on the Far East.

Then you go on to attest to Mr. Bisson's 100-percent Americanism.

Does that correctly state the fact as to the time and Dr. Jessup's position?

Mr. CARTER. I don't find here in my hurried reading—the book on American policy in the Far East?

Senator O'CONOR. That is right.

Mr. CARTER (reading):

Dr. Jessup, of Columbia, was chairman of the institute at that time, and this assignment was given to Mr. Bisson with Dr. Jessup's full approval. I am sending a copy under separate cover.

I have just said I think correctly Dr. Jessup was not chairman of the research committee or a research officer.

However, in the series of inquiry volumes some 40 titles are listed that Mr. Holland and I had immediate supervision of. We had an executive committee of Dennery, a Frenchman; Angus, an eminent Canadian; and a third person I have forgotten.

But in setting up this Rockefeller finance project on the issues of the Sino-Japanese War, it was arranged that the whole operation be under the direction of whoever was chairman of the institute.

During part of that time it was Dr. Jessup.

Senator O'CONOR. Did he at any time substitute for you, or replace you when you were away?

Mr. CARTER. Jessup? No; never.

Senator O'CONOR. Was there any period during which you were away from the country and had anyone else to take your place in the current matters?

Mr. CARTER. That would have been Mr. Holland, if I remember rightly.

Mr. Jessup was a volunteer at a higher echelon. I was paid.

Senator O'CONOR. There is one other point, Mr. Carter, I would like to ask you about. That is regarding Mr. Lattimore's association with Frederick V. Field.

I have before me a letter which is dated October 17, 1940, addressed by Owen Lattimore to Mr. F. V. Field, American Peace Mobilization, 1116 Vermont Avenue NW., Washington, D. C.

DEAR FRED: Enclosed I am sending you an article submitted to me by Asiaticus. For readers of Pacific Affairs, it would read like propaganda, and rhapsodical propaganda at that.

During this period from and after October 17, was Mr. Lattimore in more or less direct contact with Mr. Field, to your knowledge?

Mr. CARTER. October 17, 1940—Lattimore, I think, was still editor of Pacific Affairs. I think he continued for a few months into 1941.

He also sent drafts of articles submitted to him to quite a variety of people of different points of view. I would have to ask Lattimore to verify the letter.

On the surface it looks as though Lattimore wrote this letter to Field.

Senator O'CONOR. It shows a very friendly relationship, does it not?

Mr. CARTER. Yes.

In 1944, yes. In 1940, yes. The break with Field intellectually came when he joined the American Peace Mobilization.

Mr. MORRIS. What is the date?

Mr. CARTER. October 17, 1940.

Senator O'CONOR. That is addressed to him at the American Peace Mobilization?

Mr. CARTER. But shortly after. Wasn't this the year?

Mr. MORRIS. It was after.

Mr. CARTER. But not much after?

Mr. MORRIS. It was after.

Mr. CARTER. Continuing on your point, when Mr. Field was pressured in Chicago to join the American Peace Mobilization, as I remember it, he phoned both Mr. Jessup and myself saying that for conscience sake he thought he ought to join this movement and, therefore, as it was an action thing, resign from the IPR. He thought it would embarrass the IPR as an action movement, but he at that time felt, as many Americans did, that we were being euchred into a Daladier-Chamberlain war.

It was the phony war period, and he was willing to fight for king and country, or for President and country, in a real war for democracy, but he did not want to fight for Chamberlain and Daladier, and eventually the French and the British decided they didn't want to fight for Chamberlain.

Changes were made. Churchill became Prime Minister of England.

In the meantime, pacifists, clergymen, and a bunch of Communists started this organization. Ultimately they took over.

Jessup and I tried to persuade Fred Field he would regret it all of his life. He is now paying a bit of the price.

Senator O'CONOR. The other topic in this general connection about which I would like to ask you had to do with a series of communications between you and Lauchlin Currie, copies of which have been introduced in evidence. I do not know whether you have read them.

Mr. CARTER. I would like to look at them.

Senator O'CONOR. I give them to you first. They show a series of telegrams from you to Lauchlin Currie at the White House, and letters.

My question is whether or not that was at or about the time that you were interested in the possible commissioning of Mr. Field as an intelligence officer in the United States Army?

The CHAIRMAN. What is the date?

Senator O'CONOR. May 1942.

Mr. CARTER. One is May 5, 1942, and one is September 17, 1941; one is January 21, 1941; one is May 4, 1941.

Is there any mention of Field in here?

Senator O'CONOR. Not in the telegrams.

What were you telegraphing him about? Or what did you wish to see him about on these occasions?

Mr. CARTER. On two or three occasions Mr. Hull and Mr. Welles thought I should inform the White House of what I was doing as president of Russian War Relief. Whenever the few times I wanted some information given to the President, I did it through Currie, one of his executive assistants.

There are so vague as to what the purport of a visit was, but I think I saw Hiss quite as much after talking with Sumner Welles about Russian relief, about the IPR.

(After the hearing was closed, witness informed the reporter that Hiss, above referred to, should be Currie.)

Senator O'CONOR. You don't recall any further representations you made to Lauchlin Currie about the possible Field commission?

Mr. CARTER. What do the records show as to the time that Field was invited by one or two people in the War Department to apply for a commission? What year?

Mr. MORRIS. It is in 1942.

Mr. CARTER. A good many of these letters are 1941, before that came up. I may or may not.

Senator O'CONOR. Yesterday we asked you as to what other places in the Government, if any, you were recommending for Mr. Field. I think you volunteered the information, although you weren't given very much time to think it over, possibly OWI and in OSS, if I recall; is that right?

Mr. CARTER. That was sort of a hunch. It was a possibility.

Senator O'CONOR. Upon further reflection of the matter, since yesterday, can you give us any more specific information as to what other places, if any?

Mr. CARTER. No. I racked my brain last night. As I said, I definitely wrote a letter when I knew that officers of the War Department asked him to apply. I wrote quite sincerely saying I thought he would be useful, but I don't remember at all when that avenue closed what, if anything; I did for other appointments.

Mr. MORRIS. I have one other question.

I would like to show you a copy of a letter that we discussed in executive session. This is a letter from you to Brooke Claxton in Montreal, dated October 31, 1938. It reads:

DEAR CLAXTON: Fred Field from San Francisco has sent me an amusing answer to my inquiry for American speakers. I should say that W. T. Stone of the Foreign Policy Association was well qualified. Raymond Leslie Buell is more forceful and more sure of his views than Stone.

If the Canadian Club can stand the general secretary of the Communist Party in the United States, Earl Browder would give you an exceedingly interesting, pleasantly provocative, but a really important statement on the Roosevelt administration either from the point of view of its internal or its foreign policy. He is really very well informed, and, contrary to the public view, is 100-percent American.

Do you remember our discussion in executive session on that?

Mr. CARTER. Yes; and you have given me more information which I welcome, because in the form I am reading, you did not give me the lead which said that this was an amusing answer to my inquiry.

I knew Claxton well. He had a wonderful sense of humor. He is now Minister of Defense in Canada. He asked me for speakers. I gave him a mixed group—a brilliant fellow, a dramatic, Leslie Buell.

I said if the Canadian Club can stand the general secretary of the Communist Party in the United States, Earl Browder would give you an exceedingly interesting, pleasantly provocative, but a really important statement on the Roosevelt administration.

Mr. MORRIS. In executive session you never claimed it was said in frolic and banter?

Mr. CARTER. Here you helped me. You hand me today—

Mr. MORRIS. If you concede it, you have said he was 100 percent American, and I do not see why it would be frolic and banter.

Mr. CARTER. Because you have given me a letter in which I refer to it as an amusing instance.

Mr. MORRIS. Was your testimony in executive session not true testimony?

Mr. CARTER. My testimony in executive session was without this document you have just handed me.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is: Was it true?

Mr. CARTER. I intended it to be true. It was true.

Mr. MORRIS. It may not have made sense.

Mr. CARTER. At that time people in Canada and the United States were inviting Soviet diplomats to make speeches. Most of them spoke poor English. They did not understand North American psychology. Browder, in his Kansas way, had a 100-percent American look, knew our vernacular. If they wanted something amusing and provocative, they would get a better dose of the true Communist gospel, more vivid terms, from an American than from a Russian.

Mr. MORRIS. That is what you mean by 100-percent American?

Mr. CARTER. Yes.

I didn't mean and Claxton wouldn't mean—

Mr. MORRIS. I would like the record to show the following documents with which in the course of the last hour we have neglected to introduce:

One is a letter from Mr. Carter to Mr. Lattimore, dated June 20, 1941, which I understand has not been introduced.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be inserted.

(The document referred to was marked "Exhibit No. 32" and is as follows:)

OWEN LATTIMORE, ESQ.,
300 Gilman Hall, Johns Hopkins University,
Baltimore, Md.

DEAR OWEN: If you have time while in San Francisco you and Bill Holland may want to arrange a private talk with Col. Philip R. Faymonville whose present address is Headquarters of the Fourth Army, Presidio of San Francisco, Calif.

He would, I think, have been thoroughly at home and at ease if he had lunched with us at the Mayflower on Wednesday. I think you get the idea. It may be that if you get the same favorable impression of him which Harriet Moore and I have, he might be someone who could be exceptionally useful to you and the Generalissimo at some future time in Chungking. If you wish me to I will wire him for an appointment.

Sincerely yours,

EDWARD C. CARTER.

Mr. MORRIS. One is a letter that Senator O'Conor made reference to, which is a letter from Edward Carter, dated April 12, 1943, to Hon. John R. Kerr.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be inserted in the record.

(The document referred to was marked "Exhibit No. 33," and is as follows:)

EXHIBIT NO. 33

NEW YORK CITY, April 12, 1943.

Regarding T. A. Bisson.

Hon. JOHN H. KERR,
Chairman, Special Subcommittee on Committee on Appropriations,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have known Mr. Bisson personally for more than 10 years. He was a member of the American delegation to the IPR Conference at Yosemite National Park in 1936. The late Hon. Newton D. Baker was chairman of that delegation.

As a member of the research staff of the Foreign Policy Association, I have followed Mr. Bisson's scholarly writing on the Far East very closely. He has consistently maintained a high standard of objectivity. Indeed, his work is of such a high order that in 1938 the institute asked him to write a book on American policy in the Far East. Dr. Philip C. Jessup, of Columbia University, was chairman of the institute at that time and this assignment was given to Mr. Bisson with Dr. Jessup's full approval. Under separate cover I am sending you a copy of that book in order that you may familiarize yourself with the quality of his writing. This book has received high praise from a great many outstanding American experts on the Far East. It has consequently had a wide sale and is a standard reference book in a great many public and university libraries.

Mr. Bisson is 100 percent American. He was alert to the Japanese menace long before the general public became aware of the implications to the peace of America of Japanese aggression and in many of his writings he faithfully stated the issues that the United States must face vis-à-vis Japanese military expansion.

If you wish further information please let me know.

Sincerely yours,

EDWARD C. CARTER.

Mr. MORRIS. The other is a letter from Mr. Carter to Harriette Moore, dated October 12, 1945.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be inserted in the record.

(The document referred to was marked "Exhibit No. 34," and is as follows:)

EXHIBIT NO. 34

(Copy of this letter sent to Dr. Percy E. Corbett and Dr. Owen Lattimore.)

PARK LANE HOTEL,
London W. 1, October 12, 1945.

Miss HARRIETT MOORE,
American Russian Institute, 58 Park Avenue, New York, N. Y.

DEAR HARRIET: Among my rather too varied activities in England I have tried for the sake of the IPR to establish as many contacts as possible with those who are interested in Russian studies. Yesterday I visited the School of Slavonic Studies and had a long talk with Miss Dorothy Galton, whom you probably met on her recent visit to North America. She kindly gave me for our private use this copy of her report to the Rockefeller Foundation. You will notice that it has everything except her conclusions. Doubtless I can get her conclusions from Marshall when I reach New York. If Corbett has not seen her report, I think he will doubtless want to do so and eventually I want to show it to Belshaw and others. The London school is hanging on by its ears and is pretty well bereft of staff; they tried to get E. H. Carr, now of the London Times, to take Sir Bernard Pears' place, but the higher-ups in London University black-balled him. They are now intriguing with Vernadsky of Yale to lure him to London for the twilight of his life.

At Oxford on my first visit I had a useful talk on both Russian and Chinese studies with Maurice Bowra, the warden of Wadham. He spent his early days in China and at that time knew Chinese and learnt Russian and when some Red Army men visited Oxford he surprised everyone by bursting forth into good Russian. He is going to be a useful man not only at Oxford for Chinese and Russian studies, but could ultimately be of use to the IPR.

On my second visit I saw Sumner, the new warden of All Souls. You are probably familiar with his recent book on Russia. He is intensely interested and is behind the whole new movement at Oxford to found serious schools of Arabic, Indian, Chinese, and Russian studies. Both he and Bowra would be very competent reviewers for Pacific Affairs.

Kovanalov, the new full professor of Russian at Oxford, is now at New College. He is a White Russian who left the Soviet Union legitimately in the early days on the advice of Gorki. He has been at Birmingham University where he fought with the other White Russian and is now entrenched at Oxford, I suppose for the rest of his life. He was absent on both my visits, but today on his arrival from a visit in Paris came to see me and told me in detail of his big ideas for the new Russian school at Oxford. I will share my notes with you and Corbett on my talk with him in due season. He is a pal of Sam Cross at Harvard, is very eager for American, French, and Russian collaboration. He had not heard of the big new plans at Columbia. He hopes to get Cross over to Oxford for some lectures this year. He has asked the Academy of Science in Moscow to send a philologist for a year to Oxford, thinking that that was a subject which would not cause any political complications. The master of Balliol had told me that Kovanalov, though a White Russian, was now wholesomely pink.

I will also share with you in due season my notes on people at Birmingham, Glasgow, and Cambridge. Also I will give you the reasons for Kovanalov's statement that Russian scholarship in France is much more broadly based than it is likely to be in England for a considerable time. At Chatham House, Dr. Lindgren is just leaving to return to Cambridge. Violet Connolley is still working for Ford but I suspect may return to Chatham House.

Carr is a tower of strength to the London Times and personally I am glad that he is there rather than at the School of Slavonic Studies.

I had a very long talk with Moseley and find that he has matured and I think has become more objective with reference to the U. S. S. R. As one of the few people who were on the inside of the London Foreign Ministers Conference, he felt that there were mistakes on both sides and that though Molotov was obstructionist, there was a considerable measure of rational thinking on his part. He agreed with me that Stalin and Molotov are following a line similar to that of Fox in his book "The Super Powers." The Kremlin clearly believes that in this interim period the Big Three have certain major responsibilities, that it would be premature to share with an ever-widening circle of middle and small powers, with always the danger that they may be forced to share responsibility with definitely fascist states.

I have had two long evenings with Gromyko who is heavy, conscientious but has not, when he is in a formal meeting, the light touch or the quick knowledge of English that is so essential in these meetings where the main thinking and speaking is in the English language.

Rogoff, as you will suspect, I have seen several times with great profit and with great delight because he has so many of the qualities that Gromyko and Molotov lack.

Alexander Werth spoke at a big meeting at Chatham House and did extraordinarily well, though much of the audience was, if not hostile, at least incredulous. The main body of his talk will appear ultimately in International Affairs. His big 300,000 word book will be published next spring by Hamish; I want to talk with you and Corbett as to the desirability of the Secretariat or the Yale Press, or the ARI considering a North American edition if Hamish is interested and if you think the matter should be explored. Werth is convinced that Truman's exclusiveness with the atom was one of the reasons for Molotov's doubting attitude at the London conference. Salter's Oxford speech, at least as quoted in the London press, could not have helped the situation; that is a pity because in his general attitude, when I dined with him, Sumner and others at All Souls, I found that Salter tended to endorse the Moscow insistence on certain responsibilities remaining for a further period with the Big Three.

Jo Barnes passed through London and gave me a little picture of the sag in American confidence in Russia, but wasn't sure whether it would be permanent. Moseley was very emphatic that the atrocities of the Red Army in Germany and Eastern Europe were mostly exaggerated. He has had access, I gather, to all of the American governmental reports on this matter. His long skepticism about the Soviet Union makes his remarks in this connection carry considerable weight.

Werth gave invaluable insight as to the psychology of the Red Army as they went into other countries and had considerable material on the variance in the attitude and behaviour in different areas.

I had the privilege of meeting a number of the internationally Friends at the Friends International Centre (37 Gordon Square, London W.C. 1). You will remember that the Friends rendered a very distinguished service in Russia for many years after the revolution. They would like an opportunity for further service and are very eager for intellectual and cultural contacts. They are doing their best to promote more general study of Russia as you will see from the enclosed program.

One evening I spent with Z. F. Willis, the National Secretary of the Y. M. C. A. He and his colleagues are hoping the day may come when they can render some service to youth in the U. S. S. R.

The foreign office is completing a report on Russian studies in this country. It is not yet available but I am asking Mitrany and his research secretary, Miss Ford Smith, to try and get me a copy ultimately.

Then there is a new commission, the Scarbrough, which is making a survey for the whole United Kingdom with the aid of all Government departments, and with I think Russian, Middle Eastern, Indian, Chinese, and Japanese studies in its purview. All the scholars are giving evidence, or hoping to be asked to give evidence. I imagine it will be months before a report is published, but here again I will ask Mitrany and Miss Ford Smith to follow it and send me anything that is available. Professor Dodds, who went to China for the British council about the same time as the biochemist Needham, undoubtedly contributed a report on Chinese studies in the United Kingdom and British scholarly opportunities in China. Stevens and Marshall, of the Rockefeller Foundation, had him make a study of oriental studies in the United States and I am going to try and get a copy when I reach New York. He is actively cooperating with all at Oxford who are advancing scholarship in all these fields.

Perhaps the most dynamic person at Oxford in the establishment of the schools is Gibb, of St. Johns, the Arabic scholar. He is eager ultimately to go to the Soviet Union and has made some progress in the Russian language. He gave the Haskell lectures at Chicago last summer; he will help at many points all along the way from Egypt to the Bering Straits.

I neglected to say that at Chatham House there is a temporary research staff member who has a good knowledge of the Soviet Union, her name is Mrs. J. Dogras. I am not certain what her tenure of office is to be.

Dobb, of Pembroke College, Cambridge, spent several hours with me on two occasions, reviewing Russian studies in England in general and from the economic angle in particular. He ought to be freed to do more work in the Russian economic field for he is one of the few top-ranking economists here who is generally familiar with Russian economic material.

On the social side, I had a most charming tea party with Mrs. Winston Churchill, who spent 1¾ hours telling me of her impressions of the Soviet Union during her visit in the spring.

Some of the finest, most broad-minded people in England, like Mitrany, are very eager to establish direct contacts with Soviet citizens here and correspondence with scholars in the Soviet Union. Until points of view change and personal contacts multiply in natural ways this indispensable intercourse will be slow in coming.

I sometimes feel that one ought to forget all current problems and devote the rest of one's life to stimulating basic studies of the Russian language and history, economics, and law throughout the Western World and concurrently stimulate schools in the Soviet Union for the advance study of the Western World. Maybe in 30 years the results of such foundation work would begin to have constructive results.

Sincerely yours,

EDWARD C. CARTER.
(Dictated but Signed in Absence).

Mr. MORRIS. The other two are copies of a letter from Mr. Lattimore to Mr. Field, where Mr. Lattimore mentions that the writing from Asiaticus read like propaganda.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be inserted.

(The document referred to was marked "Exhibit No. 35" and is as follows:)

Mr. F. V. FIELD,
American Peace Mobilization,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR FRED: Enclosed I am sending you an article submitted to me by Asiaticus. For readers of Pacific Affairs, it would read like propaganda, and rhapsodical propaganda at that. As the article is also too long, however, we might be able to shorten it, pruning out a great many adjectives but still retaining the realistic points. However, it is too late for our December issue.

I am therefore sending you the article as is, to see whether you may have any suggestions for placing it.

The sooner you can look in on us here, the better we'll be pleased.

Yours,

OWEN LATTIMORE.

Mr. MORRIS. The last one was a letter I made reference to in which Mr. Carter states that Mr. Earl Browder on October 31, 1938, is really very well informed and contrary to public view, is 100 percent American.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be inserted in the record at this point.

BROOKE CLAXTON, Esq.,
Montreal, Canada.

DEAR CLAXTON: Fred Field from San Francisco has sent me an amusing answer to my inquiry for American speakers. I should say that W. T. Stone of the Foreign Policy Association was well qualified. Raymond Leslie Buell is more forceful and more sure of his views than Stone.

If the Canadian Club can stand the general secretary of the Communist Party in the United States, Earl Browder would give you an exceedingly interesting, pleasantly provocative, but a really important statement on the Roosevelt administration either from the point of view of its internal or its foreign policy. EDWARD C. CARTER.

The CHAIRMAN. I think we had better pause here.

Are you through with Mr. Carter?

Mr. MORRIS. I think for the time being, Mr. Chairman, we are.

Mr. CARTER. For this afternoon, anyhow?

Mr. MORRIS. Yes.

Mr. CARTER. And probably for this next week?

Mr. MORRIS. At least the next couple of weeks.

The CHAIRMAN. You will be advised.

Mr. CARTER. Thank you very much.

Mr. MORRIS. We have not covered everything, but we are not likely to come to you within the next 3 or 4 weeks.

Mr. CARTER. In 20 or 25 years you cannot compress in 2 or 3 days, even the sins.

Mr. MORRIS. Yet sometimes you do it very rapidly.

The CHAIRMAN. We will recess until Tuesday at 10:30.

(Whereupon, at 5:35 p. m., the hearing was recessed, to reconvene at 10:30 a. m., Tuesday, July 31, 1951.)

INSTITUTE OF PACIFIC RELATIONS

TUESDAY, JULY 31, 1951

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE TO INVESTIGATE THE ADMINISTRATION OF THE INTERNAL SECURITY ACT AND OTHER INTERNAL SECURITY LAWS, OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
Washington, D. C.

The subcommittee met at 10:30 a. m., pursuant to recess, Hon. Pat McCarran (chairman) presiding.

Present: Senators McCarran, Eastland, O'Conor, Smith, Ferguson, and Jenner.

Also present: Senators McCarthy and Mundt; J. G. Sourwine, committee counsel; Robert Morris, subcommittee counsel; Benjamin Mandel, director of research.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will come to order.

Again I draw the attention of those who are with us today, and I do not want to say especially the press but the press as well, we are unable to accommodate all who would like to sit in here. But the accoustics in this room are such that any audible expressions are confusing and a little bit annoying. If possible be as easy with your chairs as you possibly can because they make the most noise. Let me say to the members of the committee the witness today is here under subpena and it is the judgment of the chairman of this committee he is rendering a great patriotic service to the country of his adoption. We rejoice in the fact that he has the courage to come forward with the truth.

I want to say to you, General, that this committee and the Senate of the United States is not going to tolerate any reprisal of any kind. Any witness, including yourself, who comes before this committee is invited and urged under oath to tell the truth and the whole truth. You need be in nowise fearful of any reprisal being made on you by any agency of the Government or outside the Government. This committee is going to see to it that its witnesses who come here under oath or voluntarily are protected in telling the Congress of the United States the truth and all of it.

The witness will be sworn. You do solemnly swear that the testimony you are about to give before the subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary of the United States Senate will be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, so help you God?

TESTIMONY OF ALEXANDER GREGORY BARMINE, NEW YORK, N. Y.

Mr. BARMINE. I do.

Senator O'CONOR. Before the examination commences might I say a word?

I want to bring up a question concerning the previous testimony taken and to just make this very brief statement. Sworn testimony previously taken is to the effect that Frederick Vanderbilt Field was assisted by Owen Lattimore, Lauchlin Currie, and others in an effort to obtain a commission in the United States Army Intelligence. It has been reported in the press since our last meeting that Lauchlin Currie denies any such assistance. So far as I have noted Owen Lattimore has made no such denial. It would appear that the matter is of such importance that this committee should hear directly from these individuals who should welcome an opportunity to appear if the accusations against them are not well founded.

Accordingly, I respectfully suggest that Owen Lattimore and Lauchlin Currin be informed of the readiness of this subcommittee to have them appear and testify in open hearings.

I would also suggest that the committee cause to be brought before it detailed information as to what the Department of Defense files show as to the recommendation submitted in favor of the proposed Frederick V. Field Army Intelligence commission.

Mr. Chairman, I merely submit that for the consideration of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. I may say, Senator, that the presentation of evidence before this committee has been a matter of careful study as to the order in which the testimony would be presented. The respective counsel for the committee have been in conference with committee members. We are not able to present everything at once. We must present it in the order in which we think it will have proper sequence. With that in mind, what you have said now is in the mind of the committee and the mind of the chairman and counsel for the committee.

Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, might I say I anticipated that this should be done. I asked the question from Field whether he had any objections to the military disclosing all that he had said in that file and to the people at that time. I do not see how this comes under the rule of a loyalty file of any individual because it is the contention of the Government that Field was not hired.

It is also, as I understand it, the contention that Lattimore was not an employee. So it would not come under any of those rules of not disclosing the evidence to this committee. I think the entire file should be subpenaed or requested first and if not delivered that the whole file of all the correspondence should be supplied. Field said somebody blocked him. Let us find out who blocked him. Let's find out who recommended him and what the recommendation said about Field. I think that ought to be part of the record.

The CHAIRMAN. Let me say, Senator, that is now being worked out and will in due course be presented.

Senator O'CONOR. I agree entirely with Senator Ferguson. I brought it up because it had been touched on last week and I thought it might be well to make it a matter of record.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well.

You may proceed, Mr. Morris.

Mr. MORRIS. What is your name, Mr. Barmine?

Mr. BARMINE. Alexander Gregory Barmine.

Mr. MORRIS. What is your present occupation?

Mr. BARMINE. I am in the Voice of America in the State Department.

The CHAIRMAN. The witness says that he is with the Voice of America in the State Department.

Mr. MORRIS. What particular position do you have?

Mr. BARMINE. Chief of the Russian unit.

Mr. MORRIS. How long have you held that position?

Mr. BARMINE. About 3 years.

Mr. MORRIS. Have you ever testified before any other forum of Congress or any other body?

Mr. BARMINE. Except this? No.

Mr. MORRIS. This is the first time you have testified in public?

Mr. BARMINE. That is right.

Senator FERGUSON. Before an executive session?

Mr. MORRIS. Other than the executive session of this committee, you have testified before no other body?

Mr. BARMINE. No.

Mr. MORRIS. How long have you been in the United States, Mr. Barmine?

Mr. BARMINE. Eleven years.

Mr. MORRIS. Where were you born?

Mr. BARMINE. In Russia, in Mohileff.

Mr. MORRIS. In what year?

Mr. BARMINE. 1899.

Mr. MORRIS. How did you become a citizen of the United States?

Mr. BARMINE. I was naturalized in the southern district of New York court July 15, 1943, after I received honorable discharge from the Army.

Mr. MORRIS. What process did you go through by way of becoming a citizen?

Mr. BARMINE. The regular process of application.

Mr. MORRIS. Was the fact that you had served in the United States Army something that accelerated the process?

Mr. BARMINE. Yes; it did, for 2 years.

Mr. MORRIS. By virtue of the fact you served in the American Army your naturalization was accelerated?

Mr. BARMINE. That is right.

Mr. MORRIS. What rank did you hold in the American Army?

Mr. BARMINE. Private.

Mr. MORRIS. Private first class?

Mr. BARMINE. No; just private.

Mr. MORRIS. What was your last connection, Mr. Barmine, with the Soviet organization?

Mr. BARMINE. I was Chargé d'Affairs of the Soviet Union in Athens, Greece.

Mr. MORRIS. You were the Soviet Chargé d'Affairs to Athens?

Mr. BARMINE. That is right.

Mr. MORRIS. You were acting ambassador?

Mr. BARMINE. That is right.

Mr. MORRIS. What year was that?

Mr. BARMINE. Until July 1937.

Mr. MORRIS. What happened to cause a termination of your relationship with the Soviet Union at that time?

Mr. BARMINE. That was a period of purges in the Red army in Moscow and most of my former classmates in the general staff school in France were accused and shot and I knew well that they were innocent of charges preferred against them.

Mr. MORRIS. At this time, Mr. Barmine, even though you were in diplomatic status, did you have military rank?

Mr. BARMINE. I was retired.

Mr. MORRIS. With what rank?

Mr. BARMINE. Brigadier general.

Mr. MORRIS. So when you make reference to your classmates, you were making reference to your military classmates?

Mr. BARMINE. That is right.

Mr. MORRIS. You were at that time a retired brigadier general of the Soviet Army?

Mr. BARMINE. That is right. I realized I couldn't serve Russia at this time by remaining in the Soviet service because I consider that was going on against the interests of the country.

Mr. MORRIS. In other words, Mr. Barmine, when you realized that all your classmates were being purged, all your military classmates, and included among them was Marshal Tukachevsky?

Mr. BARMINE. That is right.

Mr. MORRIS. He had been purged?

Mr. BARMINE. That is right.

Mr. MORRIS. You realized you no longer would carry on in the Soviet service in view of the fact these people were being purged and you knew they were innocent?

Mr. BARMINE. That is right.

Mr. MORRIS. Therefore, you separated yourself from the Soviet service?

Mr. BARMINE. I resigned.

Mr. MORRIS. Did the Soviet react to your resignation? Did they simply accept it?

Mr. BARMINE. Well, there were different kinds of reactions, of course. They were trying to liquidate me, to kill me in France when I went there as a refugee.

Mr. MORRIS. You were in Athens. You left Athens. Did you serve any notice on the Soviet authorities you were leaving?

Mr. BARMINE. I sent a wire to Litvinov and asked him to appoint another man in charge of the Embassy. Then I left for Paris.

Mr. MORRIS. Did you make your presence known in Paris or were you in hiding?

Mr. BARMINE. No; I was in hiding.

Mr. MORRIS. Did you think it was necessary?

Mr. BARMINE. Yes; because I learned that the Soviet secret service was given orders to liquidate me in France.

Mr. MORRIS. How did you know that?

Mr. BARMINE. I met my fiancée, who was in France. She received a letter from her mother from Greece. The Greek Communists came to her and told her that she should write her daughter not to see me and cut all relations, because I would be liquidated anyway. They insisted that the daughter should be warned. They told her, "If you want your daughter to be safe, tell her not to save him."

Mr. MORRIS. Did you see Ignatz Reiss when you were in Paris?

Mr BARMINE. No. Then I was followed in Paris. They attempted to get me there.

Mr. MORRIS. What was your position in the Communist Party at that time, Mr. Barmine?

Mr. BARMINE. At what time?

Mr. MORRIS. At the time of your being chargé d'affaires in Greece.

Mr. BARMINE. I was a member of the party.

Mr. MORRIS. You were a member of the Communist Party?

Mr. BARMINE. That is right. I resigned from the party at the same time.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you tell us briefly what your diplomatic achievements had been up to that time? What had you accomplished in the field of diplomacy at the time of your departure from the Soviet organization?

Mr. BARMINE. What do you mean by achievements?

Mr. MORRIS. What positions did you hold in Soviet diplomacy?

Mr. BARMINE. My first assignment was in Bokhara. I was detached from the general staff school and sent as a military attaché That was between 2 years in the general staff school, in the summertime.

Then I was appointed consul general in Bokhara. Then next year after the second year in general staff school I was sent for a summer to Riga in Latvia as second secretary of the Embassy in Latvia.

Mr. MORRIS. You were second secretary there?

Mr. BARMINE. That is right.

After being graduated from general staff school in 1923, I was sent to Persia as consul general in northern Persia. I stayed there until 1925.

Mr. MORRIS. You were consul general in northern Persia until 1925?

Mr. BARMINE. That is right.

My next diplomatic assignment was Greece in 1935.

Mr. MORRIS. You were chargé d'affaires in Greece from 1935 until your termination?

Mr. BARMINE. No. I came first as a first secretary of the embassy. After the minister went to Moscow, I was appointed chargé d'affaires.

Mr. MORRIS. You held that position until 1937?

Mr. BARMINE. Until I resigned.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you tell us briefly what your military career had been up to that time?

Mr. BARMINE. I started in 1919 in the army. Then I was sent to the officers' school, the infantry officers' school, at the end of 1919. I was graduated from the officers' school in 1920, in the spring.

Then I was assigned to the western front against Poland. I went through the Polish campaign. Late in 1920 I was sent to the general staff school in Moscow. I had the rank of commander of a regiment by then. From 1920 to 1923 I was in general staff school. I was graduated in 1923.

Mr. MORRIS. You were graduated from the general staff school in 1923?

Mr. BARMINE. Yes. During the studies in the general staff school I was assigned to the intelligence department of the army. After graduation I was sent to the intelligence department.

Mr. MORRIS. In 1923 you were assigned to the intelligence department?

Mr. BARMINE. Already in 1921. The moment when the first class in the general staff school was completed, they were going over the people who were in general staff school taking some that had to be after the graduation assigned to general staff school work. I was one among them, so I was also ordered to study oriental languages because the idea of using me and some other people for the military work in the Orient was considered. Besides the military class in general staff school I was studying in the oriental language, the Persian language, Urdu and Arabic.

Mr. MORRIS. What was that?

Mr. BARMINE. Urdu.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you spell that, please?

Mr. BARMINE. You spell it U-r-d-u, and Arabic and also French.

Then already in 1921 in the summertime between the year of classes I would be attached to the intelligence and would be sent on an assignment by the intelligence office.

This way I was sent to Bokhara in the summer of 1921, in Latvia in 1922.

Mr. MORRIS. While you held these diplomatic positions were you actually working for the intelligence organization at that time?

Mr. BARMINE. That was a civilian assignment.

Mr. MORRIS. It was a civilian assignment——

Mr. BARMINE. Temporary assignment, but I was always at the disposal of the intelligence.

Mr. MORRIS. You were always at the disposal and under the direction of the intelligence authorities; is that right?

Mr. BARMINE. Yes.

Mr. SOURWINE. Mr. Chairman, might I ask a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Very well.

Mr. SOURWINE. Does that mean an assignment to a diplomatic post is regarded as an intelligence assignment?

Mr. BARMINE. No; it doesn't. I was to fulfill my diplomatic duty and complete it as it should be. There would be no difference with regular diplomatic staff members.

Mr. SOURWINE. But you had additional duties; is that right?

Mr. BARMINE. Not special additional duties. I would explain to you how it worked.

Military intelligence had several officers, maybe two dozen high-ranking officers, who were attached directly to the chief of intelligence. Besides those who worked in the regular military network underground, these people were kept in reserve in order to use them in such civilian assignments where it would be in the interest of military intelligence to have men with military knowledge and with contacts.

Before the relation was following: I could be sent by the foreign office only to the places which would be approved by the chief of military intelligence. For instance, when I was graduated and I went to the intelligence service, they needed people in Persia. The Soviet Union had there about 16 consulates in Persia. There were several important consulates in an important sensitive area in which military intelligence wanted a military man in charge. So out of the 16 consulates, about 6 of them were consul generals of my group, the general staff officers with intelligence training.

I was sent to the foreign office and the foreign office offered the job in southern Persia. Military intelligence insisted they needed me in northern Persia. According to the chief of military intelligence I was appointed to the post in Resht.

Mr. MORRIS. Spell that, please.

Mr. BARMINE. That area including the Enveli port. There was a specific situation in 1923 because according to the Soviet-Persian treaty the port had to be given back to Persia. The Persian Government insisted very much, but our policy was not to give it back. It wasn't in contradiction with the treaty. The policy decision was to keep the port, the facility, to keep the fishery concession in our hands. It was a very critical time because Persia tried to force it with army forces. We had two destroyers also contrary to the treaty, which stood in Enveli port and the possibility was of the attempt to take over the fishery concession by arms and the military office wanted the man who would be on the spot in order to make a decision on the spot who would have a military background and military training.

This group of destroyers in Enveli was under my orders and at my disposal. When there was an attempt to take, in 1924, the fishery, the Persian Governor of Resht Province sent a detachment there. I had to order the commander of the destroyers to put the guns on the shore and be ready to resist by force.

Also we had special interests in northern Persia. There was a question of people working there on military assignment and among the tribes. These were the reasons why military intelligence wanted to have military men as the consul general. That means I was under orders of the foreign office and I was fulfilling diplomatic status.

Mr. MORRIS. We are conducting an inquiry into the Institute of Pacific Relations, and we are going to be asking you certain questions in connection with this, and we wish you would give us your best recollection of events as you recall them.

I am going to offer you a translation from the Political, Social, and Economic Quarterly of the Soviet Union called, in English, The Pacific Ocean. I would like to call that to your attention and ask you if you will identify as far as you know some of the Soviet authorities who appear in the Soviet council of the Institute of Pacific Relations as it appears on this translation. I also give you a Russian copy of the same thing.

Mr. BARMINE. Out of these names I knew three people personally.

Mr. MORRIS. We have here, Mr. Chairman, the members of the Soviet council of the IPR. They are the people that the Soviet Government sent to its own particular council in the institute. Mr. Barmine has testified he knew three of them to him own knowledge.

Senator FERGUSON. Were they members of the international section?

Mr. MORRIS. Just of the Soviet council. I can stress that.

Mr. BARMINE. May I say the Russian text mentions they are founders of the Pacific Institute of the Soviet Union.

Mr. MORRIS. These are listed here in this political, social, and economic quarterly as the founding members of the Pacific Institute of the USSR. The three whom you know are who?

Mr. BARMINE. Vice President Voitinski.

Mr. MORRIS. What did you know about Mr. Voitinski?

Mr. BARMINE. When I returned from Bokhara in the fall of 1921 to resume my studies in the general staff school, then the Chief Secretary and Foreign Minister of Russia, Commissar Chicherin, was my classmate. He invited me to work in my spare time, especially at nights, as secretary to Chicherin. At this time I met executives and high officials of the Foreign Office in Moscow. Among them was Voitinski who at this time was in charge of the far-eastern section of the Foreign Office.

Mr. MORRIS. You say you knew Voitinski as the man who was the head of the far-eastern section of the Foreign Office at that time?

Mr. BARMINE. That is right. He came to the Foreign Office from the Comintern and when he was also in charge of far-eastern affairs. He returned back from the Foreign Office a couple of years later again to the same work.

Mr. MORRIS. You, therefore, testify he had come from the Comintern to occupy that position as head of the far-eastern section of the Foreign Office and after he finished that assignment he went back to the Comintern?

Mr. BARMINE. That is right.

Mr. SOURWEIN. Did you testify also, General, in the Comintern he was in charge of far-eastern affairs?

Mr. BARMINE. That is right.

Mr. MORRIS. Who were the other two men who you knew on that list?

Mr. BARMINE. Arosev, chairman of the Society of Cultural Relations.

Mr. MORRIS. How do you spell that?

Mr. BARMINE. A-r-o-s-e-v.

Mr. MORRIS. What do you know about him?

Mr. BARMINE. I met him because he was my colleague in the diplomatic service. He was once Ambassador in Czechoslovakia. I knew him personally in Moscow as a friend. Then I met him on his job.

Mr. MORRIS. What was the nature of his job, political?

Mr. BARMINE. As Ambassador, yes. Arosev was an old Bolshevik. At this time he had the confidence of the central committee. He was one of the hierarchy of the party.

Mr. MORRIS. He had the confidence of the central committee of the Communist Party and shared their confidence?

Mr. BARMINE. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. So when Arosev appears in this work, do you think he is appearing as a dutiful member of the Soviet international organization in a political capacity?

Mr. BARMINE. He was appointed as the president of the Society of Cultural Relations by the central committee of the party and, of course, he acted as such in his duties.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Barmine, do you know anybody else on that list?

Mr. BARMINE. Yes; I knew Svanidze.

Mr. MORRIS. What do you know about him?

Mr. BARMINE. He is a Georgian. He is a brother-in-law of Stalin.

Mr. MORRIS. What else do you know about him?

Mr. BARMINE. Svanidze was also high up in the hierarchy of the Communist Party and the Soviet Government. At this time he was director of the foreign trade bank, which means the organization which was in control of all financial exchange abroad.

Mr. MORRIS. In that capacity or holding that position he took a political assignment?

Mr. BARMINE. I knew about his other assignments, too, which he carried abroad besides being president of this bank.

Mr. MORRIS. I would like to show you a translation of volume XII of the Soviet Encyclopedia. This is an excerpt from Mr. Voitinski, and I ask you if that squares with your recollection of Mr. Voitinski's assignments?

Mr. BARMINE. Yes. That confirms the fact that I knew he was a high executive of the Comintern.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to introduce into the record this translation of the "Pacific Ocean" we have just made reference to as well as the translation from the Bolshevik Soviet Encyclopedia with the biographical sketch of Mr. Voitinski. I would like to introduce both of them into the record.

The CHAIRMAN. I think they should be inserted in the record as documents with reference to which the witness is testifying. I do not know that they have been identified.

EXHIBIT No. 37

[Translation from "Tikhii Okean" (The Pacific Ocean), Political, Social, and Economic Quarterly Review No. 1, July–September 1934, pp. 217–218]

INSTITUTE OF PACIFIC RELATIONS IN THE U. S. S. R.

The International Institute of Pacific Relations, at present, consists of the national Pacific institutes of the United States of America, Japan, China, Great Britain, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, and the Philippines. At its regular conference, held at Shanghai in 1931, a unanimous decision was passed to invite the U. S. S. R. to join the institute. This invitation was repeatedly reiterated in the name of the institute by its secretary general. The scientific research and economic organizations of the U. S. S. R., which are interested in the problems of the Soviet Far East and of the Pacific Ocean, decided to accept the invitation of the international institute.

To this end, the said organizations resolved to combine their efforts directed to the study of the above-mentioned problems and to establish a special Pacific institute.

The founding meeting of the Pacific Institute of the U. S. S. R. took place on July 28, 1934, in Moscow. Present at the meeting were representatives of the NII (Institute for Scientific Research) of the Great Soviet World Atlas, the All Union Society for Cultural Relations with Foreign Countries, the Institute of Oceanography, the Administration of the Great Northern Sea Route, the Chamber of Commerce, the Institute of World Economics and World Politics, the Kamchatka Joint Stock Co., and the East Fish Trust.

Thus, the above-listed institutions become the founding members of the Pacific Institute of the U. S. S. R.

The following board of the institute was elected at the founding meeting:

1. President of the institute: Prof. V. E. Motylev (director of the Scientific Research Institute of the Great Soviet World Atlas).
2. Vice President: G. N. Voitinskii (chief of the Pacific "cabinet" of the Institute of World Economics and World Politics).
3. A. Ia. Arosev: (chairman of the All-Union Society for Cultural Relations with foreign countries).
4. K. A. Mekhonoshin: (director of the Institute of Oceanography).
5. S. S. Ioffe: (deputy chief of the administration of the Great Northern Sea Route).
6. A. S. Svandze: (director of the Bank for Foreign Trade).
7. I. A. Adamovich: (chairman of the Kamchatka Joint-Stock Co.).
8. Ia. D. Ianson: (president of the chamber of commerce).

9. Ia. M. Berkovich: (manager of the East Fish Trust).

Mr. A. Kantorovich was appointed secretary-general of the institute.

The chairman of the new institute, Comrade Motylev, addressed a letter to the secretary general of the International Institute of Pacific Relations notifying him that the Pacific institute, which had been established in the U. S. S. R., was prepared to join the internaitonal institute as a member in response to the invitation extended by the conference of the international institute held in Shanghai in 1931.

At the beginning of September V. E. Motylev received a reply from Mr. Carter, who welcomed the U. S. S. R. as a new member of the International Institute for Pacific Relations.

The board of the institute voted to commence preparations for the coming Congress to be held in 1935 or 1936. For this purpose it is planned to publish before the Congress assembled the following monographic studies:

1. The First and Second 5-Year Plans of the Soviet Far East.
2. The Nationality Policy in the Soviet Far East.
3. The Great Northern Sea Route and the Pacific Ocean.
4. The Economic Struggle in the Pacific Ocean Area.
5. The Problem of Raw Materials in the Pacific Ocean Area.

At the same time it is planned to publish in 1935 two symposium volumes devoted to current problems on the Pacific area and on the economic activities in the Soviet Far East.

[Translation from "Tikhii Okean" (The Pacific Ocean), Political, Social, and Economic Quarterly Review, No. 1 (3), January–March 1935, pp. 268–269]

The Pacific Institute

The Pacific Institute of the U. S. S. R. (a section of the International Institute of Pacific Relations) has developed its activities considerably.

The following monographs in Russian and in English will be published by the U. S. S. R. Pacific Institute prior to the International Conference of the Institute of Pacific Relations to be held in 1936:

1. The First and Second 5-Year Plans in the Far East (being compiled by the staff of the Far East regional plan).
2. The U. S. S. R. National Policy.
3. The Economic and Political Struggle in the Pacific Ocean Area.

The institute is also preparing the publication in English and in Russian of a symposium volume dedicated to current political and economic problems connected with the Pacific Ocean area.

The symposium will cover approximately the following items: (1) Relations between Japan and China since 1931; (2) the repudiation of the Washington Treaty; (3) the problem of the unification of China; (4) the crisis in Japan and the sociopolitical consequences of the war in Manchuria and in China; (5) the Anglo-Japanese struggle for world markets; (6) silver and the colonial countries of the Far East; (7) the ideological preparations for the war in Japan; (8) naval armaments in the Pacific Ocean area following Japan's repudiation of the Washington Naval Treaty; (9) the colonial policy of Japan; (10) England and her dominions in the Pacific Ocean; (11) the Philippine Islands and their share of the contradictions of imperialism in the Pacific Ocean area; (12) the economic and sociopolitical development of the Soviet Far East under the first and second 5-year plans; (13) the nationality policy of the Soviet Government in the Far East and in the northern regions of Siberia; (14) the establishment of the Jewish autonomous region in Birobidzhan; (15) the significance of the great northern sea route.

This program, however, is subject to further concretization.

In accordance with the plans for scientific research adopted at the last international conference of the Institute of Pacific Relations in 1933, the Pacific Institute of the U. S. S. R. undertook to prepare the following works: (1) a monograph on the standard of living in the U. S. S. R.; (2) a report on the status of foreigners as stipulated by the Soviet laws (prepared by Prof. M. A. Plotkin); (3) a report on the means of communication in the Soviet Far East.

The Pacific Institute of the U. S. S. R. has compiled a systematic catalog of all books which were published in the Soviet Union since 1922 on questions connected with the Far East and the Pacific Ocean, including questions pertinent to the Soviet Far East and Siberia.

The Institute of Pacific Relations of the U. S. S. R. maintains a book exchange with the American section of the Institute of Pacific Relations. The most important books published in both countries on Far East and Pacific questions come under this book exchange. There was, also, an intention by the institute to send to America a collection of selected books on the U. S. S. R. in exchange for a corresponding number of American books on the United States of America.

At the end of December Mr. E. C. Carter, the secretary general of the International Institute of Pacific Relations, visited Moscow with a group of his collaborators. During his stay in Moscow (from December 20 to December 31) Mr. Carter met representatives of a great number of Soviet scientific institutions and of public organizations. Mr. Carter had a number of conferences with the presidium of the Pacific Institute of the U. S. S. R. on questions relating to the activities of the institute as a section of the international organization. Before his departure from Moscow Mr. Carter was received by Mr. Litvinov, the People's Commissar for Foreign Affairs.

[Translation from vol. XII columns 657–658 of the Bol'shaia sovetskaia entsiklopediia, Moscow, 1928 (Soviet Encyclopedia)]

VOITINSKII (Zarkhin), Grigorii Naumovich (born 1893), Communist, Comintern worker, writer. Son of a low-grade white-collar worker, Voitinskii completed only an elementary school and supplemented his further education by reading and self study. In 1913 he emigrated to America and lived in a number of places in the United States and Canada as a student and worker. In the spring of 1918 Voitinskii returned to Russia, joined the Communist Party and began to work in the Krasnoiarsk soviet of workers' delegates. After Kolchak had taken over the government Voitinskii took part in the underground work and in the uprising against Kolchak at Omsk. After the failure of the uprising he was detailed to underground work at Vladivostok. There he was arrested in May 1919 and sentenced to hard labor for life on the island of Sakhalin. In January 1920, still prior to the overthrow of the Kolchak government in the Far East, Voitinskii together with other political prisoners, and with the help of an organization of sympathizers who were free, took part in the seizure of power on the island. From 1920 on, he worked at the order of the Comintern in the Far East. He worked for a number of years in the eastern secretariat of the Comintern. In the summer of 1920 he participated in the organization of the first Communist cells at Shanghai, Peiping, and Canton; he also took an intensive part in the further work of the Chinese Communist Party and, in particular, conducted the negotiation with Sun Yat-sen concerning the collaboration of the Kuomintang and of the Chinese Communist Party.

Mr. MORRIS. I would like to introduce the original Russian translation of the same thing from which Mr. Barmine made references.

The CHAIRMAN. That will go in the files of the committee and the translation will go in the record, with its proper identification.

The translation from volume XII of the encyclopedia is dated 1928 and has been identified and testified to by this witness.

(The document referred to was marked "Exhibit No. 39" and filed for the record.)

Mr. MORRIS. Do you know General Berzin?

Mr. BARMINE. I knew him for 15 years.

The CHAIRMAN. Before you go into this, I may be a bit too meticulous in this, but I think you should identify this translation if you please. I think Mr. Mandel can probably lay the foundation.

Mr. MANDEL. Both translations were submitted to the committee by the Library of Congress. Their qualified experts did the translation.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Barmine, will you describe to us what your relationship was to General Berzin?

Mr. BARMINE. In 1921 there was a decision that I was one of the General Staff officers who would be attached to intelligence after being graduated. Since this time I was on assignments by the intelligence service and put at the personal disposal of General Berzin. As I said, he had about 20 people special assistants who were always at the disposal for assignments which would be given to them. Therefore, from 1921 to 1935 he was my direct superior.

Mr. MORRIS. What military rank did you have in 1935?

Mr. BARMINE. Brigadier general.

Mr. MORRIS. How long had you held that rank?

Mr. BARMINE. Until the middle of 1935 when I was retired.

Mr. MORRIS. How long had you held it? How long had you been brigadier general when you were retired?

Mr. BARMINE. It would be for 11 years.

Mr. MORRIS. Your relationships were directly with General Berzin?

Mr. BARMINE. I was directly under his orders.

Mr. MORRIS. What were some of your assignments, some of your later assignments? What was the Auto-Motor Export Corp.?

Mr. BARMINE. In 1928 the military intelligence needed men in France because at this time the trade legation in France was placing orders for airplane models, spare parts, and some important equipment for military factories. There was a special military purchase department and there was an air force commission in France. As it was a diplomatic assignment, military intelligence asked that one of the high executives of the trade legation be a General Staff officer. In 1928 I was appointed to the trade legation in France as director general of imports. I had in charge nine import departments and I carried in full the duty of foreign trade officer, but special attention had to be given to these military purchases because the air force commission had a high officer in charge and before there was needed an authority in the trade legation who would handle any complicated matters right there.

Mr. MORRIS. So you cite that as one of your experiences in military intelligence?

Mr. BARMINE. That was my assignment. I went to France to the trade legation under orders of General Berzin.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you tell us of some other experiences in the Soviet military intelligence you had?

Mr. BARMINE. In 1931 I was transferred to Italy as director general of imports because at this time we also had the Navy purchasing commission and the air force purchasing commission in Italy. We were buying destroyers built for us in Trieste.

Then we had orders for planes and aviation models. We had two purchasing commission there. Military intelligence decided and the war department decided to have the men in charge in Italy. I was director general of improts in Italy. I stayed there for a year until 1932.

My next assignment was in Belgium. At this time we had no diplomatic relations with Belgium, and it was the decision of the Politburo to open the unofficial agency. So that was also with the approval of General Berzin and I was transferred to Brussells where I stayed for 1 year.

Mr. MORRIS. What year was that?

Mr. BARMINE. That was 1932. Then I was recalled back to Moscow. At this time there was carried on a very huge program of retooling of the aviation industry. There were several during the first 5-year plan, several big aviation factories built. It was very important to get the necessary machinery quickly. Most of this machinery was going, during the end of the first 5-year plan, for military industry and the most expensive and the most important part of it they had priority. In Moscow there existed the Foreign Trade Corp. called Stanko-Import, Machine Tool Import. In order to keep and speed orders for military industry, I was appointed the first executive vice president of Machine Tool Import.

Mr. MORRIS. You were the first vice president?

Mr. BARMINE. Of Stanko-Import in Russia.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you spell that last name?

Mr. BARMINE. S-t-a-n-k-o-Import. It was a corporation which was placing a very huge order in England and Germany.

Mr. MORRIS. What was your next assignment?

Mr. BARMINE. I remained 1 year on this job.

At this time for several years the Soviet Government was carrying the export of arms to the country of China. There was a huge delivery in 1925–27 to Chiang Kai-shek's government about 15 or 20 million dollars of equipment.

Mr. MORRIS. In 1925 and 1926?

Mr. BARMINE. From 1925 to 1927. Then in later years we delivered some artillery and some munitions to Afghanistan; then airplanes and aviation parts to Persia.

Then there was a huge shipment of ammunition and arms exported to western China to Sinkiang and to Mongolia.

Mr. MORRIS. Was that done during the Chinese Government?

Mr. BARMINE. No. I will come back to it. It was a completely separate project. The Soviet Government at this time was ready to grant a loan to Turkey. As I remember it, it was a loan for $10,000,000 which ostensibly, officially in the papers, was for the industrialization of Turkey, for textile machinery. But in fact, only about 20 percent of this was given for industrial machinery; 80 percent was arms and ammunition.

It happened sporadically. Some of the things for delivery to Persia were done by the War Department, some by the Ministry of Industry, some were military intelligence. It was spread in dividends. The Politburo decision was to consolidate all of it in one organization under cover of the Foreign Trade Department. So there was the decision of the Politburo at the end of 1933 to organize a special corporation. The name of the corporation was Auto-Motor Export Corp. This is one of the corporations of the Foreign Trade Department. This corporation has an official charter approved by the Government for the export of automobiles and motors.

Mr. MORRIS. The charter was just for the export of automobiles and motors?

Mr. BARMINE. That is right, but there was a secret part of the charter which gave to this corporation full and complete control in the execution of all of the export of arms from the Soviet Union. It was like lend-lease.

Mr. MORRIS. This was a secret clause in the charter?

Mr. BARMINE. Yes. What we had was official business in the order department of the corporation which business was to export trucks and passenger vehicles. The point was that at this time the Ford Co. built the Gorki factory, but Ford was far-sighted enough to put the clause in which prohibited the reexport of passenger cars of the Ford model. So we would have no right for our legal official business to reexport the production of passenger cars.

We signed the dealer contacts with the Ford Co. of Alexandria, Egypt, and with Vauxhall in England, together with the trucks of Russian production, heavy vehicles. We were reexporting the American automobiles. Neither Ford nor Vauxhall were completely unaware of the second part of the business of this organization.

The second part had officially the name of motor department. It was not exporting any model. It took over from the war department, from intelligence, from the Ministry of Industry all the job of the export of arms, those which were in planning and those which were in execution. This department was in charge of the military export.

When the decision of this organization was reached, the War Department and Marshal Tukachevsky who was assistant commissar of defense offered my name as president of this corporation.

Mr. MORRIS. So Marshal Tukachevsky offered your name as president of the Auto-Motor Export Corp.?

Mr. BARMINE. That is right. Rozenholz, the Trade Commissar, concurred.

Mr. MORRIS. Who concurred?

Mr. BARMINE. Rozenholz.

Mr. MORRIS. Spell his name, please.

Mr. BARMINE. R-o-z-e-n-h-o-l-z. He was also shot in 1938.

My name was submitted and the Politburo approved. I was appointed the president of this trust.

Mr. MORRIS. What year was that?

Mr. BARMINE. That was at the end of 1933.

Mr. MORRIS. How long did you hold that position?

Mr. BARMINE. I held this position until the end of 1935 when I asked to be relieved. I was appointed to Greece.

Mr. MORRIS. When you held that position did you as a matter of fact show a great deal of activity in this motor division?

Mr. BARMINE. That was under my complete control.

Mr. MORRIS. That was also under your complete control?

Mr. BARMINE. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you tell us how you functioned in that respect?

Mr. BARMINE. As a matter of fact for a year and a half, until I was given another general staff job, I was president of the corporation and I was director of this motor department. I had to handle these things directly. With this work you had to be in daily contact with the war department and with military intelligence because of the things you had to do in a hurry and often we had to borrow the equipment from the Army.

I had to get officer instructors to accompany the arms to teach people in this country how to use them. This job kept me not only in contact with the War Department but besides that that was the year of the most constant and close cooperation with General Berzin because he, from the War Department, was charged with handling this side of it.

Mr. MORRIS. So during this period you were in particularly close association with General Berzin, your superior?

Mr. BARMINE. Yes. I was seeing him several times every week.

Mr. MORRIS. In this connection did you ever hear of the organization, Institute of Pacific Relations?

Mr. BARMINE. Yes; I did.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you tell us what you heard about the Institute of Pacific Relations and will you tell us who told it to you?

Mr. BARMINE. Well, in order to come to it I would like to mention the thing that brought the Institute of Pacific Relations in.

Mr. MORRIS. By all means, Mr. Barmine.

Mr. BARMINE. At the end of 1933 when I was taking over the job of the export of arms and delivery, one of the unfinished jobs we took was the export of arms in Sinkiang. That is a Province in western China. This work was completely independent. You asked me about the regulation with the Chinese Government. It was completely independent from the Chinese Government because the policy was different. In fact, when I started this job, I received a letter from the Ministry of Aviation of Nationalist China, the Chiang Kai-shek government, who was asking for delivery of aviation material and planes.

I had to report to the Chinese Commission of the Central Committee and to the Politburo about the answer. I was given the decision not to even answer this letter. It means we had no contact on this subject of export with the Chinese Government and the letter remained in our file unanswered.

The CHAIRMAN. That is with the Chiang Kai-shek government?

Mr. BARMINE. That is right. At the same time the Russian Government had a special interest in western China in Sinkiang because the problem was to secure the control of Sinkiang independently. First combat the British influence in Sinkiang and then secure it as a military base.

The governor of the Province was friendly. At this time there was a Moslem revolt in Sinkiang. We were delivering artillery, planes, ammunition, shells, and rifles for this government. In fact, the situation deteriorated so rapidly that once a lot of these things arrived at the Sinkiang border, Uramchi, the capital, was surrounded by rebels. So I was ordered to put the bombs on the planes. These bombs were delivered right on the heads of the rebels around Uramchi. Then the Chinese governor was billed later for this ammunition as delivered.

Mr. MORRIS. You billed the Chinese governor at that time?

Mr. BARMINE. Yes.

Senator FERGUSON. Did he say "governor" or "government"?

Mr. BARMINE. Governor of the Province. We were dealing only with the Governor of west Sinkiang. At this time two brigades of the secret-police troops walked into Sinkiang. They participated and tried to liquidate the rebellion. This was never published in the press.

Mr. SOURWINE. Are you speaking of Soviet troops?

Mr. BARMINE. Yes; two brigades of NVD troops crossed the border.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you identify NVD?

Mr. BARMINE. Ministry of Internal Affairs security police.

Mr. MORRIS. The Russian security police?

Mr. BARMINE. That is right. There were two full infantry brigades with artillery. When our artillery arrived to Sinkiang after this rebellion was dispersed, the NVD troops took over the new artillery pieces which I was delivering there and left the Chinese the old ones which they used in suppressing the rebellion.

Before the governor asked for a reduction of price because it was rather second-hand and we first insisted that they were used to help them. Then I was ordered to give a reduction and forget about it.

Senator O'CONOR. Can we have the date of that?

Mr. BARMINE. This is the end of 1933.

Senator O'CONOR. When the deliveries were made on the heads of the rebels you describe?

Mr. BARMINE. That is right. After the rebellion was suppressed, the central committee and the Chinese commission of the Politburo decided to send a commission to Sinkiang which would work up a large plan of reconstruction, of financial help, of military help, of building the roads, airdromes, the delivery of the means of transportation, and so on.

The president of this commission was appointed and he was a brother-in-law of Stalin who went to Sinkiang and remained there several months.

Mr. MORRIS. He is the man we had previously identified?

Mr. BARMINE. That is right. I got in contact with Svanidze after they returned. They returned with the proposals which were discussed in the Sinkiang commission of the Politburo. They were approved by the Politburo. We had to equip completely 10,000 troops which would be independent under the orders of the governor of the Province. The son of the governor, the young colonel, came to Moscow and stayed and worked in contact with my office.

The plan included building of hangars, airdromes, roads, completing the aviation line established there, then completely equipping and organizing and training the 10,000 troops. Of course, it was not acknowledged, this question of dismemberment or complete separation of Sinkiang. It was still part of Nationalist China. So among the equipment I had to deliver we even had to make Kuomintang stars, 10,000, which would be put on at the start of this.

Mr. MORRIS. You had to put on 10,000 Kuomintang stars even though you were going to use them for a different purpose?

Mr. BARMINE. That is right. We discussed this order, too. The Sinkiang commission was supposed to give a huge loan and silver to western China.

This military part of armed supplies by the decision of the Politburo was given to my corporation. Before I worked with the son of the governor of the Province and with close contact under control of General Berzin's office. There was a military resident, a military attaché, in Uramchi who was also my classmate in the General Staff School who participated. This affair took several months and during this affair the problem came up about China proper, about the Pacific coast of China. General Berzin inquired of me if I am doing something in the line of the automobile department and the export of cars in eastern China. I said we were only starting. At this time we sent several trucks to Shanghai as samples. But I had no branches there. We had huge deliveries to Mongolia but nothing to China proper.

Mr. MORRIS. You had a heavy delivery to Mongolia but nothing to China proper?

Mr. BARMINE. That is right. We sent a few trucks and a representative to Shanghai. He asked me if it would be possible that the war department and military intelligence would be interested in building on certain points along the China coast in eastern China the secret cache of arms and ammunition, and if it would be possible that I open branches in China proper for ostensibly or factually the export of trucks, for selling the trucks and spare parts, opening warehouses, but the military intelligence could use the warehouses for storage for the arms.

Mr. MORRIS. May I review that? In other words, Soviet military intelligence wanted you at this time to open branch offices in China which would ostensibly serve as a cover for exporting of automobile parts?

Mr. BARMINE. No. Factually it would be used for the export of automobiles, trucks and spare parts, but besides that using this branch and these warehouses we would have to store up arms and ammunition without knowledge of the Chinese Government.

Senator. FERGUSON. Would you find out what percentage was motors and trucks?

Mr. MORRIS. Would you tell us the relationship between the two? Which was the greater?

Mr. BARMINE. You mean in the operation of my corporation?

Mr. MORRIS. Yes.

Mr. BARMINE. In the operation of my corporation it would be this way. About 10 percent would be automobile exports and 90 percent export of arms, because we had eight million dollars of gold, the value of the arms that were delivered in Turkey in 1935, the delivery of tanks and armored cars, ammunition, gas masks and all to fill up this loan.

Mr. MORRIS. What kind of crates did you use? Would they be ostensibly for automotive parts?

Mr. BARMINE. They went as busses. They were fully crated. Armored cars and tanks were fully crated. Officers and training personnel given to me by the general staff also went as engineers of the Auto-Motor Export Corp.

I had a special delegation which came from Turkey of five military men with a general at the head. The Turkish Ambassador in Moscow was Vasyf Chinar who was in charge of carrying this contract and the contract was signed with the Turkish Ambassador. The legation came. They were very strict about the requirements. They were very much pleased.

So I had to go to Marshal Tukachevsky and ask to borrow tanks and armored cars from the Red Army reserve in order to fulfill the requirements.

Senator EASTLAND. Were they for the Turkish Government?

Mr. BARMINE. That was officially for the Turkish Government. Our Government gave them a loan. This loan was 20 years without interest.

Senator EASTLAND. What about the arms in China? Was that for the Chinese Government, or to promote revolution in China?

Mr. BARMINE. I didn't inquire of General Berzin. It wouldn't be proper for me to inquire the purpose of it. He was my superior.

Senator EASTLAND. What was your judgment as to what the material was used for?

Mr. BARMINE. I understand the situation in China for many years before and after was the situation which the policy of the Russian Government was to seek a decision by force of arms and before this cache of arms and ammunition would be held up until the moment when the military situation in every area would be favorable or Chinese Communists would be there and could be supplied. Of course that is my guess. I didn't discuss the purpose of it. I just discussed the fact.

Mr. MORRIS. You were there to take orders, not to speculate?

Mr. BARMINE. In a sense. This is a delicate situation. The corporation belongs to the foreign trade department. The decision about any operation was to be approved by the Politburo. I couldn't deliver any arms without special decision by the Politburo signed by Stalin himself. There would be no possibility of that. All 90 percent of the motor department operation was every time by specific approval of the Politburo. I had to receive a decision signed that I received it and I would have to carry it out.

So before the final decision on this it would be by the Politburo. This was exploratory conversation because they obviously—military intelligence had special assignments. They were looking for a way to accomplish it. Being the president of this corporation and at the same time I was a general staff officer and was still at this time, until 1935, at the disposal of General Berzin, but he wouldn't press it because—it would be only preliminary conversation about it. Was it possible to do? Would it be convenient? What are the ways?

Then we would have to go to the Chinese Commission of the Politburo and get the approval. Of course foreign trade department was rather reluctant. They considered that we would be involved in something more than official delivery of arms to the governments. That would be some kind of an entirely new operation. Rozenholz was very reluctant. In fact, he accused me of going too far along with the War Department, Tukachevsky and Berzin.

He went to the Politburo asking that I would be retired from active reserve and would remain only completely civilian as the chief of the corporation because he felt, due to my relations with Berzin, there was undue influence and I was carrying too much military side of it. I said it would be not for any relations. We couldn't get a lot of arms and ammunition from the war department if we couldn't get the training instructors to carry it out so successfully. Still he went and that was the reason why in 1935 I was put on the retirement list. Rozenholz announced this to me. I was put on the retirement list and that brought also the cooling of relations and that is why at the end of 1935 I asked to be relieved. I went to the foreign office and was sent to Greece.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you tell us about the Institute of Pacific Relations? You have now given us the details leading up to that.

Mr. BARMINE. When the question arose about the opening of this cache of arms, there was a question of personnel, whom I could put in charge.

Senator FERGUSON. You are talking about China?

Mr. BARMINE. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Mundt, you are welcome here and will you please have a seat at the table with us.

Mr. BARMINE. At this time I had already difficulty with the personnel. I had about three or four hundred people working in Sinkiang in western China. I had to send a very huge commission to Turkey for the delivery of the arms. Then I had to get our Air Force officers and mechanics for Turkey and for Persia before I ran out of trained people whom I could have. The first of my objections to General Berzin was that this is a very delicate affair. You have to have reliable people. Then you have to have competent people in charge of those branches.

Mr. MORRIS. When you use the term "reliable" you mean people loyal to your organization?

Mr. BARMINE. No. I mean people who would be trained in carrying this kind of secret operation out, who would have military training to take care of arms and who would be responsible enough not to let these things all open.

Senator FERGUSON. That was secret, the armed part of your corporation?

Mr. BARMINE. Always top secret.

Senator FERGUSON. Putting it in the warehouse, putting the motors and the automobiles in the warehouse, was secret because, after all, they were arms and ammunition?

Mr. BARMINE. The Soviet Government didn't care about it being known we are exporting arms. So I said to him that I couldn't get any more. One man from the Air Force, one man from the tank forces, one from the artillery division of the General Staff—I got several for Turkey. I couldn't get any more. He complained they had to give me some of their best officers to carry this out. It was a conference in which Terian——

Mr. MORRIS. Spell that, please.

Mr. BARMINE. T-e-r-i-a-n.

Mr. MORRIS. Who was he?

Mr. BARMINE. General Berzin's deputy. Then Malikoff, who was the military resident in western China——

Mr. MORRIS. Spell that, please.

Mr. BARMINE. M-a-l-i-k-o-f-f.

General Berzin said, "We might give you our men."

Mr. MORRIS. "Give you some of our men" did he say?

Mr. BARMINE. For working in China or on the problems of China.

Mr. MORRIS. People who had been working in the China area on China problems?

Mr. BARMINE. That is right.

Senator FERGUSON. They would be intelligence officers?

Mr. BARMINE. These people when he mentioned "our men," talking about intelligence, that means there was a member of this apparatus of the military intelligence and working on an assignment for them.

Mr. MORRIS. They are members of the Soviet military intelligence organization?

Mr. BARMINE. When General Berzin said "I might give you our men," I assumed that is the only thing he could mean. I didn't question him more.

In this connection several names were mentioned. Now I have to state here most of the personnel, except the top supervising jobs, most of the personnel were used in underground work by military intelligence which was completely separate of what we were doing in the foreign office, and that work was carried by the foreigners, people with foreign passports, born in foreign countries, because they would not be so obvious as Russians. All the top controlling positions would be Russians and even not always that. Most of the personnel would be all professional intelligence people, recruited from the different groups, people recruited among the sympathizers of Communist causes or even men specially assigned by the foreign Communist Party for military intelligence work.

Of course, at the moment when they would be detached for the military intelligence work they would rave to break any connection, formal connection, with the Communist Party.

Mr. MORRIS. They would have to break formal connection?

Mr. BARMINE. Not to participate in any other form of party activity. In every Communist Party in the central committee there would be a special person who would be in charge of collecting the military information from the Communist Party cells and also going through this selecting and assigning the personnel who would be completely delivered for good to the military intelligence. When the question of using military men of the intelligence apparatus came to discussion, several names were mentioned of foreign nationalities.

Mr. MORRIS. Who were they, Mr. Barmine?

Mr. BARMINE. So far is I can remember now, they were a few Russian names. Then they were French, Czechs, Germans, and Americans.

Mr. MORRIS. Who were the Americans?

Mr. BARMINE. Owen Lattimore and Joseph Barnes.

Mr. MORRIS. They were mentioned as "our people" by Berzin who could be assigned to this project you were complaining about where you did not have the personnel to staff.

Mr. BARMINE. We played with this idea. It was one of the possibilities which was discussed.

Senator EASTLAND. Just exactly what did he say about Mr. Lattimore?

Mr. BARMINE. You see, I want to emphasize that this project which finally was never realized by me was only a very small part of the preparation. I had the assignment of delivery to western China and Turkey. We spent hours in long conferences on these. This was 15 or 16 years ago.

Senator FERGUSON. Just give it to us the best you can.

Mr. BARMINE. To tell you exactly what words, I would not like to say anything I don't remember very firmly.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you tell us your recollection of that conversation and subsequent conversations?

Mr. BARMINE. All I can recollect is subsequent conversations, the question of the personnel or reliable people who ought to organize it or put in charge or to start this business. It was because I said I had no man who could do it, I could not spare anyone for preparation. Then he talked about General Terian and that was the question of who might be suitable. Among the names was a Czech, the one whom I knew personally.

Mr. MORRIS. What was the Czech's name?

Mr. BARMINE. Creichi. I knew only about Creichi because he was in Germany.

Mr. MORRIS. That is C-r-e-i-c-h-i?

Mr. BARMINE. C-r-e-i-c-h-i, probably this way; I would not know how to spell it in English.

Mr. MORRIS. You do recall that Creichi's name, Barnes' name, and Lattimore's name were mentioned as "our people who could be assigned to you"?

Mr. BARMINE. There were French, German, there were two Russians, Mamaiev——

Mr. MORRIS. How do you spell that name?

Mr. BARMINE. M-a-m-a-i-e-v.

Mr. MORRIS. He was Russian?

Mr. BARMINE. Yes. There was Vatmanov, V-a-t-m-a-n-o-v. This one was the highest division because they were Russians and they carried all the part of the job from the military intelligence.

Senator EASTLAND. Now General Berzin was the head of Soviet military intelligence?

Mr. BARMINE. That is right.

Senator EASTLAND. He spoke of Mr. Lattimore and Mr. Barnes as two agents of Soviet military intelligence

Mr. BARMINE. He spoke of them as "our men"?

Senator O'CONOR. He referred to them as "our men"?

Mr. BARMINE. Yes.

Senator FERGUSON. Meaning Russian men?

Mr. BARMINE. It was my understanding meaning military intelligence.

Senator O'CONOR. Had you ever heard of Owen Lattimore and Joseph Barnes before that?

Mr. BARMINE. No.

Senator O'CONOR. Did you later hear of them?

Mr. MORRIS. You see, there were more conversations where those names were mentioned.

Mr. BARMINE. They were the first American names that ever came to me.

Senator O'CONOR. They were the first two Americans who were ever described to you as being identified with the Russian cause?

Mr. BARMINE. Ever mentioned in connection with any of my work for many years before that.

Senator O'CONOR. In the first conversation did General Berzin say anything further that you can recall as to what Owen Lattimore and Joseph Barnes had done or were prepared to do?

Mr. BARMINE. Now the question was that—we were talking the first time of the whole affair; the problem of personnel was not the biggest one. The problem was principally how to go about it. Would it be possible technically? How we were going to ask permission of the Politburo to do it? What would be the position of the Commissar of the Foreign Trade Department? These things were mentioned. When the practical solution would come, we would come back to it again. The question which was pushed on this conference was, "Do they have men to give me and do they have suitable men?" Later they decided most of these men they couldn't spare, they had other things to do and more important things, and they were not suitable for this purpose.

Mr. MORRIS. Now, Mr. Barmine, these names that were mentioned in the first conversation were repeated again?

Mr. BARMINE. I wouldn't recall that conversation, the first.

Mr. MORRIS. These names came up not only once but they came up more than once?

Mr. BARMINE. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. In which they discussed the possibility of making Lattimore, Barnes, Creichi, Mamaiev and Vatmanov available to your organization?

Mr. BARMINE. It was not discussed how they would be available, what position they would take and what capacity. This was the first idea only.

Senator FERGUSON. Who was present at this first conversation where these two names were mentioned? Will you tell us who were there besides General Berzin?

Mr. BARMINE. General Terian and General Malikov.

Senator FERGUSON. This was their headquarters?

Mr. BARMINE. General Berzin's office where I usually came to talk to him.

Senator FERGUSON. An official conversation?

Mr. BARMINE. We were talking about our work.

Senator EASTLAND. Was his office the Kremlin?

Mr. BARMINE. No, it was on a small street, the intelligence office was on a small street around the corner from the main War Department building.

Senator EASTLAND. He did not speak of them as Communists but as military agents of the Soviet Union?

Mr. BARMINE. He spoke about "our men" and I assume when people work in military intelligence they usually have no more formal connections with the party at that time.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Barmine, did he mention to you in any of those conversations what organizations they were working for, that is, Barnes and Lattimore in particular?

Mr. BARMINE. Not in that conversation.

Mr. MORRIS. In subsequent conversations did General Berzin tell you what organizations they were working with?

The CHAIRMAN. During a subsequent conversation did they tell you what organization these men were working with?

Mr. BARMINE. When it came to the second time, as I remember, that was the first time the Institute of Pacific Relations was mentioned. The question was that there were more important things and they would be more suitable with the plans in connection with the Institute of Pacific Relations, the building up of the branches of the Institute of Pacific Relations, and the military using it for a cover shop for military intelligence work in the Pacific area.

The CHAIRMAN. When did you first hear the term "Institute of Pacific Relations?"

Mr. BARMINE. I first read about it—at this time when this was mentioned first in the office of General Berzin I had not the faintest idea that the Institute of Pacific Relations had anything to do with this kind of affair. All I knew about it was what I read in the newspapers at this time in Moscow. My idea was that it was probably some kind of geographical, scientific organization, and I think that was probably correct at that time.

Senator FERGUSON. What year was that?

Mr. BARMINE. I think it was shortly before, probably in 1934 or 1935.

Mr. MORRIS. How did General Berzin describe the Institute of Pacific Relations to you from this point of view?

Mr. BARMINE. This was not describing the Institute of Pacific Relations, of course, because these things, when you spoke, they were mentioned passingly because you assumed all you know about it or you are not supposed to know more than you are told at this moment. I couldn't question my superior about what his plans are. The question was only that in this long conference when we came back again to the question of personnel he said that we had some important planning developments in connection with the Institute of Pacific Relations and the men would be valuable more in connection with this, so let us forget about them.

Senator FERGUSON. What men would be valuable in that institute?

Mr. BARMINE. Lattimore and Barnes, Americans.

Senator O'CONOR. How long was that after the first conversation? About what interval of time was that?

Mr. BARMINE. I couldn't answer you exactly because I was seeing him at this time probably two or three times a week. It would certainly be within a period of 4 weeks.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Barmine, as a result of these conversations with General Berzin and the other generals in which you discussed the Institute of Pacific Relations, what was your understanding of the nature of the Institute as a result of those conversations?

Mr. BARMINE. You see, when this was mentioned, we speak, we sit in General Berzin's office, then the conference is finished. I go to Terian's office or Malikov's office and we talk about what happened because we have to carry things, and then we refer to the conversations which were held in this. Of course, I imagine I could not recollect now how I would state it, because there were hours of conversation, but certainly I am sure I expressed some surprise about the Institute of Pacific Relations brought into our affairs. I knew of the cover shop that would be put up for intelligence agents' use or some expert in a private firm of Belgium, France, or Italy, or whatever it was, but that was the first time.

Mr. MORRIS. So you understood it to be a cover shop?

Mr. BARMINE. Then we talked about it and I was explained by Terain more in detail what Berzin just mentioned, and then it was a question of what is the plan. I couldn't ask much. You are not supposed in this world to ask things that are not directly in your line of duty. Whatever my friends would volunteer me to say, and frankly, it is of big importance now here, but it was of a very secondary and small importance for me at that time. The idea was, as I was explained, that the Institute of Pacific Relations being an organization who can carry research work, who can open branches around the Pacific in the countries where we were not yet recognized—the Soviet Union at this time has no embassy all around the Pacific area—with this difficulty about contacts, the idea which I was given was that that is the idea, under-cover work when you can have legal reasons and innocent reasons to travel to do specifically military research and reconnoitering work and gathering of information materials, because military intelligence is comprised of the gathering of printed material, classified and unclassified, of every kind. You have reason to keep the foreign members of the military network on the job, you can send them from one area to another, you can have for them a legitimate reason to have their offices to gather information, to get in contact with people who know something about geography, topography, and many other things.

So the explanation I was given was that the Intelligence Division considered this a very valuable outlet, a very valuable cover organization, they have an important plan for it, because it would be extremely convenient.

Now what I want to say is that there was no idea of any question of political work, it was purely professional, just to use the organization, develop it in a way where it could contribute for the assignment that military intelligence had.

Senator EASTLAND. In reality, it was considered an arm of the Soviet military intelligence; is that right?

Mr. BARMINE. I do not know when it was decided, how it was decided, but at this moment when I came to this picture, as I say accidentally, for a very short time, at this time this was considered important for Russia, which was developing to use this and to build within this organization the convenient apparatus which could have this very innocent and respectable cover.

Senator EASTLAND. But to make it an agent of Soviet military intelligence was the plan, was it not?

Mr. BARMINE. You see, how you come to make an agent, it is not just that you hire somebody for a job the way you hire for any organization. Some of the people who would work in the institute would not know that they were working for military intelligence. Some of them will be drafted into it gradually, first given an assignment to make an expedition for research to go to China, Manchuria, Korea, and then there would be military topography, and finally the men would be drafted in and one moment the point will come when maybe there will be disclosed whom they are working for and they consider to be reliable and willing to do this job. That is a gradual process and different with every person.

Senator EASTLAND. Whether all the people knew it or not, the Soviet military intelligence planned that this organization would be its agent?

Mr. BARMINE. I would term it not as an organization as such but the organization would be infiltrated, then the organization would be used for recruiting, for bringing people into this organization, and gradually take some of them who came to this organization with an innocent purpose or scientific purpose.

Senator EASTLAND. Did you know at that time that Mr. Lattimore was in the Institute of Pacific Relations?

Mr. BARMINE. No, I didn't.

Mr. MORRIS. You learned it in the conversations?

Mr. BARMINE. We had plans for them in the Institute of Pacific Relations. I couldn't ask who Mr. Lattimore was, what he was doing, was he on the job there or not.

I explained to you all this procedure. For me, I had by this time intelligence training. I went through special courses. For me, it was not necessary to explain me all this in detail, just mentioning the question we are going and we are planning to use this for our purpose; it would be not for me—all the rest I told you, the matter of operation would be something part of my training, I would know how it was done. It was not necessary to be explained to me in connection with the institute.

Senator EASTLAND. Later General Berzin told you to forget the plans for Lattimore and Barnes, that they had more important assignments for them?

Mr. BARMINE. In connection with the institute. Then I asked questions about the institute.

Senator FERGUSON. I wonder there whether or not he could explain the difference between a front that you set up and one that they penetrate.

The CHAIRMAN. I think, Senator, that is exactly what he was explaining a minute or so ago.

Mr. BARMINE. If you want me to, I can tell you.

Senator FERGUSON. In as short a way as you can. And which was the Institute of Pacific Relations? Was it a front or one that you would penetrate?

Mr. BARMINE. Of course you have sometimes what we call a cover shop. It was specially organized for the narrow military purpose. It was phony, it was a fake. There would be some import-export business or some kind of shop or some tourist office which would be built as a place for a rendezvous or a gathering and for giving the reason for legal residence in the area.

Now this of course was a different project to the extent they had an organization that existed already that was found to be ideally suitable for not just one local place but there was a whole Pacific area that they could give movement for people and open very large possibilities for intelligence work. So it was not especially built up from an organization which should be infiltrated, taken over at the most decided place. When the question of moving people, there would be enough people there who could report to the military network, work within the organization undisturbed for their operations for collection of material, for recruiting people and all.

Senator FERGUSON. So the Institute of Pacific Relations was the latter set-up that you were going to use and were using; is that right?

Mr. BARMINE. That is right; that is my understanding of it. Of course I have to qualify this as my conclusion on the basis of my training, because it was not considered enough to explain to me.

Senator O'CONOR. They did not have to tell you a great deal; you had had enough experience to put two and two together.

The point I would like to have you clear up for us is whether or not in their discussions about the Institute of Pacific Relations it was all as to what they planned to do or whether or not at that time or subsequently you got any information as to what they had accomplished, whether they had succeeded in getting to it.

Mr. BARMINE. At this time, as I understood it, it was already in process.

Senator O'CONOR. In other words, they had already infiltrated?

Mr. BARMINE. I don't know how much they had, but the development of this operation was in process. I couldn't ask about anything, but so far as I was told I was told it was in process. Then it came completely out of the sphere of activity. When I went to Greece I did not hear anything about it except I would see and read in the newspaper about formal activity, and I was not interested really at this time, of course.

Senator FERGUSON. It was your understanding that these Americans were already in this service or would be put in the Institute of Pacific Relations?

Mr. BARMINE. In the service generally. Whether they were at this time actively connected with the IPR and there were plans for them to do it, I wouldn't know it.

Senator FERGUSON. You do not know?

Mr. BARMINE. At this moment I wouldn't ask about it. I was told we have plans for them in connection with the institute. I couldn't tell you whether actually they were already in it or preparing something.

Mr. SOURWINE. You make a distinction there, General, do you not? You say you got the clear implication that they already were "our men," that they were already working for General Berzin.

Mr. BARMINE. It was not for me. So far as it was told by General Berzin, it was a fact.

Mr. SOURWINE. It was a question of where they were working, you did not know?

Mr. BARMINE. That is right.

Mr. MORRIS. Did you recall the two names so that when you had a discussion with General Krivitsky some years later you asked him about those?

Mr. BARMINE. That is right.

Senator FERGUSON. What was the time of the conversation?

Mr. BARMINE. It was in early 1938 when I was in France.

Mr. MORRIS. This is after you had separated yourself from the Soviet organization?

Mr. BARMINE. That is right.

Mr. MORRIS. In France in 1938?

Mr. BARMINE. In France in 1938.

Mr. MORRIS. Tell us of your conversaiton with General Krivitsky. Identify him first.

Mr. BARMINE. It happened this way: At this time after several Soviet attempts on me the French Government gave me special protection. I had two detectives day and night with me who were accompanying me wherever I would go in Paris, and also police in the night near my house. Once one of the detectives told me that the other two were guarding General Krvitsky in Paris, they kept him in the hotel room under constant guard. He told me he was very jittery and nervous, very depressed, and they were just worrying about him very much. Then my French friends who were in contact with him said that he asked if possible that I should go and see him probably to cheer him up, because I was maybe in a better mood. So it was arranged that I would go and see him in his hotel and talk.

Well, I had a personal interest in this rendezvous for other reasons because in 1937 in Paris when there was a special group assigned, sent partly from Moscow and partly organized in France, which had an assignment to kill Ignatz Reiss and me——

Mr. MORRIS. Krivitsky told you this?

Mr. BARMINE. I knew this, because the French police blew it up and they arrested several. They succeeded to trace me already. At this time several of them were arrested. Therefore I was saved from the possibility of the same thing.

What I knew from my French friends who were in contact with Krivitsky, Krivitsky participated in this conference in which the decision to liquidate me and Reiss was discussed. I wanted to know about it, to ask Krivitsky what was talked and what was going on and his part in it.

The CHAIRMAN. You wanted to know how you were going to be liquidated?

Mr. MORRIS. He had broken with the Soviet organization also.

Mr. BARMINE. At this moment when he asked me to see him, but when this group came to Paris in 1937, in July, he was called to this conference by Spiegelglass and that was discussed because it so happened that Reiss broke from the Soviet organization in Holland almost exactly the same day as I did in Athens. Reiss was killed in Switzerland later. We almost at the same time left the respective countries and came to Paris.

I didn't know about this break at this time at all, but this group who came, was organized in Paris, and the people who came from Moscow, had an assignment to liquidate both of us. That is what Krivitsky told. So when I went to see him I was interested not only in cheering him up but finding what this was all about.

Now subsequently I saw Krivitsky two or three times more, always at his request. At one of these meetings there was talk of he was planning to go to the United States, he was trying to get a visa to the United States, and so I was planning to do the same thing.

At this time, you see, you have to understand psychologically when you are breaking you are very much feeling alone and then you expect when all these ugly things you knew were going on about Russia that you were able to persuade other people to do the same thing. Now the experience with Reiss, who was trying to persuade one of his friends and was taken into the trap and murdered, he was made to think that you should be cautious. Of course when you plan to come to the United States you try to find people who feel the same way as you do, who went through the same tragedy that you went through, and try to persuade them also to break. So we were talking about the people who would come here, who we might see, and who we can approach or who we should be careful about, too.

From the other point of view I never met Krivitsky during my intelligence work because he was in the underground network.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you identify his position?

Mr. BARMINE. I can identify only so far as he told me myself. As I say, he worked under different names. As I say, the group who was working within the Soviet organization, the foreign office and trade office, except when it was necessary for some particular things, were never told about people who worked in the underground. You could guess it.

I could see in passing through Berlin one of my classmates in general staff in civilian clothes. As I remember, I met one in the railroad station. I wouldn't recognize, of course, and I would never ask him about him, but that would give me the idea that this, my friend is working also for military intelligence in the underground military network. That would be my assumption. So I could meet one accidentally or meet him at the entrance of Berzin's office at intelligence. We don't ask people where they are coming from and what they are doing, why they are here, or in Berlin, or why they are in Paris. So I wouldn't know anything about it. So I would have to believe what he told me.

Of course I was interested, to be sure, and I was checking him. In the first of my conferences with him and in the second time when I saw him we talked for hours and I was putting the question to confirm to me what he told about himself. I would ask him about people in the military intelligence, does he know this one or that one and whom he would know.

Mr. MORRIS. You asked him if he knew Barnes and Lattimore?

Mr. BARMINE. That is right.

Mr. MORRIS. You wanted to know whom to be careful of?

Mr. BARMINE. Not necessarily. I didn't know anything about this man except what I told you. I didn't know about whom I should be careful about, but I asked him what he knows. As I say, this conversation went for hours. There were many things to talk and many questions to ask about people who disappear, about people who work, about people whom we might meet, and when the two names and several others came back again then I remember I asked him about the Institute of Pacific Relations.

The thing I could only say was that he said this operation was very successful because he, who had contact with military intelligence people who worked in the United States, told me that. He was informed more than I was on what was going on in military intelligence work in the United States.

What he told me, I would be amazed how many very important contacts the people working in the institute got, they were very influential and important, and he had some high hopes when he would come here that from the one point of view, high hopes that he could not only contact them but——

Mr. MORRIS. May I bring that out so it is clearly understood? In other words, when you discussed the Institute of Pacific Relations with General Krivitsky he told you that that particular Soviet operation, the cover shop in the institute, was doing very well and you would be amazed at what important contacts they were making in connection with their work?

Mr. BARMINE. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you develop that?

Mr. BARMINE. I would say the word used in Russian was "flourishing."

Mr. MORRIS. That is the word he used?

Mr. BARMINE. Yes. I had no idea of American political situations and conditions. I had no questions to ask. I would not understand much, of course, what that meant. I assumed only from a purely professional point of view that they are flourishing in the sense that this operation on military lines was going successfully. That was all at this time that came to my mind.

Mr. MORRIS. What is the Russian word for "flourishing?"

Mr. BARMINE. Prozdetaet.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Barmine, did he also confirm your impression of Barnes and Lattimore, your recollection of Barnes and Lattimore that is?

Mr. BARMINE. He knew about them.

Mr. MORRIS. Did he know they were members of the Soviet organization?

Mr. BARMINE. Now, at this time he told me that they were connected with the institute. So then I knew what he is telling me, because it was important for me, because very few people that I would know, that he would tell the truth that he ever had contact with the agents in the United States, that he is really covered with the person that he tells he is.

Senator FERGUSON. I do not think he answered your question.

Senator O'CONOR. He has not told us specifically what General Krivitsky told him about Barnes and Lattimore.

Mr. BARMINE. That they are working within the Institute of Pacific Relations and they are still, what he said, "they are still our men."

Mr. MORRIS. At this point, Mr. Chairman, I think it is wise if we have Mr. Mandel testify to what positions Mr. Lattimore and Mr. Barnes held in the institute during this period. Mr. Mandel has been sworn previously.

TESTIMONY OF BENJAMIN MANDEL, DIRECTOR OF RESEARCH, SUBCOMMITTEE TO INVESTIGATE THE ADMINISTRATION OF THE INTERNAL SECURITY ACT AND OTHER INTERNAL SECURITY LAWS, OF THE SENATE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY

Mr. MANDEL. The literature and files of the Institute of Pacific Relations show that Joseph Barnes was secretary of the American council and served on its staff from 1931 to 1934, and Owen Lattimore was the editor of the official organ of the Institute called Pacific Affairs.

Senator EASTLAND. Is that the Joseph Barnes who was foreign editor of the New York Herald Tribune?

Mr. MANDEL. Yes sir.

Senator EASTLAND. Was he stationed in Moscow for that paper?

Mr. MANDEL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. How long was Lattimore in the Institute of Pacific Relations?

Mr. MANDEL. He began to serve approximately in 1934. I think he served in that position until 1941.

Senator O'CONOR. Editor of Pacific Affairs?

Mr. MORRIS. Editor of Pacific Affairs.

TESTIMONY OF ALEXANDER GREGORY BARMINE—Resumed

Senator JENNER. Senator McCarthy said last year that Lattimore was the top agent of the Communist Party. As a former agent of the Kremlin, would you say that that statement was true in view of what you have learned from your conservations with the chief of the Russian military intelligence, with that gentleman in Paris, or other conversations?

Mr. BARMINE. I told you exactly what I know. So I don't know enough to say anything about this statement, because what I knew about them I told you everything. I don't know anything more.

Senator JENNER. When the chief of the military intelligence says, "He is one of our men," would that leave the impression in your mind that he was a top Communist in America?

Mr. BARMINE. Not necessarily. That assumes it; that doesn't preclude it.

Senator FERGUSON. Is there a difference being a high Communist official and agent for the military intelligence of Soviet Russia?

Mr. BARMINE. Agents for military intelligence would not be necessarily, rather more as a rule, would not be high Communist officials.

Senator FERGUSON. They would not be high Communists——

Mr. BARMINE. Officials, but in the organization of the Communist Party would be a very high Communist official who would channel people for military intelligence work.

Senator EASTLAND. Of course they were made to resign from the party?

Mr. BARMINE. Take them out of party work and send them for assignment. Duclos was such a man in France at the time I was there.

Senator FERGUSON. When you were in the intelligence branch of the Russian Government you were not a high Communist Party member?

Mr. BARMINE. I was never a Communist Party official. I was just a member of the party and that was all.

Senator EASTLAND. You were not in the underground work?

Mr. BARMINE. Never.

Mr. MORRIS. You were in military intelligence?

Mr. BARMINE. I joined the Communist Party in 1919, the same day I volunteered in the army and went to the Red army. Since then I remained a member of the party of average standing, I would say, but I never held any Communist position in the party apparatus.

Mr. MORRIS. Did you testify that when you did discuss Barnes and Lattimore with Krivitsky in Paris that Krivitsky did state they were members of the Soviet organization?

That was your testimony, was it not, General?

Mr. BARMINE. That is what he told me.

Mr. MORRIS. That is what he told you. I want to bring that out because it was not understood by everyone.

Senator O'CONOR. You have been very fair in not attempting to overstate anything you do not know.

Mr. BARMINE. It is difficult for me because so many years passed and so many things happened since, before, during, and after. This was very accidental and not a substantial part of whatever I went through. So I am rather under strain trying to remember exactly and answer questions that would be truthful. I am afraid to say something that wasn't correct.

Senator O'CONOR. You did not anticipate at that time you would be in this position and it would have so much importance.

Mr. BARMINE. I did not anticipate I would be in the United States and I did not anticipate I would ever have to talk about the Institute of Pacific Relations.

Senator O'Conor. Nevertheless, as a very experienced and intelligent military officer, did you not have the feeling or did you have the feeling that Lattimore and Barnes were actively engaged in work for the Soviet Union rather than just being used by them? We are trying to distinguish whether you got the impression they were just being used or whether or not they were actively identified with the Soviet intelligence.

Mr. Barmine. Well, as I say, the process of becoming an active member is slow and gradual and different with every person, but as much as I can understand at this time, when I was told by General Berzin and repeated by Krivitsky my assumption was that they were in active and conscious participation.

Senator O'Conor. That is what I want, active and conscious participation.

Mr. Barmine. I can't tell you that, that is only my assumption.

Senator Eastland. Did you tell any agency of the United States Government what you knew about Lattimore and Barnes?

Mr. Barmine. When I was asked by the FBI agent who came to me I told him exactly the same thing as I told you. I was asked about it several times and I told it very early. They came to me several times and it was several years ago already and then they came repeatedly. So I couldn't tell you exactly the date.

Senator Ferguson. During this last hearing when they were having hearings before the Foreign Relations Committee last year were you approached by the FBI?

Mr. Barmine. Yes.

Senator Ferguson. Did you tell them that at that time?

Mr. Barmine. That is right.

Senator Ferguson. Were you ever questioned by any of the committee members or the counsel about coming in as a witness?

Mr. Barmine. No.

Senator Ferguson. Or giving this evidence?

Mr. Barmine. No.

Senator Ferguson. But the FBI did have that evidence that you have told here this morning about Mr. Barnes and Mr. Lattimore; is that right?

Mr. Barmine. Well, if you call it evidence——

Senator Ferguson. Well, your statements that you gave here.

Mr. Barmine. Yes.

Senator Ferguson. You mean to count that as evidence, do you not? It is what happened?

Mr. Barmine. I have to tell you that when I got this to the FBI, I just considered in the sense that I learned to understand the evidence, I was very reluctant that this thing should be used, because I think it is a very old story and since then many things could happen, and that was all that I knew, but it was after all not my direct knowledge from the workings.

Senator Eastland. You just told them what you have told us?

Senator Ferguson. You understand what you are saying here today is evidence? You have been sworn to tell the truth.

Mr. Barmine. I know that is the truth. I am not legally qualified to weigh how much evidence is this.

Mr. Morris. Mr. Barmine, I wonder if you would tell us if you have done anything to counteract the effect of Mr. Lattimore's performances in the United States?

Mr. BARMINE. You see, when I first came to this country I did not know the English language at all. I couldn't say a word. So I started to learn English in 1940. So I had a very little idea of what was going on in America's political life. Then I was studying it very intensively and I began to read the newspapers. That was my manual for my English.

Then I was approached by several magazines for whom I worked giving advice and editorial assistance on some stories. Many times I was approached by Life or Time magazine. I published several articles and then I began to work with the Reader's Digest.

From the Army I was transferred to OSS and I remained in OSS, in the Office of Strategic Services, until the fall of 1944. At the same time I began to work as editorial adviser to Reader's Digest. In 1944 I wrote an article in the Reader's Digest about Communist infiltration in the Government apparatus in the United States.

When I was writing this article I had in mind the background of all the things I told you, but I was not considering it possible or proper to bring it out publicly. What I wanted, I wanted to warn the Government about infiltration, about the way, about the plans, and about the scope of the danger. I was discharged from the Office of Strategic Services after that.

Senator FERGUSON. After you published the Reader's Digest article?

Mr. BARMINE. That is right, in 1944. Then I remained with Reader's Digest in an editorial capacity, but this time I learned about the Chinese problem in relation with the American foreign policy, and I would say I was very much worried about the course that this development took and about the propaganda that was spread at this time on China.

Now I was asked by Reader's Digest to pass on manuscripts, articles which were connected with Soviet policy and communism. And I was asked to give my opinion about the condensation of the Lattimore book, Solution in Asia, in 19— I couldn't say exactly, but it was probably in the spring of 1945.

Mr. MORRIS. April 7, 1945?

Mr. BARMINE. In the spring of 1945.

Well, my opinion was asked about this book and I wrote a memorandum for Reader's Digest because I considered this book a very clever camouflage Communist propaganda.

Mr. MORRIS. You had in mind your previous conversations with General Berzin and General Krivitsky?

Mr. BARMINE. I had it in mind but I did not consider that was necessarily relevant to the point, because many years passed, I would consider this book on its merits and the position of the author. I considered this book tremendously harmful and deceiving. This was my opinion expressed to the editor of Reader's Digest.

The CHAIRMAN. Who was the author of that book?

Mr. BARMINE. Owen Lattimore. My recommendation was that if this condensation of the book would be published in many millions of copies in Reader's Digest would bring very serious harm to the interest of the United States.

A lot of pressure was put on the Director of the Reader's Digest to publish the condensation. Practically when I was writing this memo I was called every day and told the editor in chief demanded the memo because a decision must be made, they considered it very important. So I wouldn't be sure that the memo was decisive, but as a result of the memo the decision was taken by Reader's Digest against publishing the condensation.

I reworked this memo in the form of a review of the book. I gave this review and it was printed in the New Leader.

Mr. MORRIS. At this point, Mr. Chairman, I would like to offer into evidence a copy of the book review of Solution in Asia by Owen Latimore, reviewed by Alexander Barmine, which appeared in New Leader on April 7, 1945. I would like to introduce that in the record at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. This is a public issue that was put out?

Mr. MORRIS. A book review by Mr. Barmine of Lattimore's book Solution in Asia.

The CHAIRMAN. It may be received in the record.

EXHIBIT No. 40

[From the New Leader, April 7, 1945]

BOOKS IN REVIEW—NEW DEFENDER FOR YENAN

(By Alexander Barmine)

SOLUTION IN ASIA. By Owen Lattimore. Little, Brown & Co., New York. 214 pages. $2.

The Chinese Communists have been particularly fortunate in the American newspaper correspondents who have written about the controversy between Chungking and Yenan. Through such writers as Brooks Atkinson, Edgar Snow, Agnes Smedley, Harrison Forman, and Owen Lattimore, the cause of the Yenan regime has been pleaded to the American public more effectively, persuasively, and cleverly, than any known Communist could possibly do it. Lattimore is the smoothest propagandist among them all, precisely because he gives the appearance of being objective, realistic, and factual.

Owen Lattimore, after various experiences in Asiatic affairs, including work for the Institute for Pacific Relations, was recommended by President Roosevelt as political adviser to Chiang Kai-shek and remained in that position for two years. He then occupied for several years the high post of Director of Pacific Operations for the OWI. It can be presumed that for Kuomintang leaders the conceptions and policy of Lattimore represented, or were identified with, those of the American Government. Notwithstanding his high authority, he evidently did not impress the Chinese, for Chiang Kai-shek's present policy is contrary to the appeasement of Chinese Communists—and consequently of quiet suicide—suggested to him by his former adviser in this book.

The main thesis of the book and the political philosophy of its author are exposed recklessly by the anonymous writer of the blurb on the jacket: "He (Lattimore) shows that all the Asiatic peoples are more interested in actual democratic practices, such as the ones they can see in action across the Russian border, than they are in the fine theories of Anglo-Saxon democracies which come coupled with ruthless imperialism * * * He inclines to support American newspapermen who report that the only real democracy in China is found in Communist areas."

Lattimore can hardly have known that a Little, Brown blurb writer was going to "spill the beans" in this naive way, for although this is a correct discription of what he attempts to do, he does it far more subtly than that. His book follows the propaganda line of the Communists and the Soviet Union faithfully, but it dresses this propaganda up to look like a "realistic" American policy, mixing it with many interesting comments and observations on things in general.

As a point of departure for his Solution in Asia, Lattimore takes from the Communists their mechanical and oversimplified division of Chinese social forces into two: "The Kuomintang-landlord right wing in China and the Communist-democratic-United Front left wing." If this dichotomy is accepted, of course there is no place for democracy in China except on the side of the Communist-dominated United Front.

The idea that American democracy might have anything to teach the Chinese in contrast to the official Soviet doctrines is dismissed by Lattimore in the following remark: "We may count on seeing, over wide areas (in Asia), the partial acceptance of Marxist ideas and the adoption of one or another part of the Soviet system. What, then, will be America's primary concern with Asiatic problems? * * * We cannot assume that Americans can draw authoritative blueprints for Asia." All the light, evidently, must come from Russia!

Here is Lattimore's evaluation of the Communist regime in China: "The political structure under the Communists is more nearly democratic than it is under the Kuomintang. It is a fact that governing committees and representative committees are elected, and that the Communists limit themselves (sic!) to one-third of the representation; whereas in Kuomintang-controlled territory it is increasingly difficult to hold a public position without joining the Kuomintang and accepting its discipline."

* * * * * * *

Lattimore presents a picture of Soviet Russia which corresponds accurately with his picture of Communist China. As usual, he begins cautiously with what in his opinion the Soviet Union represents to Asiatic peoples: "In their eyes * * * the Soviet Union stands for strategic security, economic prosperity, technological progress, miraculous medicine, free education, equality of opportunity, and democracy: a powerful combination." And then Lattimore adds his own opinion: "The fact that the Soviet Union also stands for democracy is not to be overlooked. It stands for democracy because it stands for all the other things."

"Here in America we are in the habit of taking a narrow view of foreign claimants to the status of democracy," Lattimore argues. "If China, or Russia, or some other alien people does not measure up to the standards of the particular American modification of Anglo-Saxon democracy, we say that it is not democratic * * * The fact is that for most of the people in the world today what constitutes democracy in theory is more or less irrelevant. What moves people to act, to try to line up with one party or country and not with another, is the difference between what is more democratic and less democratic in practice."

Why this more-than-tolerant approach, which includes Stalin's Russia and Mao Tse-tung's Communist China in the circle of democracies, is not applied by Lattimore to Kuomintang China is an unexplained mystery.

Lattimore presents a complicated and hazy plan of "reconciliation" or compromise with Communists in China. "We should advocate a reorganization of the National Army and the disbandment of superfluous troops. We should avoid isolating the problem of the Communist troops, remembering that there are also * * * regular troops which, while nominally part of the National Army, are in fact Kuomintang party troops." That is a familiar maneuver. The demand by the Eam to disband the Greek Regular Army as "proroyalist" was based on the same reasoning.

Lattimore is for liquidation of colonial empires in Asia. He has a more definite plan for defeated Japan. First, the question of ownership and management of Japan's industries: the holdings of principal Japanese capitalist families and corporations in banks, insurance, shipping, and other large corporations as well as in industry, should be taken over by the state. When it comes to the question of what social groups will constitute the state, and how the government will be formed, Lattimore says: "We must, on the other hand, not be soft with the old-school kimono 'liberals' who * * * made such a good impression on Wall Street, art collectors, and garden clubs. They were part of the liaison between predatory militarism and predatory big business."

Lattimore suggests vaguely for Japan that the leadership should be "left of center and at least liberal enough to be friendly with Russia." Does he mean a regime of the type used by Stalin in Rumania and Bulgaria, an amalgam of Fascist generals with Communists?

Lattimore disposes of Korea and both Mongolias as obviously within the sphere of Soviet influence. But what about the American policy toward China? "We do not want China to become dependent on us", i. e., on the democracies. Why? "Otherwise there would be grave danger of conflict between our China policy and that of Russia * * * Our relations with China today are getting uncomfortably close to this limit of safety."

It would seem that the opening of the Burma Road, and the prospect of enormous military help by the American armies, and our liberation of China, are a source of anxiety to Lattimore, since they may hinder the domination of the continent by Soviet Russia. He advises: "It is esssential that America should cease to be so conspicuously the main link between China and the United Nations."

"Britain and America can successfully support their legitimate capitalist interest in China, and at the same time work in cooperation with the Russians for democratic harmony in a country in which the second largest party is Communist. * * * China is but a major example of the new world situation. The world is now grouped in three major divisions. In one, the capitalist economic system and democratic political system are vigorous and unshaken. In another the Communist (or strictly speaking, the Socialist) political system is now permanently established and identified with a collectivist economic system. In the third, there is an adjustment yet to be made between capitalism and collectivism, and mixed political orders have not yet clearly taken shape."

Lattimore's "adjustment" between the first two divisions is obviously that of defeatist appeasement on the part of the capitalist democracies, which are to accept as inevitable a Soviet Communist domination of the Asiatic Continent. The third division, if his advice is followed, can be nothing but camouflaged Communist totalitarianism. That is his "Solution in Asa." He advises Americans to give in to it with a light heart, even though the Asiatic peoples, who may not like to be sold down the river so easily, continue to expect from us a vigorous assertion of democratic policy and of the principles of the Atlantic Charter.

There is in America a growing group of sophisticated intellectuals who call themselves left-wing liberals, and who are most vociferous and fanatical in demanding war to complete and crushing victory. But in reality they are complete defeatists who do not believe in the living force of democracy. They have lost faith in liberal ideals. They do not believe it possible to establish democracy in most of the liberated areas, are not willing to work for it, and instead are trying to force on the American Government the policy of selling the peoples of Asia to the Soviet form of totalitarianism.

This surrender of faith in democracy in favor of Soviet totalitarianism is permeating American public opinion. Under its influence America is in danger of adopting in Asia this same so-called realistic policy of appeasement and self-abdication which will not only abandon to totalitarianism several small nations, as in Europe, but hundreds of millions of Asiatics. This folly may ultimately spell the doom of democracy throughout the world.

The CHAIRMAN. That is an excerpt from your book?

Mr. BARMINE. This is a review of the book Solution in Asia. The basis of this review was my memorandum to Reader's Digest.

Mr. MORRIS. This is the second one you wrote? Once you wrote a memorandum to Reader's Digest pointing out the harm you thought was inherent in the book and in addition you wrote a book review for the New Leader?

Senator O'CONOR. The witness has described it as clever Communist propaganda, if I understood your description?

Mr. BARMINE. That was my impression.

Senator O'CONOR. Could you briefly elaborate on that and give us the benefit of your views as to why you described it thusly?

Mr. BARMINE. I don't think I could say it better than I put it.

Senator O'CONOR. You do give it in pretty lengthy fashion.

Mr. BARMINE. If you want a general appraisal, that would be the book which, if it could convince the people, would sell them unknowingly the Communist line in China which would be in the interest of the Soviet Union and disaster to the United States.

Senator O'CONOR. It did follow the Communist line?

Mr. BARMINE. In a very slick and smooth manner, in very devious ways. It never would be the direct statement of the author; it would be always related to people who think, people who say the other, but in fact it was telling the straight Communist line, camouflaged, I would say, very skilled.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Barmine, I point out one part of it which you have apparently taken out here, quoting your eighth paragraph. You say:

Lattimore presents a picture of Soviet Russia—

You can understand Soviet Russia, having been there all of your life—which corresponds accurately with his picture of Communist China. As usual, he begins cautiously with what in his opinion the Soviet Union represents to Asiatic people: "In their eyes * * * the Soviet Union stands for strategic security, economic prosperity, technological progress, miraculous medicine, free education, equality of opportunity, and democracy: a powerful combination." And then Lattimore adds his own opinion: "The fact that the Soviet Union also stands for democracy is not to be overlooked. It stands for democracy because it stands for all the other things."

You in your experience with the Soviet Union did not find that to be the case, did you, Mr. Barmine?

Mr. BARMINE. That is right. It was the picture that was presented usually by the Communists, the false picture of the Soviet Union.

Senator EASTLAND. You have read Mr. Lattimore's writings, have you not?

Mr. BARMINE. That was the first of his writings I ever read.

Senator EASTLAND. Judging alone from what he writes, would you say he is a Communist?

Mr. BARMINE. Do you mean formally a member of the party?

Senator EASTLAND. No, that he follows the policy of the Soviet Union.

Mr. BARMINE. Yes, I would say that he does follow the policy of the Soviet Union to propagandize this policy and he is helping this policy. That is my assumption on the basis of his writings.

Senator EASTLAND. It would be your judgment, then, if you knew nothing else, that he is a Communist?

Mr. BARMINE. Yes, I think that would be sufficient.

Senator O'CONOR. Would you say from a review of his writings and your knowledge of what you have learned of him in recent years, that the description given him by General Berzin as to his being one of their men is accurate?

Mr. BARMINE. Those two things, not necessarily.

Senator O'CONOR. Whether that was consistent with what General Berzin described?

Mr. BARMINE. When I first read this book my impression was that Mr. Lattimore was still at it, because I didn't know his development, his evolution. In this year many people who realized what was going on, they broke with it, some of them were honest and had illusions. The others finally parted ways, but of course I think in early years little was known about what was going on in Russia. By the time the book was published I am sure every intelligent man and scholar and especially the men who were in Russia continuing this kind of deceitful job knew it would be in direct support.

Senator EASTLAND. Would you say that he is the shrewdest and cleverest Communist propagandist in the United States?

Mr. BARMINE. I would say one of them, the most.

Senator FERGUSON. Do you know any others connected with the Institute of Pacific Relations that were in his class? I notice you name some in this book. You named Smedley, Forman, and Atkinson. Was Atkinson connected with the institute, do you know?

Mr. BARMINE. No. I was just reading the writings of these people. There was one of them only that I had occasion to hear myself. That was Mr. Harrison Forman who made a report about his trip to China in the Dutch Treat Club somewhere in this same period between 1943 and 1946, I think. Mr. Forman's report impressed me also as straight Communist propaganda.

Senator FERGUSON. You figure that this book was straight Communist propaganda of Owen Lattimore?

Mr. BARMINE. It was not straight; it was a very crooked one, in my opinion.

Senator FERGUSON. It was a clever piece?

Mr. BARMINE. It was very clever.

Senator FERGUSON. Was it Communist propaganda?

Mr. BARMINE. Well, there is nothing that could better serve the Communist cause in China than the book, in my opinion, to sell this line to the American people.

Senator FERGUSON. It was, therefore, in your opinion, following the Communist line as far as the Chinese problem is concerned?

Mr. BARMINE. It was following the Communist line, how to sell to the American people the Communist policy in China.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Barmine, would this review alter your impression of Mr. Lattimore in the sense that, instead of working in a cover shop, as you call it, he was now making policy? Would you comment on that in any way, please?

Mr. BARMINE. Well, as I say, I consider this book, if it would be taken at its face value, if it would be taken at its face value by people who were connected with foreign policy and worked in China, it would be very harmful to the interest of the United States. The position I took about this book was that this book was presenting a false picture; it was giving a false line to follow, and if the policy suggested in this book, the solution suggested by Mr. Lattimore at this time, were followed, it would bring disastrous results.

I remember when I was talking about this with the editors of Reader's Digest at this time in the beginning of 1945 I told them exactly the following, I remember it well, that for the struggle between democracy and communism maybe it doesn't mean so much if 15,000,000 Yugoslavs are on this side or another, but it will be disastrous if 500,000,000 Chinese will go over to the Communist side. A book of this kind can only facilitate this process by demoralizing the foreign policy of the United States.

Mr. MORRIS. Did this indicate to you in any way that the institute was making policy, and was that your impression of it when you discussed it with General Krivitsky and Berzin in 1935 and 1938?

Mr. BARMINE. No; I didn't discuss making policy, because I didn't have the faintest idea of what policy or what part in policy the institute was playing at this time.

Senator FERGUSON. I do not understand that this book was written under the auspices of the institute?

Mr. MORRIS. No.

Mr. BARMINE. I don't connect this book with the institute.

Mr. MORRIS. Have you done anything else, Mr. Barmine, about bringing out what you know about the Soviet Union to the American people?

Mr. BARMINE. I have written several articles. I have written a book. I was advising the magazines on this subject. I made a few speeches there.

Mr. MORRIS. Did you advise the Navy during the war?

Mr. BARMINE. When they would come and ask me to, yes; I would.

Mr. MORRIS. In other words, you have done everything possible to impart what you know about the Soviet Union to the American people?

Mr. BARMINE. That is right.

Senator O'CONOR. In the review, Mr. Barmine, you have this inserted:

He—

referring to Lattimore in Solution in Asia—

advises Americans to give in to it with a light heart, even though the Asiatic peoples, who may not like to be sold down the river so easily, continue to expect from us a vigorous assertion of democratic policy and of the principles of the Atlantic Charter.

Did that conform to the Communist line? I am reading at the bottom of page 2.

Mr. BARMINE. That was the position that the Soviet Union would like the Americans to take.

Senator O'CONOR. It was consistent with what had been enunciated by them?

Mr. BARMINE. That is right.

Senator SMITH. Just slightly touching on this, has it been your observation, General, that the American people generally are much more gullible with respect to these questions of foreign affairs than the people of Europe?

Mr. BARMINE. I wouldn't say so. Fortunately, I think that the more sophisticated people, high intellectuals who profess to be liberals, are more gullible than the main mass of the American people. That is my firm belief on the basis of talking to a lot of people. I do believe that in spite of this kind of propaganda it does not go very well with the American people.

Senator SMITH. You think then that the main mass of Americans have come to understand this kind of progapanda?

Mr. BARMINE. I think they do.

Senator FERGUSON. General, I was not clear; I could not see exactly what you had in mind in this Paris conversation about the Institute of Pacific Relations. I want to ask you several questions about it. You say that it came up in conversation with a man who had broken with the Communists, General Krivitsky; that he and you were talking about whom you might contact and whom you would be compelled to avoid. Is that correct?

Mr. BARMINE. Yes.

Senator FERGUSON. The question of the activities of the Institute of Pacific Relations came up?

Mr. BARMINE. That is right.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, will you make it clear just how it came up?

Mr. BARMINE. First of all, as I said, I wanted to be sure of his identity, who he was, and how much he knew.

Senator FERGUSON. That is the general?

Mr. BARMINE. Yes; to be sure. I was trying to find out——

Senator FERGUSON. Whether he was a former agent?

Mr. BARMINE. Former——

Senator FERGUSON. You were not quite sure but he might have been? You may have thought you had the idea he might be in on this plan to kill you?

Mr. BARMINE. Not then, but I was not sure that he was not an official of the NVD, if he had something to do with military intelligence or with the secret police, which are two different things. The only way I could be sure, I would dig out of my memory and ask him.

Senator FERGUSON. Some of the problems?

Mr. BARMINE. Not only problems; first men's names.

Senator FERGUSON. To find out whether or not he did know what was going on in military intelligence?

Mr. BARMINE. If he is what he is telling me.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you raise the question then of the institute?

Mr. BARMINE. No, but when the question comes back, then was the question in that connection, then I told him how I felt about the man.

Senator FERGUSON. What did he say?

Mr. BARMINE. He said "This is flourishing."

Senator FERGUSON. It was flourishing and had been acting for the Communists?

Mr. BARMINE. Used for the Government.

Senator FERGUSON. Who mentioned Lattimore's name with the general in Paris, you or the general?

Mr. BARMINE. I asked him if he knows of anybody in the United States.

Senator FERGUSON. What did he say?

Mr. BARMINE. He gave me those names.

Senator FERGUSON. He gave you those two names as connected with the institute?

Mr. BARMINE. No; he didn't say at this time. The first time he didn't mention the institute; but then, when he gave me names, I told him the story of Berzin. At this time I had nothing to keep secret. So, I told him how I happened to know about them. I told him the story I heard, what was planned.

Senator FERGUSON. What did he say he knew about these two men?

Mr. BARMINE. He knew that they were working for the military intelligence.

Senator FERGUSON. For the Russian military intelligence?

Mr. BARMINE That is right.

Senator FERGUSON. He said he knew that?

Mr. BARMINE. He gave the names to me.

Senator FERGUSON. He gave the names first to you?

Mr. BARMINE. Yes.

Senator FERGUSON. There is no doubt in your mind now that he made the statement the substance of which was that these two men were working for the Russian military government?

Mr. BARMINE. That is right.

Senator FERGUSON. Is that correct?

Mr. BARMINE. Military intelligence.

Senator FERGUSON. Of the Russian Government?

Mr. BARMINE. That is right.

Senator FERGUSON. Do you know whether or not at first the institute was merely used as an agent and then it became a policy-making branch?

Mr. BARMINE. I didn't know anything about policy making until I came to the United States and gradually learned the character of work of the institute and some facts in connection with influence.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, which would be the most beneficial to the Russian Government, a man who was in the institute and would merely get papers, like the Jaffe case, the Amerasia case, or a man who was in the institute and could make policy, talking about an agent, whether he was of the secret police or army intelligence?

Mr. BARMINE. I can only answer by an assumption that, if he then became so important or valuable or established such contacts that he could be more useful in a much wider area of activity, of course he would be relieved of any kind of small job of the military intelligence.

Senator FERGUSON. His policy-making job would be more important?

Mr. BARMINE. Enormously more important without any comparison. That would be at this time a very pure waste to use him for this kind of work.

Senator FERGUSON. When you reviewed this book back in April 1945, known as the Solution in Asia, none of the questions had been raised in our press about Owen Lattimore or his connections with communism or otherwise; is that true?

Mr. BARMINE. So far as I remember; yes.

Senator FERGUSON. So that you were writing this as a reader of the book; is that correct?

Mr. BARMINE. That is right.

Senator FERGUSON. Were you in any way trying to put out anti-Communist propaganda by the writing of this article?

Mr. BARMINE. I was trying to neutralize the harm this kind of book would do.

Senator FERGUSON. You realized that this book could do a lot of harm in America as Communist propaganda; is that correct?

Mr. BARMINE. Not only propaganda but as practical assistance to the Soviet Union to carry out their purpose in China.

Senator FERGUSON. To carry out the Soviet Union's purpose in China?

Mr. BARMINE. And to neutralize the American position.

Senator FERGUSON. To neutralize that, then, you wrote this article?

Mr. BARMINE. That is right.

Senator FERGUSON. It was published in the New Masses?

Mr. BARMINE. New Leader. The New Masses wouldn't publish it.

Senator FERGUSON. You say you were aiding the Reader's Digest as adviser on Communist activities?

Mr. BARMINE. On Soviet affairs and Communist activities.

Senator FERGUSON. This was really prepared——

Mr. BARMINE. First, I prepared a memo advising against the condensing and publishing of this book in the Reader's Digest.

Senator FERGUSON. Do these stars indicate there was something left out?

Mr. BARMINE. No.

Senator FERGUSON. That does not mean that?

Mr. BARMINE. I probably omitted my recommendation, and I made it in the form of a review instead of inside editorial matter, but all the substance was exactly the same.

Senator FERGUSON. This book of Lattimore's was never published in the Reader's Digest?

Mr. BARMINE. I say I cannot be sure, but I assume that my memo had something to do with making the decision.

Senator FERGUSON. Keeping it out?

Mr. BARMINE. Yes.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you ever find out why you were discharged from the OSS?

Mr. BARMINE. I was formally discharged because of sickness and absence on duty because of sickness. That was the formal reason.

Senator FERGUSON. What was the real reason, if you know?

Mr. BARMINE. I was never explained the real reason, but when the newspaper reporters went to OSS in New York and asked them if the reason for discharge was the writing of the article about Communist infiltration, as I remember, the spokesman for OSS answered: "It was not, but of course, Mr. Barmine, being in the Government service, should not write this kind of article."

Senator FERGUSON. When did you go to work for the Voice of America?

Mr. BARMINE. In October 1948.

Senator FERGUSON. Between the time you left OSS and October 1948, did you work for the Government?

Mr. BARMINE. No.

Senator FERGUSON. During that period you were not working?

Mr. BARMINE. No.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, did the FBI have in substance all of the matters that you have brought to our attention here this morning?

Mr. BARMINE. I believe so; yes.

Senator FERGUSON. They had that prior to the so-called Tydings hearings on the question of Communists in the Government?

Mr. BARMINE. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Did any of the lawyers for that committee question you?

Mr. BARMINE. No.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you sure he knows the committee to which you are referring and the hearings?

Senator FERGUSON. You are familiar with the Tydings committee?

Mr. BARMINE. That is right.

Senator FERGUSON. Do you know why this matter was not brought out at those hearings, the FBI having the evidence?

Mr. BARMINE. I was asked privately, not by any representative of the committee but by people I know, what would happen if I would be asked by the Tydings committee to testify. I said, of course, I would come and testify, I am ready to, and I was asked if I would tell the Tydings committee everything that I told now. I said yes, I would.

Senator FERGUSON. If the FBI had given aid to the Tydings committee, as I understand the Tydings committee claimed they had all the information from the FBI, I am just wondering why this was not brought out at that time.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator, can you do any more than wonder about it?

Senator FERGUSON. I am trying to find out if he knows.

Mr. BARMINE. I don't know anything about it. I can only assume that maybe these things were not considered substantial evidence.

Senator FERGUSON. That brings us back to the question of your discussion with General Berzin. That discussion was in your course of business as an intelligence agent of the Russian Army; is that right?

Mr. BARMINE. Intelligence officer.

Senator FERGUSON. And it was when you were storing or about to store goods, ammunition, and so forth, in China proper?

Mr. BARMINE. That is what was planned to do.

Senator FERGUSON. How much material was actually stored, if you know, in China proper?

Mr. BARMINE. It was not because the Politburo decision of the Chinese Commission was that they were opposed to using our corporation and the corporation was kept away from it.

Senator FERGUSON. It was finally given up?

Mr. BARMINE. That is right.

Senator FERGUSON. But you related what you did in northwest China?

Mr. BARMINE. That is right.

Senator FERGUSON. That was actually carried on?

Mr. BARMINE. That is right.

Senator FERGUSON. That is all I have.

The CHAIRMAN. All right. That concludes the testimony of this witness.

I want to say to you, General, that I commend you for your frankness and for the way in which you have answered the questions. There were some pretty sharp questions propounded to you. Your knowledge of what is fact and what is conjecture impressed the chairman of this committee a great deal. I want to express my gratitude to you for coming before the committee of the Senate and before the American people and giving us the facts as to the dangers that are here with us at home. We are somewhat conversant with the dangers that confront us abroad but we should become more conversant with the dangers that exist here in our own home.

The committee is grateful to you, the country should be grateful to you.

Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, I understand there is a Senator here, Senator McCarthy, who gave the name of this general to the Tydings committee. Is that right?

Senator MCCARTHY. That is right.

Senator FERGUSON. I think that ought to go on the record here.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will stand in recess until Thursday morning at 10 o'clock. Because on that day we have a matter on the floor that the chairman has to handle, we will have to close the committee meeting at noon. So we will reconvene Thursday at 10 o'clock.

Thank you, General.

(At 1:10 p. m. the committee recessed, to reconvene at 10 a. m., Thursday, August 2, 1951.)

INSTITUTE OF PACIFIC RELATIONS

THURSDAY, AUGUST 2, 1951

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE TO INVESTIGATE THE ADMINISTRATION OF THE INTERNAL SECURITY ACT
AND OTHER INTERNAL SECURITY LAWS, OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
Washington, D. C.

The subcommittee met at 10 a. m., pursuant to recess, Hon. Pat McCarran (chairman) presiding.

Present: Senators McCarran, Smith, and Ferguson.

Also present: Senator McCarthy, J. G. Sourwine, committee counsel; Robert Morris, subcommittee counsel; Benjamin Mandel, director of research.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will come to order.

Let me say before commencing the hearing of today I would like to mention that the names of people now dead will figure in today's testimony. I would like to say that the introduction of such names into the record is done with reluctance because we are aware that it is not for us to pass judgment on those who have passed beyond. But a congressional committee, charged with a heavy duty, must present every possible fact to shed light on present day conspiracy. Thus an association of 5 or 10 years back involving a man or woman now dead can well illuminate a relationship of today or aid in characterizing a living conspirator. Death does not rob a man of his place in history. It is in this spirit then that reference will be made to the dead today.

The witness will stand and be sworn.

You do solemnly swear that the testimony you are about to give before the subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary of the United States Senate will be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, so help you God?

Mrs. MASSING. I do.

TESTIMON OF MRS. HEDE MASSING, NEW YORK, N. Y.

Mr. MORRIS. Would you give your name and address to the stenographer?

Mrs. MASSING. I am Hede Massing. I live at 17 West Eighty-second Street, New York City.

Mr. MORRIS. What is your present occupation?

Mrs. MASSING. I am a writer.

Mr. MORRIS. Where were you born?

Mrs. MASSING. In Vienna, Austria.

Mr. MORRIS. In what year?

Mrs. MASSING. 1900.

Mr. MORRIS. Mrs. Massing, when did you first meet Gerhart Eisler?

Mrs. MASSING. In 1917.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you tell us briefly about the circumstances of your meeting Gerhart Eisler?

Mrs. MASSING. Yes, I will do that. I met Gerhart Eisler as people meet in Vienna, in a cafe. He was then a man who had achieved slight fame by having been against the war, having made propaganda against the war in the army. He was not a Communist then because there was no Communist Party at the time. He was, though, what I would call a Socialist. I met him and shortly after I met him I married him.

Is that sufficient?

Mr. MORRIS. Yes. How long were you married to Gerhart Eisler?

Mrs. MASSING. Five years altogether.

Mr. MORRIS. During the time of your marriage to Gerhart Eisler were you a member of the Communist Party?

Mrs. MASSING. No; I was not a member of the Communist Party. First of all, during those years he didn't become a member of the party; the party was small and young. In my specific case Gerhart Eisler thought I would have to learn much more, I would have to become a Marxist first before I would be permitted to join the party.

Mr. MORRIS. Now, in what year did you leave Gerhart Eisler, were you divorced from Gerhart Eisler?

Mrs. MASSING. I left Gerhart Eisler in 1923 and I was divorced in 1924 or 1925.

Mr. MORRIS. You testified during that period you were not a member of the Communist Party?

Mrs. MASSING. I was not.

Mr. MORRIS. During that period was your loyalty and devotion to the Communist Party as strong as if you had been a member of the Communist Party?

Mrs. MASSING. Indeed it was. As a matter of fact, the party was more or less my life, as it is for people who are either party members or connected with the party. There is no question that once you are a Communist, whether you take party membership or not, you are a loyal party member and you adhere to the discipline of the party, which I did in a vague way, because, as I say, I was neither a functionary nor was I intellectually developed enough to be taken seriously by the party. I was just the wife of Gerhart Eisler and lived in the upper strata of Communist leadership with Gerhart Eisler.

Mr. MORRIS. You are now talking of your position with respect to the Communist Party during the period you were married to Gerhart Eisler?

Mrs. MASSING. Right.

Mr. MORRIS. Now, when did you first make a trip to Moscow, Mrs. Massing?

Mrs. MASSING. My first trip to Moscow was in 1929.

Mr. MORRIS. How long did you stay?

Mrs. MASSING. I stayed just for 2 weeks and went back again the end of 1929 to stay until 1931.

Mr. MORRIS. When you say you went back, Mrs. Massing, what do you mean by that?

Mrs. MASSING. I went for 2 weeks in order to see whether I liked it and whether I could work there, and though I found it rather different than I expected to, I decided to go back and stay for some time in the Soviet Union, as every Communist wants to do. I mean every Communist who has a chance wants to go to the Soviet Union not only to learn but to serve, to help.

Senator FERGUSON. Were you treated as a Communist by the Communists during this period about which you are talking?

Mrs. MASSING. Of course, naturally; yes.

Mr. MORRIS. Then is it your testimony that after you left Gerhart Eisler your devotion to the Communist Party did not diminish?

Mrs. MASSING. No, my way was set. Once I had met Gerhart Eisler, once I was indoctrinated, I was a Communist, and I remained a Communist until I left in 1938.

The CHAIRMAN. You distinguish, then, do you, between being an actual member and a member in spirit? You were a member in spirit?

Mrs. MASSING. Why, Senator McCarran, I would believe that even then, and of course much more today, there are many more members in spirit than actually card-holding party members, because, as I have explained very often—and I hate to do this, but I think it is rather necessary—for many party members it is an order not to take out party membership. For example, my affiliation really lasted for many years and though I was a Soviet agent and was closely connected with the German party, only for 2 weeks by mere coincidence actually was I a party member. Still my affiliation dates from 1918 or 1919 to 1938, which is quite a long time, and this goes for many people.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you ever pay dues?

Mrs. MASSING. I probably did during those 2 weeks.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you have a card?

Mrs. MASSING. It is a book. In Germany we had a book.

Mr. MORRIS. I wonder if you will describe for us the circumstances leading up to your joining the Communist Party and explain why it was only of 2 weeks' duration.

Mrs. MASSING. That is sort of jumping ahead very much.

I had lived in Russia from 1929 to 1931. This is a very complicated process to describe because I would have to go into many psychological factors and I do not think we have time for it here. In spite of my being rather disappointed with the Soviet Union, I joined the party because when I got back to Germany in 1931 fascism had grown terrifically. It was visible, it was obvious, and I believed that the thing to do is to fight fascism, and I was convinced that the Communist Party of Germany was the only party that was very adamant about fighting fascism. As I arrived, I thought that now I would want to partake in this actual fight and I joined the party. I hardly joined it; I mean I joined my unit.

Mr. MORRIS. What year was that?

Mrs. MASSING. 1931, as soon as I got back from Russia. I lived in the section of Berlin which was mostly populated by fellow Communists, many of them not party members either until then but attending the party unit, and I hardly joined the party when my superior—I am sure I will have to speak of him later, his name is Ludwig, I knew him as Ludwig, he was Ignatz Reiss and was killed by the Russians in 1937, came from Moscow—called me, saw me when I told him I had joined the party, and he said, "You must drop out at once. Why did you do this?" "You did not tell me not to." "Didn't you understand enough not to? You are not the kind that joins the party." And I dropped out and it was rather difficult.

Mr. MORRIS. At that time what was your relationship to Ignatz Reiss?

Mrs. MASSING. Do you want me to go into this, Mr. Morris?

Mr. MORRIS. I would like you to explain to the committee the relationship in the Communist organization that you had at that time to Ignatz Reiss when he told you that you had made a mistake when you had joined the Communist Party for that 2 weeks' period.

Mrs. MASSING. That of course also goes further back. I had met Ludwig. I knew him as——

Mr. MORRIS. That is Ignatz Reiss?

Mrs. MASSING. That is Ignatz Reiss, until he was killed by the Russians. I learned by the papers that this was Ignatz Reiss. I had met him in 1924 and I had known him very closely until 1926. I never knew his name. He was introduced to me as a Communist on special duty.

This is the way agents are introduced to Communist Party members that are solicited for the service, a Communist on special duty. He had observed me in 1924. I then had worked in a bookshop. I had seen him very often merely as a customer, as a man who bought books, a man with very good taste in books, a man with whom I discussed books on all levels. I never knew who he was.

In the beginning of 1929—I had been in America from 1926 to 1928—and I came back to Germany and stayed in Frankfort-on-Main, then went to Berlin because I wanted to pass a psychology exam. I was introduced officially to Ludwig—Ignatz Reiss—by Dr. Richard Sorge. He is a famous man, now dead. He had been the most outstanding Soviet spy in Japan. I suppose we all know. It was Dr. Richard Sorge who I knew since 1922 who introduced me to Ludwig with the purpose of my working for Ludwig from then on. This was the establishment of the relationship. That means from 1929 on I was under his supervision and in cooperation with Ludwig I became an apparatchik.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you spell that?

Mrs. MASSING. A-p-p-a-r-a-t-c-h-i-k.

Senator FERGUSON. Did they use the expression "Russian agent" or "Soviet agent"?

Mrs. MASSING. No.

Senator FERGUSON. That is an American expression?

Mrs. MASSING. Exactly. I believe if I had known at the time, and so many of my coworkers, that they are Russian agents, there probably would never have been Russian agents. They were Communists, they were Communists on special duty. They were soldiers of the revolution. They were Communists that had been chosen for a particularly difficult task and they were very proud to have been chosen. I was for this special duty. No; they never considered themselves agents, of course not.

Senator FERGUSON. Both of these men were Communists?

Mrs. MASSING. Yes, of course; leading Communists. Dr. Sorge was a leading Communist, as a matter of fact one of the Communists that had written quite a bit in Germany, had a status at the University of Frankfort-on-Main, and later on was called to Moscow in order to work at the Marx Engels Institute. In reality he had been called by the Comintern and was then a Comintern agent.

Senator FERGUSON. Did people then keep it secret that they were Communists or was it open and notorious?

Mrs. MASSING. At that time it was no secret at all.

Senator FERGUSON. It was open and notorious?

Mrs. MASSING. Yes. They would keep secret they were on special duty. That was not supposed to be talked about but was whispered about and was the topic of conversation within party circles. It was very—well, it is almost a social question, you belong to the higher strata of the Communist movement if you belong to the apparatus.

Mr. MORRIS. Mrs. Massing, will you describe to us what an apparatchik is?

Mrs. MASSING. An apparatchik is a member of an apparatus, a member of—as I know today, and we all know—an espionage unit. The term is derived, I would assume, from the word "apparatus," "apparat" in German, meaning a unit that functions like a mechanism or an apparatus like a very finely constructed mechanism, and a member of such a unit was called an apparatchik. "Chik" is the Russian ending.

Mr. MORRIS. Mrs. Massing, will you generally describe the nature of the period in your life from 1931 to 1933? Fundamentally to what was it devoted?

Mrs. MASSING. 1931 to 1933 was in my life my training as an espionage agent. I want to repeat again that I did not consider myself at that time an espionage agent. I did not know that I was being trained for espionage. I did not know that I was doing espionage.

I am not saying this to defend myself. I am saying it in order to explain because I believe we must understand the development of people like myself within the movement and the function they finally achieve and the fact that they did not quite understand—and this is the intricacy of communism—what they are doing when they first begin. Once they are in it, there is absolutely no way of getting out of it, or rarely a way of getting out of it, let us say.

My training with Ludwig was really in the form of conversation, regular meetings, training in behavior, training in approach, training in understanding, political issues, personal issues. It was highly focused on psychology, how to size up people. Once you have sized them up; how to approach them for a specific function or purpose. It is a very slow process. It was also to some extent, but only to a very small extent, his trying to make me understand the necessity of socialism, of communism, of world communism, but it was merely a technical training.

After about the first year I was sent out on small missions. I was taught underground work.

Mr. MORRIS. Now, Mrs. Massing, at the end of the 1933 period were you then given an assignment?

Mrs. MASSING. At the end of 1933 when fascism had come to power in Germany I went to Moscow for personal reasons partly, and on my way back from Moscow I met Ludwig in Paris and was assigned to the United States.

Mr. MORRIS. Assigned to the United States in what year?

Mrs. MASSING. In 1933.

Mr. MORRIS. What was your assignment in the United States?

Mrs. MASSING. My assignment was not clearly defined in Paris. I was briefed by Ludwig to the effect, really ideology mostly. Of course by then technically I was a well-trained agent. Ideologically the thing he told me was that fascism had succeeded, that we have failed to stem it in Europe, that now we have to fight fascism from the outside. He said, "You are going to a great country where there are many good people. You understand fascism. Bring the message of fascism to them and rally people behind the fight against fascism."

Now that sounds rather vague for an espionage agent and I do want to emphasize that I am pretty sure that during the years between 1933 and 1935 many Americans have been solicited into the services with this very idea, the fight against fascism, which was a very noble fight and which many Americans could be made to believe was the most important thing to do at this specific point during these specific years.

Mr. MORRIS. You say the Soviet organization capitalized on that feeling in order to create an atmosphere by which people would be drawn in their orbit?

Mrs. MASSING. Yes. I don't know whether they were as crude as that but the functionaries like myself, and certainly Ludwig and some of the people I later on worked with in America that belonged to my immediate unit, indeed believed that this was the thing that would do it.

It took me about a year and a half to quite realize that this was not the main focus in my work, that I was really being made to do things that had actually nothing to do with the fight against fascism.

These are slow processes, because, you see, you must understand that a person who does not willingly want to be an agent will have a resistance to recognize his own function. He will rationalize and will say, "Well, this is not realy a fight against fascism fully but partly."

Mr. MORRIS. Now what was your assignment in the United States with particularity, Mrs. Massing?

Mrs. MASSING. Let me say first I was told by Ludwig I would be contacted and the contact was arranged.

Mr. MORRIS. How was that arranged?

Mrs. MASSING. It is again one of these stories that one reads and thinks so unlikely, and this is exactly how it happened. I got half of a cigarette box and I was told that the person who would contact me will have the other half of the cigarette box. Now it is a customary procedure to get half of a picture. I mean these are the technical arrangements. They seem very primitive but they have always worked quite well.

Senator FERGUSON. Your assignment was secret, of course?

Mrs. MASSING. Yes, indeed. I did not know who would contact me here. Probably the person who sent me off didn't know who the immediate contact would be, because in espionage work decentralization is predominant and you are not told, as you are never told who the person is you deal with. You know the person for 10 years but you do not know his second name or where he lives. You know him as Bill, Fred, Ludwig, Carl, or Francis.

I was told I would be contacted. I was told already in Paris that my first and immediate function would be to go to Washington regularly. Let me just say here that my cover was that of a foreign newspaperwoman. It was not a complete cover, not only a cover, because I had been writing for a liberal weekly, I had been translating articles from English into German. I really was working for this specific liberal weekly and that gave me then an identification to come here as a foreign newspaperwoman.

My first function was to come to Washington to observe periodicals, newspapers, newspapermen, Senators, people who would be friendly or who would lean toward the fight against fascism and be friendly toward the Soviet Union. I was to write reports on this regularly.

Mr. MORRIS. Ostensibly what was the name of the publisher for which you worked?

Mrs. MASSING. Die Weltbuhne. It is the World Theatre in translation.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you tell us how you proceeded in your operations over there?

Mrs. MASSING. Yes. I am not hesitating because I am thinking of how I proceeded. I am hesitating because I would like to say just one word that as clear as it is to me that one has to testify, it is not pleasant and it is difficult.

I lived first when I got to New York in 1933 with a friend that I had met in 1926. Her name was Helen Black, and she is or has been—I don't know what she is doing now—a registered Soviet agent. She was a representative of Soviet Photo and I had become friendly with her. As a matter of fact, I was devoted to her and she to me in 1926.

When I first got here in 1933 my husband Paul Massing was in a German concentration camp. Though I knew that I was a Communist on duty and ought to be brave, my personal situation was rather sad and this friend, Helen Black, felt I should stay with her and not alone in a strange country. She was a very good friend to me during these months that I stayed with her. It was through Helen Black and the environment around Helen Black that I made my first contact.

Mr. MORRIS. Now what was your assignment in 1933, Mrs. Massing?

Mrs. MASSING. As I said before, my assignment in 1933 was the United States.

Mr. MORRIS. What were you to do in the United States?

Mrs. MASSING. I was sent out to fight against fascism. I was an apparatchik. I was a member of an espionage outfit and my orders were to come from the boss that I was to meet here and that I had met at this point. You see, I met the superior that I had in New York only after I was contacted.

Mr. MORRIS. What did you do after you made that contact?

Mrs. MASSING. The first thing I did was to be a courier. My very first assignment when I was contacted by my superior, who was Valentine Markin—

Mr. MORRIS. Will you spell that, please?

Mrs. MASSING. V-a-l-e-n-t-i-n-e M-a-r-k-i-n. I did not know him under that name.

Mr. MORRIS. Who was he?

Mrs. MASSING. He was the first and foremost Soviet agent during those years in the United States. He was killed here. First we thought that it was an accident. In retrospect it might well be that he was killed by the Soviets because he had had deviations and he was critical and was supposed to be a Trotskyite.

Mr. MORRIS. Is he the one who had the other half of the match box?

Mrs. MASSING. No; he was the boss.

Senator FERGUSON. Who had the match box?

Mrs. MASSING. The match box was held by Bill, the man who I later learned was Berman.

Senator FERGUSON. What is the first name?

Mrs. MASSING. What was Berman's first name? I have forgotten, I am terribly sorry.

Mr. MORRIS. Is it your testimony at the time you did not know his name was Berman but you knew him only as Bill?

Mrs. MASSING. When Berman came he showed me the other half of the box.

Mr. MORRIS. You did not know his name was Berman?

Mrs. MASSING. Of course not.

Mr. MORRIS. When did you know his name was Berman?

Mrs. MASSING. Let me be logical about this. Berman came and contacted me. He was my contact. After I had seen Berman for some days and discussed with him generalities, I was introduced to the boss. The boss I knew as Walter. His name was Valentine Markin.

Mr. MORRIS. You did not know that at the time?

Mrs. MASSING. Of course not. Valentine Markin's name and Berman's name I found out for myself because I had to know him, but Markin's name I only learned when I spoke to the FBI and was shown his picture and I was told this was Valentine Markin. I did not know his name before that. Valentine Markin sent me out on my first courier job carrying microfilm from New York to Paris. This was the very first assignment Valentine Markin gave me.

Mr. MORRIS. Do you know the nature of the microfilm?

Mrs. MASSING. Of course not, you never know. As a courier, first of all, you never know anything if you are an espionage agent. You are given an assignment and you do it. You don't ask; you don't want to know. That would be considered completely undoctrinaire behavior and bad manners. That just isn't done.

Senator FERGUSON. You took them there secretly?

Mrs. MASSING. Yes. I was told how to go about it. The arrangement was made for me to meet a person, a Dr. so-and-so—I have forgotten his name; it is not important, because it wasn't his name—in a Paris hotel, to stay in this hotel until he would come and see me. I would hand the film, then leave the hotel, move to another hotel and live in Paris as a tourist for 10 days, 12 days, and then come back to New York. This I did for about—I am not quite sure whether it was 9 or 10 days. Altogether I made 20 trips.

Senator FERGUSON. How large film would you take?

Mrs. MASSING. About this large, sometimes two or three rolls, regular-size microfilm.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you ever learn where those films came from?

Mrs. MASSING. No.

Senator FERGUSON. What they were?

Mrs. MASSING. No; never.

Mr. MORRIS. What was your first assignment other than that of a courier in the United States?

Mrs. MASSING. After I had completed my assignment as a courier I came back and then I worked with Valentine Markin again. It wasn't to last very long because he died soon after I met him in this rather unusual way, and it took some time until my next superior arrived, whom I knew as Bill. His name was Grinke.

Valentine Markin assigned me to go to Washington, as I had done before I had met him, but now not merely to write about periodicals and people but focus on specific people who could be of use to us. That means I became a recruiter. I was then a recruiter. I was a courier and a recruiter. The American press uses the term "courier" rather broadly. Everybody who works in an espionage apparatus is a courier. Now it is not so. A courier is the specific function to carry things from one place to the other. Within an espionage outfit are very many functions and you wouldn't call, for example, the photographer in such a unit a courier. He is not a courier at all. He is a photographer.

I was to go to Washington and observe people and if I found them amiable and interested in the Soviet Union, in the fight against fascism, to propose to them to become a member of our unit in whatever function they could be in.

Mr. MORRIS. What was your first case?

Mrs. MASSING. Noel H. Field.

Mr. MORRIS. Where is Noel H. Field now?

Mrs. MASSING. He has disappeared behind the iron curtain, he and his wife and his brother, Herman Field, and his adopted daughter, Erika Glaser Wallart.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you describe to us the process by which you first had contact with Noel Field?

Mrs. MASSING. Again I will have to go a little further back. I had met through the recommendation of Helen Black, Marguerite Young. Marguerite Young in 1933 and probably some years thereafter was a Daily Worker correspondent in Washington. I am sure many of the newspapermen present here will know her. She was a young and very intelligent Communist and it was she who was my contact, not officially, because I was not to be seen with her, of course, but I saw her privately and socially and it was she who would point out people to me that she knew and thought would be interesting to me. She gave me a whole list of them. To some she introduced me. To Noel Field she introduced me. It happened this way: By then my husband, Paul Massing, had been released from the concentration camp.

Mr. MORRIS. What year was that?

Mrs. MASSING. That was the end of 1933 but he got to this country only in 1934. He was writing a book about his experiences in the concentration camp. It was called Fatherland. He wrote it under a pseudonym because his family was still in Germany. Part of this book had been published in New Masses and had created quite a sensation.

Marguerite Young knew people who had read this part of the book and who were interested to meet the wife of the man who had written this book. Field was one of them. She said I should meet Field, I would like him, his wife was German, and I might find him very interesting. Indeed I did; I am sorry I did.

Mr. MORRIS. Did you succeed in recruiting Noel Field into the Communist apparatus?

Mrs. MASSING. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. How long did it take you?

Mrs. MASSING. It took me about three quarters of a year and it was the typical work of a recruiter in meeting the object regularly, discussing with him principal issues, issues that he was particularly interested in, leading him toward my goal, namely, to consent to be a member of my apparatus. I didn't put it in these words, of course. What I said was, in gist, that this was the thing we are up against, fascism was the menace of the world and each one of us had to fight it, that he was in a very privileged position, that he could furnish us with documents and material to help in this fight. Though he was reluctant and he had great misgivings about handing me documents, he consented to do so.

Mr. MORRIS. Now after you succeeded in recruiting him, did you have any further connection with him at that time?

Mrs. MASSING. No.

Mr. MORRIS. In other words, your function was simply to recruit, and then what did you do?

Mrs. MASSING. Then I would hand this person over. The person I recruited would then be handled or worked with by another agent. I would never know who this person was. I was not supposed to know. The official situation would have been that I would sever all relationships to the person that I had recruited.

In Noel Field's case I didn't do that because I had developed quite an intensive personal friendship to him and his wife. Also, since he had this great reluctance in betraying his country, as he called it, we advised him—meaning my unit, I myself, and even my husband, Paul Massing, helped in convincing him—that he should accept a job at the League of Nations, that he was offered at the time, because there he would not feel he was betraying his country and could be of great use to Russia.

Senator FERGUSON. When you first met him what was Field's business?

Mrs. MASSING. He was a State Department official in the western division, I believe. Was it called the western division?

Mr. MANDEL. Western European.

Mrs. MASSING. Western European Division.

Senator FERGUSON. He is no relationship to this Frederick Vanderbilt Field?

Mrs. MASSING. Not that I know of.

Senator FERGUSON. He was actually employed in the State Department when you were introduced to him by Miss Young?

Mrs. MASSING. Yes.

Senator FERGUSON. As a prospect for your work?

Mrs. MASSING. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. Mrs. Massing, in this connection did you ever have an encounter with Alger Hiss in connection with Noel Field?

Mrs. MASSING. Yes; I did.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you explain that to the committee, please?

Mrs. MASSING. Yes. It is this encounter with Alger Hiss that forced me out of my seclusion because I don't believe that ex-Communists tend to go out and talk about their experiences, and I recall so well that when Whittaker Chambers was very reluctant and low-voiced in his testimony, how well I understood him, because it is a very difficult and horrible thing to not only speak about one's own past deviations in sins but about other people's involvements.

When Noel Field and I had established a rapport to the extent that he was quite willing to help me, when I had also convinced him—and I would like to say this here—that he must not join the open party because for a man of Noel Field's status and importance it would be very unwise and useless to join the open party, and he had wanted to do so—when he had agreed to work with me, which was not something like black and white—I mean there were many ups and downs, he would say "Yes" today and "No" tomorrow, and he would say "Yes, I will only do so much, I am willing to give you verbal reports but I am not willing to show you any documents, and I don't have any documents to show"—I mean it is an involved process—one of his last reluctances or one of his last resistances toward me came up in this way:

I visited with him and his wife. As a matter of fact, I lived in their house. He said to me, "You know, Hede, I thought the whole thing over and I have come to the conclusion that it is really quite ridiculous that I should work with you where I can work with an old friend of mine who works with me in the State Department and who is a man of my kind. Not that I mean to say I don't respect you but, you see, you are a foreigner and this man is an American and we see eye to eye on all principal issues, and you understand even technically it would be so much easier for me to work with this man." Well, this was, of course, quite a disappointment for me. I had invested very much labor and intensity to get this man. If you do a job like this you want to do a good job, as I think everybody wants to do a fairly good job, and I was an espionage agent and I tried to do a good job, and having to lose Noel Field would have been quite a shock. So I said, "Who is this man?" He said, "I don't think you know him. His name is Alger Hiss." I said, "Well, why don't you introduce me to him? I just don't believe he has any priority over you. In reality I believe you are much better off in my apparatus." Then I said to him, "Where does he work? Where does he really work? How do you know he is the right man?" He said, "I don't know. I don't know where you work either."

Noel Field arranged this meeting with Alger Hiss.

Mr. MORRIS. So you did meet Alger Hiss?

Mrs. MASSING. I did meet Alger Hiss. That is a meeting that I have spoken so much about that I find it very difficult to speak about again.

My superior, Russian superior at that time, Boris, was quite distressed about this meeting because it was unorthodox and it had not gotten the O. K. from Moscow. You see, Noel Field immediately arranged this meeting. Such things are not done without an O. K. from Moscow. But Boris said since it had been arranged I should go ahead and meet him.

I came to Washington and the meeting was at the Noel Field apartment and though it was a long evening, I believe the only thing that interests us here is that the discussion between Hiss and me ran like this:

He said, "So you are this woman that is trying to get Noel Field away from me?" I said, "No; you are the man who is trying to get Noel Field away from me, because I have worked with Noel Field for quite some time." He said, "Well, where have you worked?" I said, "Look Alger,"—you understand among Communists people call each other Hede and Alger and not Mr. Hiss and Mrs. Massing. "You know, Alger, you couldn't ask that and I wouldn't ask that either." He laughed and said, "Well, we will see who is going to win." I think I said, "Well, you know I am a woman," being very coy, and in order to break up this rather unpleasant conversation, and at the end either he or I agreed that it would not be for us to decide on whoever will get Noel Field; after all, we are working for the same boss.

Senator FERGUSON. When you say "get," what do you mean?

Mrs. MASSING. Get, meaning soliciting him into your own unit as a coworker.

Senator FERGUSON. In the apparatus?

Mrs. MASSING. In the apparatus.

Senator SMITH. What difference would that make so far as the objective is concerned?

Mrs. MASSING. That really is competition. There are always similar apparatuses in one country. There is a Comintern apparatus, a Red-army apparatus, a military-intelligence apparatus, and NKVD apparatus, and none of them have terribly much to do, I am made to believe, and getting a man as an informant is a very great thing to achieve. It is real competition. I mean you have worked on this man, you want to fulfill your job, you want to finish your job. In reality, actually, as for information, it would not probably make a great difference.

Senator SMITH. It gave you different recognition in the party by getting and holding the man?

Mrs. MASSING. Why, of course. For example, when I had achieved this and later on had achieved soliciting Laurence Duggan into my apparatus I was given honor, I was recognized as a fine comrade.

Senator SMITH. That is what I thought you meant. I wanted to bring it out.

Mr. MORRIS. You mentioned Laurence Duggan. Did you have the assignment of recruiting Laurence Duggan into the apparatus?

Mrs. MASSING. Yes; after I had met him and had reported about him.

Senator FERGUSON. Before you leave Field, did you get Field into your apparatus or did Hiss get him into his?

Mrs. MASSING. I got Field into my apparatus. Field then transferred to Geneva.

The CHAIRMAN. You did not think she was going to lose, did you, Senator?

Senator FERGUSON. I wanted to get this record straight.

Mrs. MASSING. I didn't lose him then, so I couldn't lose him now. He is lost to us, though, I am afraid.

Field transferred to Geneva. In Geneva he was introduced by me to Ignatz Reiss. He was introduced also to General Krivitsky. He did not work in Geneva with Ignatz Reiss; he worked with General Krivitsky.

Senator FERGUSON. Was he then with the State Department?

Mrs. MASSING. Then he was with the United Nations.

Mr. MORRIS. That is the League of Nations?

Mrs. MASSING. The League of Nations.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you tell us about Laurence Duggan?

Mrs. MASSING. Yes. I had met Duggan through Field.

Mr. MORRIS. What was he doing at the time?

Mrs. MASSING. He was the head of the Latin-American Department in the State Department.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you develop that for us, Mrs. Massing, please?

Mrs. MASSING. I am sure that this was Laurence Duggan to whom you were referring, Senator, when you were speaking about the dead. I want to say in one sentence that when I wrote about Laurence Duggan in my book and when I testified before the grand jury it was with the utmost reluctance, and only after I was completely convinced, had convinced myself, it was necessary if I told my story at all to tell it fully, that I had to speak about Laurence Duggan. I have been quite persecuted for it. My book has been dropped by the first publisher because I was not willing to take out the whole Duggan chapter. I understand that very great pressure was brought upon my second publisher by Duggan's friends, which are Hiss' friends, and probably the Duggan family.

Mr. MORRIS. May I say this, your feelings to the contrary are appreciated, but we have the obligation here of asking you what your relationships were with Laurence Duggan.

Mrs. MASSING. I will tell you.

Mr. MORRIS. As the chairman has stated, we are doing this not to pass judgment on someone in the past but to determine whether or not there is a present-day conspiracy. So strictly in the light of that will you tell us what your relationships have been with Laurence Duggan?

Mrs. MASSING. I will.

Senator FERGUSON. At all times, of course, you understand you are under oath?

Mrs. MASSING. Yes, I know that.

Senator FERGUSON. And the dead have no opportunity to rebut it, as the chairman has said. So you will give us just the facts?

Mrs. MASSING. Senator, I am not afraid; I am just sad.

Senator FERGUSON. I understand.

Mrs. MASSING. I met Duggan through Field. He was a close friend of the Fields. They lived together in one house at one time. Duggan has about a similar background as Field, Quaker family, well-to-do, highly intellectual, very fine, straight-thinking men at the time, as I thought.

Duggan when I met him seemed very interested in my ideas. He knew a great deal about the Soviet Union. He knew a great deal about fascism in Germany. He knew a great deal about the details and the technique of the fight against fascism. I did not need to work with Duggan as I did with Field. Duggan was much easier for me to reach. It took only a few weeks, probably not more than three or four meetings.

You understand, after my first meeting with a man like this I reported to my superior in great detail who the man was, what his position was, what his background was, and what his thoughts were at present. Then I got an O. K. and I would go ahead and see the man again and speak to him generally.

With Laurence Duggan after a few meetings I suggested to him to be of help to us and he consented. He made very specific demands. He, too, said he would neither have nor be willing to give me secret documents but that he would be quite willing to meet a person and he was quite pleased about the decentralization of the apparatus and that the person would not be I and that I would not know who the person was that would work with him. But he was willing to meet this person regularly, probably once a week or once in 2 weeks, and give him for some time verbal reports. The man or woman would have to be a shorthand person, would have to be able to write shorthand and would have to know English well. He made it quite clear he would not have enough time to bother with translations and involvements.

Senator FERGUSON. Is there any doubt in your mind that Field and Duggan knew you were a Communist?

Mrs. MASSING. No.

Senator FERGUSON. And in an apparatus for the Communists?

Mrs. MASSING. No. That I made quite clear to both of them. I did not say I was a Soviet spy, but I said I was a member of an apparatus doing this specific work. Whether it was clear to them this was espionage I am not certain, though I would assume they must have known.

Senator FERGUSON. What was this material that you were to get from them out of the State Department?

Mrs. MASSING. That I don't know, Senator, because I never saw it.

Senator FERGUSON. What did you tell them you wanted?

Mrs. MASSING. I told them I would want to know all news, all information relating to the Soviet Union, to our attempts. I didn't say military secrets, because I wasn't told to ask that. I would just propose what I was told to propose, to give me all news, all information that would be relative——

Senator FERGUSON. To the Soviet Union?

Mrs. MASSING. To the Soviet Union.

Senator FERGUSON. Now you talked to them first about fascism?

Mrs. MASSING. The Soviet Union was fighting fascism. It was the Soviet Union who was fighting fascism and all the Communist Parties with the Soviet Union all over the world.

Senator FERGUSON. That is the way you explained it to both these men?

Mrs. MASSING. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Go ahead.

Mr. MORRIS. Did you succeed in recruiting Laurence Duggan?

Mrs. MASSING. Yes, I succeeded.

Mr. MORRIS. Did you turn him over to the apparatus?

Mrs. MASSING. I did turn him over to the apparatus.

Mr. MORRIS. To whom did you turn him over?

Mrs. MASSING. I don't know. I made arrangements for him to meet a person.

Mr. MORRIS. You made arrangements with whom?

Mrs. MASSING. With Laurence Duggan. To be more specific, my boss Boris told me to tell Duggan that he would be met by a man who would have an identification. I think it was a flower and a magazine, and he would be met in a car on a road which Duggan was to assign at a specific time on a specific day, that Duggan would enter the car of this man who would be standing in front of the car and be visible so as to be noticed by Duggan and Duggan would speak to this man. I did not know who the man was. All I knew was the time and the methods of identification. Then I dropped out.

Mr. MORRIS. In other words, it was your function to recruit and turn over to the apparatus and to do nothing more?

Mrs. MASSING. That is right.

Mr. MORRIS. Now, Mr. Chairman, at this juncture I would like to introduce into the record some letters from the institute's files which concern Laurence Duggan's connection with the Institute of Pacific Relations.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you intend to read them first?

Mr. MORRIS. I will read excerpts.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well. Do you have identification of them as belonging to the files?

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Mandel will identify them as such.

First, I would like to introduce a letter dated May 8, 1940. This is a letter from Edward C. Carter to William W. Lockwood. Mr. Carter in this letter is discussing plans of the Institute of Pacific Relations.

The CHAIRMAN. I think you had better identify it and lay your foundation for it through Mr. Mandel.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Mandel, I offer you this letter and ask you if you will desecribe where that letter came from.

Mr. MANDEL. This is one of the letters in the files of the Institute of Pacific Relations which were turned over to us.

Mr. MORRIS. You recognize it as such?

Mr. MANDEL. I do.

Mr. MORRIS. This is from Edward C. Carter to William W. Lockwood, dated May 8, 1940, from 129 East Fifty-second Street, which was the address at that time of the Institute of Pacific Relations.

Paragraph 12 reads:

Ask Henry Allen Moe, Laurence Duggan, and others who are the one or two Latin Americans of great intellectual ability who look at Latin America from a continental and international point of view, who might establish contact with the appropriate groups in the leading countries and then come to New York to give the groups here the benefit of his study of such thinking as there is in Latin America on war aims and postwar organization.

I would like to introduce that in the record.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be inserted in the record and properly identified.

(The document referred to was marked "Exhibit No. 41" and is as follows:)

EXHIBIT No. 41

NEW YORK CITY, May 8, 1940.

Mr. WILLIAM W. LOCKWOOD,
American Committee for International Studies,
129 East Fifty-second Street, New York City.

DEAR BILL: I have given your letter of May 2 considerable thought. Rather than limit myself to one or two suggestions, I think it is better for me to make quite a number which I regard as of great importance, or of being worthy of further investigation.

In order that you may understand my reaction to your letter, and to this highly interesting and significant statement which Earle and you have just issued on the American Committee for International Studies, I am venturing quite informally to send you quite a number of names.

Your committee's statement, as well as the quality of its leadership and its membership are most encouraging. As would be expected of the kind of leadership that you and Earle are giving, it is encouraging to note that you are not disinterested in relating scientific research to questions of policy and that your main objective is to make new and constructive approaches to the study of international affairs.

You are, I think, familiar with Dr. Percy E. Corbett's general plan of work. He has the approval of McGill for a continuation of major work on this project after his return to McGill in 1941. In the meantime, he and I are looking for an appropriate colleague with a far eastern background comparable to Corbett's background in Europe, the Americas and the British Commonwealth, in the hope that the two of them with appropriate assistance can make a synthesis and interpretation of all that is most fundamental in the I. P. R.'s far eastern inquiry with what is basic in the studies of Chatham House, of P. E. P., of Shotwell's Committee, the New School, Buell's book and the many European studies and those that are appearing in Australia, New Zealand and elsewhere. Corbett is thinking not simply of a review of reviews or a synthesis of existing plans. He aims to carry them further, more fundamentally and courageously.

The basic work that he has in mind and much of the work of many of the groups and individuals just mentioned would in my view be aided enormously if arrangements could be made for some such international exchange fellowships as the following:

(1) Bring over R. H. Tawney so that he may appraise, criticize and interpret the Corbett project, contribute to it and at the same time make a critique of the plans of the other serious groups on this continent.

(2) Bring Ushiba, Saionji and Yokota in order that we may have someone from the very inside of Japan closely in touch with current thought in the Japanese Army, the bureaucracies and the universities.

(3) Send Harriet Moore to the U. S. S. R. to go through all government and party writing on postwar problems and supplement this by interviewing party and politburo chiefs.

(4) Bring von Trott from Berlin to be associated with Corbett, Sansom, Tawney and others, and hold him here until a week before America enters the war.

(5) Discover who is the most valuable man in the P. E. P. group, namely, the one principally responsible for the now really first-class P. E. P. memorandum (7th ed.), and bring him to the United States after a visit with Kittredge and his French colleagues in Paris.

(6) If Tamagna turns out to be as promising as he looks on paper, send him to Rome to undertake a study there on lines similar to Miss Moore's study in Moscow, returning at the end of 6 months to give 6 months to collaboration with the group under the direction of Corbett, Sansom, Holland, Alexander, and also with the A.C.I.S., Earle and yourself.

(7) Discover whether there is one wise and great man in Manila—(Would Apostol qualify?)—and have him spend 3 months on the project in Manila, a month each in Chungking and Tokyo and then bring him, preferably by way of the Trans-Siberian Railway, to collaborate with the groups here.

(8) Send Phil Jessup or Jack Shepherd for 3 months each to Batavia, Chungking, Manila, Tokyo.

(9) Discover whether Myrdal would be free 3 months after his return to Sweden to contribute an analysis of above-ground and under-ground concepts in Holland, Denmark, Sweden, Finland, Latvia, Estonia, and Lithuania on postwar organization.

(10) After he served 6 months in the French Army, if he is still alive, dig up Dennery by the roots and bring him over to collaborate with Corbett, Earle, and yourself. Failing Dennery, consider Joxe.

(11) Discover whether there is some European, African or British scholar who knows the greater part of Africa from the political and economic angle, and arrange for him to make a fresh visit to the principal African states and colonies. After a 10-months survey of war repercussions and the establishment of contact with that handful of people in each area who are thinking of postwar organization, bring him to New York for collaboration with the groups here.

(12) Ask Henry Allen Moe, Laurence Duggan and others who are the one or two Latin Americans of great intellectual ability who look at Latin America for a continental and international point of view, who might establish contact with the appropriate groups in the leading countries and then come to New York to give the groups here the benefit of his study of such thinking as there is in Latin America on war aims and postwar organization.

(13) Bring both Searle Bates and Chen Han-seng from China to collaborate both with Corbett, Tawney, Sansom, and Holland on the one hand and with such groups as the American Committee may recommend on the other.

(14) Bring either Motylev, Troyanovsky, or Voitinski, to contribute alike to the IPR inquiry, Corbett's special synthesis and to such studies by other American groups as may be recommended by the American Committee for International Studies.

(15) Discover from S. K. Datta and Jawaharlal Nehru what Indian scholar is qualified or could take time under a Rockefeller fellowship to qualify himself to come to New York to contribute to the work of the various international and national groups here.

The parochialism of even the greatest thinkers is such that unless international organization is studied in an atmosphere that is made realistic by the physical presence of people from every continent, grave errors are inevitable. You will remember that in his A Study of History, Arnold J. Toynbee asserts that, as a historian, he disapproves of the use to which historical information has been put. He maintains that historical scholarship has substituted the Nation for mankind and thwarted the impulse to comprehend life as a whole. To support this he examines one case and discovers that English history is unintelligible when taken by itself. The "intelligible field of study" must be in some larger unit than the Nation. "Historical thought takes a deep impression from the dominant institutions and the transient social environment in which it happens to live."

You will note that the people I envisage as fellowship holders and collaborators represent every one of the disciplines in the social sciences.

It seems to Holland and me that either your committee or your committee acting jointly with IPR or the Rockefeller Foundation itself should set up a temporary research bureau in New York for the next 3 or 4 years, devoted solely to studying the question of wartime and postwar problems.

Many of these suggestions, or perhaps the multiplicity of them, may cause you to feel that I have gone beyond your request. This I have clearly done, but I have been moved to do so by my fairly deep convictions. The ISC has done valuable work, but one of its principal limitations has been that it has been too much conditioned by its European environment. The IPR has done valuable work, but it has been too much conditioned by its Pacific environment. It seems to me that the war situation makes it more imperative than ever that a nucleus of scholars be established somewhere in the world, probably of necessity in New York, which can look at present problems of mankind from an even more inclusive point of view than that of either the ISC or the IPR.

Sincerely yours,

EDWARD C. CARTER.

MAY 9, 1940.

ECC from PEC

I have been thinking about your name on the combination of fellowship holders and special collaborators in a broadly international joint study of peace terms and postwar reconstruction. It does not seem to me a bit overambitious. As you suggest at the end there is a job of unlimited importance to be done, or at least attempted, and to my way of thinking it is worth any possible concentration of brain power. The big way is indeed the only way of tackling it adequately, and I believe that by a bold initiative of this type the institute may render incalculable service. As we are working now, we are employing an occasional leisure hour of a number of scholars each very busy in his special field. The task really calls for a large team of experts devoting their whole time to it. It seems to me very fitting that the only plan I have seen which grasps the magnitude of the need and the opportunity should emanate from the IPR. Even if necessary aid should not be forthcoming you will at least escape the reproach of failing to rise to the occasion.

We know a good deal about the thought now being devoted to problems of world organization for peace in a number of countries. But, so far as I know, only two efforts have been made to mobilize in one spot an international corps of thinkers to work on these problems. One of them is the program of the ISC, the other the League Committee under Colijn at The Hague. It seems to me inevitable that the operations of both these bodies will be greatly impeded, if not suspended, by the war. Moreover, neither has the material or geographical scope contemplated in your plan, and essential to the conception of world peace as an indivisible whole.

One or two suggestions of detail

1. In sending anyone on a mission of inquiry, I think care should be taken to select a person who, on his return, will not be so much absorbed in other work that he will not be able to participate fully in discussion here. The ideal will be someone who can give most of his time for a reasonable period.

2. For the African topics, the name of W. K. Hancock should be borne in mind. He had a great deal to do with the colonial studies conducted by Chatham House, wrote a good book on The Empire, has spent some time in the mandates and colonies, and is a man of first-rate character and ability. He is professor of history at Birmingham.

3. I know an unusually intelligent Canadian engineer who spent some years in Russia, speaks the language, and traveled from Moscow to Vladivostok and from Leningrad to Odessa, who might be induced to do some useful work on Soviet industry and commerce, and its probable importance in the postwar world.

Mr. MORRIS. Now I would also like to introduce at this time the testimony in executive session of Mr. E. C. Carter, taken before this committee June 21, 1951, pages 212 and 213 of the executive session.

The interrogation follows:

Mr. MORRIS. What relation did Laurence Duggan have to your organization, Mr. Carter?

Mr. CARTER. * * * Laurence became quite a high-ranking officer—in whatever is called the Latin-American Section in the State Department.

And I remember once when Sumner Welles was urging that we try to get an unofficial society in some Latin countries, I went along to Laurence Duggan's office and talked to him, and he seemed to be generally sympathetic and suggested that I talk to certain other Americans in the Latin-American Section of the State Department.

Mr. MORRIS. Whom did he suggest?

Mr. CARTER. I don't remember. He suggested whoever was their economic adviser, on the ground that if the Latins saw that it was in their economic and business interest to become a part of the IPR, that might be more persuasive with some of the countries.

I would like to introduce this executive session testimony into today's testimony on the relation of Mr. Laurence Duggan into the Institute of Pacific Relations.

The CHAIRMAN. That was taken at the time when Mr. Carter was under oath before the committee in executive session?

Mr. MORRIS. That is right, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. It may be inserted in the record. This is the same Mr. Carter who testified here in open session?

Mr. MORRIS. That is right, Mr. Chairman.

TESTIMONY OF E. C. CARTER

Mr. MORRIS. What relation did Laurence Duggan have to your organization, Mr. Carter?

Mr. CARTER. * * * Laurence became quite a high-ranking officer—in whatever is called the Latin-American Section in the State Department.

And I remember once when Sumner Welles was urging that we try to get an unofficial society in some Latin countries, I went along to Laurence Duggan's office and talked to him, and he seemed to be generally sympathetic and suggested that I talk to certain other Americans in the Latin-American Section of the State Department.

Mr. CARTER. I don't remember. He suggested whoever was their economic adviser, on the ground that if the Latins saw that it was in their economic and business interest to become a part of the IPR, that might be more persuasive with some the countries.

Mr. MORRIS. I show Mr. Mandel photostats of two letters and ask him if he will identify those letters from the Institute of Pacific Relations?

Mr. MANDEL. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. Where did you get those letters, Mr. Mandel?

Mr. MANDEL. These were obtained from the files of the Institute of Pacific Relations as turned over to us.

Mr. MORRIS. One letter is dated December 2, 1935. It is from Frederick V. Field to Laurence Duggan, Department of State:

Thank you for your quick reply to my telegram in regard to Friday evening. I look forward to meeting with you and your friends and only hope the occassion won't be too formal.

I shall be glad to have dinner with you beforehand. I shall get in touch with you Friday morning.

The preceding letter which was sent from Duggan to Field, dated November 7, 1935, reads:

Dear FRED: Every so often a group of us here in Washington gets together in the evening to discuss international matters of interest. Some time we would like to have a discussion that would center around possible developments in the Far East as a result of Europe's preoccupations, in particular in the Italian-Ethiopian dispute. For these discussions, which are very informal, we try and get someone in who is particularly well versed in the subject under discussion. I wonder whether you or Joe, or anyone like Pfeffer, is going to be in Washington in the near future and would be willing to spend an evening with this group? We will fix the date to meet your convenience.

The CHAIRMAN. Now who is the Field mentioned in that letter?

Mr. MORRIS. That is Frederick V. Field who up to that time had been secretary of the American Council of the Institute of Pacific Relations.

The CHAIRMAN. That is Frederick Vanderbilt Field who testified in open session before the committee?

Mr. MORRIS. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. That may be inserted in the record.

MR. LAURENCE DUGGAN,
Department of State, Washington, D. C.

DEAR LARRY: Thank you for your quick reply to my telegram in regard to Friday evening. I look forward to meeting with you and your friends and only hope the occasion won't be too formal.

I shall be glad to have dinner with you beforehand. I shall get in touch with you Friday morning.

Sincerely yours,

FREDERICK V. FIELD.

Mr. MORRIS. I would like to introduce this other letter now, identified by Mr. Mandel, which is dated November 15, 1935, on the letterhead of the Department of State, from Laurence Duggan to Frederick V. Field of the Institute of Pacific Relations:

DEAR FRED: I am delighted to learn that you may be down here shortly and will be willing to induct us into the mysteries of the Far East. You have no idea how much we don't know!

May I say, Mr. Chairman, we had previous testimony to the effect that at that time Mr. Frederick V. Field was the secretary of the American Council of the Institute of Pacific Relations.

The CHAIRMAN. It may be inserted in the record.

(The document referred to was marked "Exhibit No. 44" and is as follows:)

MR. FREDERICK V. FIELD,
Institute of Pacific Relations,
129 East Fifty-second Street, New York, N. Y.

DEAR FRED: I am delighted to learn that you may be down here shortly and will be willing to induct us into the mysteries of the Far East. You have no idea how much we don't know!

Very sincerely yours,

LARRY (Lawrence Duggan).

The CHAIRMAN. These are photostatic copies you are giving for the record?

Mr. MORRIS. That is right.

Senator FERGUSON. That is a photostat of an original letter?

Mr. MORRIS. A photostat of a letter taken from the files.

Mrs. Massing, did you know a man named Robert T. Miller?

Mrs. MASSING. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you describe what you know about Robert T. Miller?

Mrs. MASSING. I know not too much about him really. I met him on, I believe, my second courier trip on a boat. He was on his way to the Soviet Union. I didn't know him then. I met him on the boat and we started to discuss politics. As far as I remember, he was anti-Soviet. I tried, as I tried during those years, to convince everybody that the Soviet Union was the solution to all problems in this world.

Mr. MORRIS. What year was this?

Mrs. MASSING. That was probably in 1934. I would not know exactly. It might have been 1935. It must have been 1934. We discussed at great length. He was going on a trip to the Soviet Union quite determined not to like it. I told him that he doesn't understand, that he doesn't know, and I offered to give him a letter of recommendation to Mrs. Louis Fischer, Markoosha Fischer, provided that he take chocolate to the sons of Louis Fischer, who were little boys at the time. There was no chocolate in the Soviet Union, and everybody who had a chance to send food into the Soviet Union did, and I told Miller if he would buy a lot of chocolate in Germany I would in exchange give him a letter of introduction to Markoosha Fischer, who would then show him around in Moscow and explain the Soviet Union. She, being a Russian and the wife of an American newspaperman, was the appropriate person to introduce to him the great secrets of the Soviet Union. He accepted it. He did buy chocolate, and he did meet Markoosha Fischer, who took him to the Moscow Daily News, where the doctrination was completely taken out of her hands because he married an American Communist.

Mr. MORRIS. Who was the American Communist?

Mrs. MASSING. I don't know. I heard her name. I don't know her personally. I wasn't there. He stayed on sometime, I understand, and left as a Communist. This is all I know about him. I have never seen him since.

Mr. MORRIS. I would like to make reference to the letter that was introduced into the testimony on the second day during the Carter testimony. It was a letter from Edward C. Carter to Alger Hiss which reported on a discussion with Robert T. Miller. It reads in part:

DEAR ALGER: Yesterday, at your suggestion, I had a delightful and illuminating talk with Robert T. Miller, whom I hope to see again.

I would like to make that part of the record.

Senator FERGUSON. What did Miller work at?

Mrs. MASSING. I don't know. He seemed to me to be a student at the time. He was very young.

The CHAIRMAN. That may be inserted in the record.

Mr. MORRIS. It has been inserted, Mr. Chairman. I just was making reference to it.

Now, Mrs. Massing, did you ever have any encounter with Joseph Barnes?

Mr. MASSING. Yes, if you want to call it "encounter."

Mr. MORRIS. Will you describe exactly what your experience has been with Joseph Barnes?

Mrs. MASSING. Yes. In order to do that, Mr. Morris, I have to explain who Peter Zubelin is. Peter Zubelin was the second attaché at the Russian Embassy in Washington, I believe, during the years of 1943, 1944, 1945. I am not certain. I just want to say he was in Washington and was a very high official. I met Peter Zubelin in Moscow in 1937. Peter Zubelin was my main interrogator during the time I stayed in Moscow more or less against my will. The thing I refer to as "my purge" was a mild purge, because I am alive today, which does not happen to many people who go through a Russian purge. Peter Zubelin was the first man that met me in Moscow and was for many months my interrogator. I got to know him very closely.

Mr. MORRIS. Did you know him as Peter Zubelin?

Mrs. MASSING. Of course not. I knew him as Peter. As a matter of fact, I was accompanied—and this is too long to tell here, but just to say that when Ignatz Reiss was killed I was called back to Moscow. I did not want to go.

Mr. MORRIS. What year was that?

Mrs. MASSING. That was in 1937. There was a special agent assigned to bring me and my husband, Paul, to Moscow. We knew her by the name of Helen. Helen worked on us and in a way watched us for many weeks before we were ready to leave. We left on a boat, finding her on a boat, at which point I knew we were really under police escort more or less.

It was Helen who brought Peter to my house, to the hotel Metropole in Moscow, where my interrogation took place. It was Helen who was present the first few weeks, and though Peter and Helen were married I never knew it, and though I spent with them many nights, because the interrogation took place at night mostly, I never knew they were a couple.

Peter Zubelin, after several months of interrogation and after the measures were relaxed and we were taken into the social life of the NKVD in Moscow, went one morning with my husband, Paul, to play tennis, and I went along. Now, let me say that Peter Zubelin was a kind of NKVD official. I don't know his exact rank in Russia. It was a very high army rank. NKVD people live a very different life from the average Russian. Not only is it privileged but a very secluded life, a very guarded life. For example, they have their own living quarters, their own dachas, their own shops, and their own hospitals, their own sanatoriums, and their own tennis courts. Peter went with us to a tennis court which was, of course, a closed tennis court. As we entered he whisked out whatever identification it was—I didn't see it; I didn't ask what the card was like. It was obviously a closed and private court. As we entered, I sat down on the bench and on the other court I saw Joseph Barnes, whom I knew to be a newspaperman and of whose presence in Moscow I had heard before, because, let me say this, I was very aware of all American newspapermen in Moscow merely because I hoped that they would keep track of me so that I would not disappear. Therefore, I knew very well who Barnes was and what his function was, what his work in Moscow was. I saw on the other court Barnes playing tennis with somebody else. I don't know who it was.

I said to Peter, "You know, Peter, this is very unfortunate that you have us here being seen playing tennis by an American newspaperman, playing tennis with you." He said, "What do you mean?" I said, "Look, there is Barnes." He said, "Barnes? Oh, you needn't worry about Barnes."

Mr. MORRIS. Mrs. Massing, I would like to make reference at this time, unless any of the Senators want to ask a question——

Senator SMITH. I have one or two questions, Mr. Morris.

I was going to ask you whether or not you had any contacts with anybody else in the State Department other than those you have mentioned up to now.

If you are going to cover that, Mr. Morris, I will defer.

Mr. MORRIS. I think, Senator, there is a list of people that I am going to ask her about.

Senator SMITH. All right.

Senator FERGUSON. Is it not your purpose to connect only those at the present time that had connections with the IPR?

Mr. MORRIS. Yes.

In answer to the Senator's question, I would like again to make reference to this list of 83 people that we introduced on the first day.

Senator FERGUSON. Who had connections with the IPR?

Mr. MORRIS. Yes. We have this list and we asked Mr. Carter if they were associated with the IPR.

Senator FERGUSON. He either identified them or not.

Mr. MORRIS. We are trying to restrict, as much as possible, questions to this particular list. If another name comes up, it is only because it will bring an indirect relationship to some of these people.

Senator SMITH. We will have another chance to ask this witness about other things?

Mr. MORRIS. That is right, sir.

Mrs. Massing, I wonder if you would tell us what you know about a man named James S. Allen.

Mrs. MASSING. I never worked with James S. Allen, because James S. Allen was an open party member, but I knew James S. Allen, and his real name is Sol Auerbach. I knew him as Sol. I met him socially.

Mr. MORRIS. Mrs. Massing, I would like to offer you a photograph that appeared in the Daily Worker of May 4, 1936. There is a picture of James S. Allen. I wonder if you will identify the man whose picture appears there as the man we are talking about now.

Mrs. MASSING. Yes, that is he.

Mr. MORRIS. I would like to introduce this into the record purely for identification purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. Whom do you refer to as the man we are now talking about

Mr. MORRIS. James S. Allen.

Mrs. MASSING. James S. Allen is the man we are talking about.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you tell us what you know about James S. Allen?

Mrs. MASSING. When I met Allen, I met him at Harry Freeman's. He belonged to the group of party intellectuals. He was a theoretician in the party.

Senator FERGUSON. When you say a party, what do you mean?

Mrs. MASSING. American party.

Senator FERGUSON. The Communist Party?

Mrs. MASSING. Yes.

I must say here that my social contact with the American party was strictly against my orders. I maintained it because Gerhart Eisler, my first husband, was in this country and we were very good friends, and the people I had met when I first was in this country in 1926—there was a circle of people that in spite of the fact that neither Gerhart was permitted to see Harry Freeman, who was a Tass representative, nor was I permitted to see Harry Freeman or Gerhart Eisler, still we would meet at Freeman's apartment.

It was there that I met James Allen or Sol Auerbach. Sol at the time was working for Trachtenberg International Publishers. He was an editor. He was also the theoretician for the party in regard to the Negro problem. He had written one book on the Black Belt theory, as far as I remember. He was at this time writing a second book. He was a highly intelligent man, but had very great difficulties in writing the second book.

I remember he discussed it at great length with me, that he did not fully believe in the theory he was to propound for the party, and, therefore, took a great, a long time, to write this book he really did not want to write. He was rather critical, I must say, and I am sorry to go on record with this because I do not think it is going to help him very much within the Communist Party—he was critical of the Soviet Union at the time, which was true for many intellectuals. They were critical in a sort of friendly manner. He was certainly very critical of the American party, too, toward the Negro problem he was assigned to write about.

Shortly after I had met Sol and his wife, meaning James Allen and his wife, his wife went on a mission, first to China and later to the Philippines. Of course, I wasn't told this. This was just by inferences. She was in the east and she was on a mission that nobody knew what it was about. It was during this time that my husband also was in France.

Sol Auerbach and I became rather friendly. Sol's mother had a place in a suburb of New York where I spent evenings fairly frequently.

So I really know a great deal about Sol's thoughts at the time. Sol at this time was not connected directly with the Comintern in any other way but being a theoretician for the open Communist Party. When his wife got back from her mission, I did not see them very often because she was an apparatchik and did not very much mix with this group after she came back from the mission.

I don't quite know what happened in Sol's development, but I remember very distinctly after not having seen him for several months, he called me and came to my house and again said that he was very dissatisfied with his position within the party, with his writing, and that he would very much like to join my apparatus. He was asking my advice on this. I was rather critical myself, and quite appalled at a young man who should be willing to join a group that I did not think was a very good thing to be in or be involved with. I told him I could neither help nor would I, could I. I advised him to stay out of that, that if he was dissatisfied with his work to not to do it, but make up his own mind and do what he wanted to do. This is all I know about him. I have never seen him since.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Mandel, I would like to offer you four groups of letters and ask you if you will identify those four letters.

Mr. MANDEL. I identify these letters as being taken from the files of the Institute of Pacific Relations.

Mr. MORRIS. I would like to make reference, Mr. Chairman, to a letter dated April 13, 1938, from Mr. James S. Allen to Mr. Frederick V. Field, addressed to the American Council, Institute of Pacific Relations. Allen, in this letter, says:

I am contemplating a small book on the Philippines, with chief emphasis upon the internal situation in the light of the problems of the Pacific area.

I have already done much preparatory work, and expect to round out my materials by additional observation and new data during another trip to the islands. I will probably leave in July and spend 4 or 5 months there.

It has occurred to me that the institute may be interested in the project, and may be willing to extend financial aid.

Then he goes on to say:

Should the institute be unwilling to make any commitments with regard to the sponsoring or publication of the book, another alternative seems possible. In the kind of general book which I am planning, it will be impossible to use the mass of data which I already have and which I will gather during my next trip.

There is another letter in this same batch from James S. Allen, dated June 2, 1938, to Mr. Edward C. Carter, of the Institute of Pacific Relations, and reads:

DEAR MR. CARTER: I am enclosing a copy of my letter to Mr. Field with regard to my proposed book on the Philippines. Please pardon the delay in replying to your note of May 28, since I have just returned to the city.

Sincerely yours,

JAMES S. ALLEN.

Senator SMITH. I wonder if you will accept that in evidence?

Mr. SOURWINE. Mr. Morris, is that one of the four groups of letters that Mr. Mandel has perviously identified?

Mr. MORRIS. Yes; it is.

Senator SMITH (presiding). I think it will be all right for this purpose. According to law, I guess you would have to identify it by signature. I think under the circumstances in which it was found, for the purpose of this hearing, it is all right.

Mr. MORRIS. The purpose of this is to show the relationship between James S. Allen, about whom the witness has testified, and the Institute of Pacific Relations.

Senator SMITH. That might not be James S. Allen's signature, but apparently it is, according to the circumstances under which it was found.

Mr. FREDERICK V. FIELD,

American Council, Institute of Pacific Relations, San Francisco, Calif.

DEAR MR. FIELD: I am contemplating a small book on the Philippines, with chief emphasis upon the internal situation in the light of the problems of the Pacific area.

I have already done much preparatory work, and expect to round out my materials by additional observation and new data during another trip to the islands. I will probably leave in July and spend 4 or 5 months there.

It has occurred to me that the institute may be interested in the project, and may be willing to extend financial aid. Upon my return at the end of this year, I will have at hand the materials necessary for the writing of the book. But my problem will then be to assure myself 3 or 4 months of uninterrupted time for writing the book. I do not know the usual procedure of the institute in such matters, but may I take the liberty of requesting an advance grant to enable me to complete the book for publication?

Should the institute be unwilling to make any commitments with regard to the sponsoring or publication of the book, another alternative seems possible. In the kind of general book which I am planning, it will be impossible to use the mass of data which I aready have and which I will gather during my next trip. The institute may be interested in taking the materials for utilization in a Philippine handbook or other form. In this case, I could arrange for the publication of my book on its completion with a commercial publisher.

If it is possible to work out some basis of aid in advance, I could plan my trip and future plans accordingly. Should it be felt that some arrangement could be worked out, I would, of course, be glad to supply further details on the plan of the book.

I am ready to consider any other suggestion you may have in the matter.

Sincerely yours,

JAMES S. ALLEN.

DEAR MR. CARTER: I am enclosing a copy of my letter to Mr. Field with regard to my proposed book on the Philippines. Please pardon the delay in replying to your note of May 28, since I have just returned to the city.

Sincerely yours,

JAMES S. ALLEN.

Mr. MORRIS. I would also like to introduce into evidence a copy of a letter identified by Mr. Mandel as having come from the files as a memorandum from Mr. Lockwood to Mr. Carter, dated April 14, 1938.

Reference here is made to the fact, on page 2, the second full paragraph from the top, that Lockwood is asking Carter:

Are you in touch with James Allen? I understand he is going to the islands in July to continue his investigation. His recent Pacific Affairs article on the agrarian question was most interesting and gave evidence of being a careful and scholarly piece of work. His earlier book on the Negro problem in the United States was praised by scholars as an excellent piece of research, even though his Communist ideology led him off into a proposal for "national self-determination" in the Black Belt which most people thought rather fantastic. Since the agrarian problem in the Philippines is obviously a key issue and since Allen has been short of funds, at least until recently, there may be some way in which the IPR can give him a useful boost.

I would like to introduce that in evidence in connection with Mr. Allen's association with the IPR.

PHILIPPINE RESEARCH

Our luncheon meeting still leaves rather vague what the American council should do both as regards the secretariat inquiry and a long-term research program. Even if we follow up the suggestion and call a committee under Hayden, we should attempt meanwhile to clarify what we want done and might be in a position to do. It is unlikely that merely setting up a committee will carry us far unless we have a pretty good idea what we want and unless we are prepared to put a good deal of staff effort into pushing the thing along. I hope that Hayden will be here within a few weeks for a research committee meeting so that we can confer with him in person. Meanwhile, the situation looks to me about as follows:

SECRETARIAT INQUIRY

The bulk of the contribution to the secretariat inquiry, as I understand it, is to come from the Philippine council, with what assistance the secretariat and the American council may be able to give. The American council is to be primarily responsible, however, only for the specific American angle—the Philippines as a factor in our far eastern relations. Not only does this accord with IPR policy, but it recognizes the fact that with two possible exceptions, which I shall mention below, Americans in this country are hardly in a position to make any very useful contribution to the study of internal Philippine affairs or of Philippine relations in the Far East. Just what the general program of the Philippine study should be is for someone else to say. Perhaps the possibilities can be divided into two categories: (1) Memoranda on the general aspects of the external problems of the Commonwealth, and (2) more thoroughgoing research into various domestic phases of Philippine economic and political life.

Under the first category come the general subjects of international trade and international political relationships during and after the change in the political status of the islands. From the Philippine angle this involves the problem of economic readjustment and of political security in the present and future. From the American, it involves primarily the Philippines as a factor in our policy in the Pacific. In this category the American council shares with the Philippine council the responsibility for documenting the secretariat inquiry.

It hardly seems necessary, however, for the American council to plan any extensive effort along this line. Philippine-American trade relations have been abundantly documented by the United States Government and private investigators. The facts are known and the problem is largely the political one of negotiation. So, too, the political and strategic phases of American interests are not in need of extensive research, particularly in view of Hayden's forthcoming volume (about which I have written for more specific information). The naval angle will come in for consideration in our naval study. In addition, we contemplate a data paper on American Far Eastern policy for the next conference, and meanwhile the conferences now being held may turn up a good deal of analysis and opinion on the subject.

Accordingly, I see no reason to alter our original proposal—that the American council should now plan only for a memorandum (possibly a data paper for the next conference) analyzing the place of the Philippines in American policy and the American angle of the Philippine question itself. Even this should be somewhat conditional on Hayden's present work, and on the needs of the situation as it develops next fall. It may be that the most useful thing we could do would be to assemble a small group of people next winter to prepare a brief series of recommendations on Philippine policy, comparable to that issued under the auspices of the Foreign Policy Association 2 or 3 years ago. Possibly this report might be correlated with a parallel report undertaken and issued in the Philippines by a responsible group of Filipinos.

In the second category—that of Philippine research projects bearing on the secretariat inquiry—it is not clear to me that the American council should undertake anything at the present time. Little progress can be made in any important Philippine studies except by persons on the spot. I do not know whether the secretariat is sending someone to the islands or what relationship, if any, this person might have to the American council. Presumably this matter of research on internal political, economic, and social affairs will be worked out between the secretariat and the Philippine council, although the American council would naturally do everything it could to assist.

Are you in touch with James Allen? I understand he is going to the islands in July to continue his investigation. His recent Pacific Affairs article on the agrarian question was most interesting and gave evidence of being a careful and scholarly piece of work. His earlier book on the Negro problem in the United States was praised by scholars as an excellent piece of research, even though his Communist ideology led him off into a proposal for "national self-determination" in the Black Belt which most people thought rather fantastic. Since the agrarian problem in the Philippines is obviously a key issue and since Allen has been short of funds, at least until recently, there may be some way in which the IPR can give him a useful boost. Chen Han-seng says that Allen's former hostility to Quezon has now been somewhat modified. Without knowing any more of the situation than this, I wonder if it would be desirable to investigate the possibility of hooking up Allen, Fred Howe, and others in such a way as to secure a thoroughgoing and rounded report on all phases of the agrarian problem. Perhaps this is altogether fanciful in view of personalities, etc., but in any case the sample of Allen's work is most promising.

With reference to your exchange of letters with Field on the subject of Miss Eleanor Dennison, which you passed along for comment—the subject of Philippine economic interest in the Far East deserves thoroughgoing study. The existing trade is relatively small, of course, and is a subject easily documented. The important question is rather the potentialities for the future. If the American trade tie is cut, the islands will be forced to reorient themselves in terms of Far Eastern trade relations, and this means primarily but not exclusively trade with Japan. (A study of Hong Kong trade, for example, shows that intra-regional trade has developed rapidly in this area, even excluding the Japanese share.) Someone ought to make a close study of both the competitive and complementary relationships of Philippine products and potential products with those of adjacent countries on all sides. But this is a highly technical matter and hardly to be undertaken as a doctoral thesis by some American girl in California. Unless it is already being done in the Philippines under official auspices, I should think it would constitute one important phase of the secretariat inquiry in the islands.

LONG-RANGE RESEARCH PLANS

Before setting up any committees and inviting suggestions for a program, I wonder if we should not consider rather carefully what we are actually prepared to do. In general, the need seems to be for basic studies in the social sciences in the Philippines rather than for anything that can be done from secondary materials over here. Moreover, our program, as you have pointed out, should be the stimulation of interest among American scholars, largely lacking in the past, rather than carrying through some particular research project under American council auspices. Such a research promotion campaign would presumably include a survey of these research needs, after the fashion of an SSRC committee, to be followed by a varied program including publicity for these needs, the coordination of research efforts, the provision of funds for travel and study in the islands, the encouragement of gradute study by Filipinos in the United States, the building up of library resources here and in the islands, etc.

There is only one objection to our launching such a program right away, but that is a practical one: Who is going to do it? We can get useful advice, suggestions, and contacts from a committee set up for the purpose, as proposed, but the actual execution of the program—the administrative responsibility—would fall upon us to a large extent and would be quite time consuming. There is little value in making the gesture unless we are prepared to follow it through. At present we are already rather far extended in our general program. It is questionable whether we should embark on any special effort along this line until some of our present responsibilities are liquidated.

It was this limitation of staff which was largely responsible for dropping the proposal discussed last summer for a Philippine-American council or committee. The plan which Lasker then proposed was a program to stimulate cultural relations in general with research as one of its important subdivisions. For a time it looked as though Veatch might be the man to carry out this research project, to serve as correspondent for the committee in the islands, and to carry a good deal of responsibility for organizing the thing at this end. When this scheme collapsed, owing to Veatch's decision to stay with the State Department, and when the war broke out, we went no further.

What we need is a staff person who would be our research person on the Philippines, thoroughly conversant with the subject, and who, in the remainder of his or her time, would be a Mortimer Graves in this field. It would be advantageous, although not essential, for this person to spend a period in the Philippines and return with a first-hand understanding of the situation. Until we see our way clear to some such arrangement, I am somewhat skeptical of the wisdom of making the initial splash and arousing expectations which we may not be in a position to fulfill. Is this taking a too negative view as far as the immediate possibilities are concerned?

Mr. MORRIS. I would like also to introduce into evidence a copy of a letter from Owen Lattimore to James S. Allen, dated February 27, 1939, and addressed to 508 West One Hundred and Thirty-ninth Street, apartment 42, New York City:

DEAR ALLEN. Excuse my writing to you by dictaphone, as I am away from my office and kind of crowded for time.

It was good to hear from you again and I am only sorry that your "letter to the editor" was not in time for publication in our March number. It will have to come out in June. I am returning to you herewith a copy of the letter as set up to go to the printer. I am also sending copies to the Compania and to the Philippine branch of the IPR.

What about some more on the Philippines sometime? We are really rather hard-pressed to get enough material that is not directly about the Japanese war on China. At the same time I needn't apologize for pointing out to you that we couldn't guarantee to take another article from you on the Philippines right away, if it would look to the Philippines IPR as though we only printed radical stuff on the islands. Have you done any work in French Indochina, the Malay Straits, or Netherlands India?

By the way, have you any ideas that I could use in expanding circulation in the Philippines for Pacific Affairs? I think it is a healthy thing not to depend entirely on the organizational efforts of the IPR in each area for subscriptions. The more we can widen out everywhere by getting people who are not just members or joiners to subscribe to Pacific Affairs, the better for us.

I may be in New York toward the end of March. If so I very much hope that I may be able to make your acquaintance personally.

I would like to introduce that in evidence as one of the letters identified by Mr. Mandel as being taken from the files.

Mr. MORRIS. I would like to also introduce the fourth batch of letters identified by Mr. Mandel, which is an exchange of correspondence dated May 25, 1938, from Mr. Allen to Mr. Carter and Mr. Carter's reply, dated May 28, 1938. Mr. Carter says in his reply to Mr. Allen:

DEAR ALLEN: This is to acknowledge with thanks your letter of May 25. Some time ago, Mr. Field forwarded your letter and outline for a book on the Philippines but, for some reason, I fail to find it in my files. It may have been lost in the mails.

I wonder whether it would be easy for you to send me a duplicate so that I may give it and your letter of May 25 the attention it deserves.

Whether the institute can make any grant, I cannot say at the moment. We are, however, very much interested in your proposal.

Mr. Chairman, Mr. Carter's letter to Mr. Allen is dated May 28, 1938, and sent to 381 Fourth Avenue, New York City, which is the address of the International Publishers Co. and also the address of the Communist Party of the United States, New York County Committee.

Mr. EDWARD CARTER,
Intitute of Pacific Relations, New York.

DEAR MR. CARTER: Mr. Frederick Field informed me some time ago that he had forwarded to you my letter outlining a short book on the Philippines and requesting assistance from the institute. He suggested that you might have something concrete to offer in this regard.

I am taking the liberty to write to you, since the time is drawing near for my departure to the Philippines and I have so little time left in which to make arrangements for the publication of the book.

If the institute is not in a position to render assistance to this project, I should like to know as soon as possible, since I would then attempt to make other arrangements. It seems to me, however, that the type of book I have in mind would especially suit the research and publication program of the institute and lend itself to your sponsorship. Professor Hayden is working on a lengthy and rather exhaustive study of all aspects of Philippine economic and social life, a book which will undoubtedly be of great value. My purpose, rather, is to write a concise book on the chief internal and international issues facing the Philippines in view of the new phase of Japanese aggression and the world alinement of the Fascist and militarist powers.

I expect to leave New York during the first week in July and will return from the Philippines at beginning of next year, when I will be ready to devote a number of months to the writing of the book.

Should you wish any further information, I will be only too glad to supply it. Any indication you can give me immediately as to the possibility of some constructive proposal from the institute would, of course, be highly appreciated.

Sincerely yours,

JAMES S. ALLEN.

Mr. MORRIS. I introduce a letter from the general directory manager of the New York Telephone Co., dated May 15, 1951. I ask you if you will take the letter from the New York Telephone Co. in evidence.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be presented in the record.

EXHIBIT No. 52

NEW YORK TELEPHONE CO.,

Hon. PAT MCCARRAN,
Chairman, Committee on the Judiciary,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Your letter of May 9, 1951, in reference to a listing in the Manhattan telephone book for 1938 of the names, International Publishers, Communist Party U.S.A., or Communist Party of New York State has been referred to me for reply.

The 1938 edition of the Manhattan alphabetical directory, corrected to November 10, 1937, contained the following listings, among others:

International Publishers Co., 381 Fourth Ave., MUryhil 5-2864.

Communist Party of the U. S. A., New York County Committee, 381 Fourth Ave., MUryhil 5–2462.

No listing appeared in this directory for a New York State Communist Party or a Communist Party of New York State.

The two listings published in the 1938 Manhattan alphabetical directory also appeared in the 1938–39 edition, corrected to May 12, 1938, and again in the 1939 issue, corrected to November 9, 1938.

If we can be of any further assistance to you or to your committee in this matter, please do not hesitate to call on us.

Sincerely yours,

L. J. JORDAN,
General Directory Manager.

The CHAIRMAN. Where does this letter come from?

Mr. MORRIS. It is from the New York Telephone Co., addressed to you.

I would like also to make part of the record two articles published in Pacific Affairs, the official publication of the Institute of Pacific Relations, in 1938. One is on page 52, called The Agrarian Tendencies in the Philippines by James S. Allen, and the other is called The Philippine Problem Enters a New Phase, by James S. Allen. That is on page 159.

I would like to introduce both of these articles in evidence as writings of Mr. Allen from the Institute of Pacific Relations.

Mr. SOURWINE. Do you want those printed in full in the record?

Mr. MORRIS. No.

The CHAIRMAN. You want this to go in the files, then?

Mr. MORRIS. Yes; in the files.

The CHAIRMAN. What about the excerpts getting into the record?

Mr. MORRIS. I think the record should show those two articles did appear.

The CHAIRMAN. You mean they will lie before the committee?

Mr. MORRIS. Yes.

Senator FERGUSON. There is a reference so if anyone wants to read the whole articles he can find them in the Library.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

Mr. MORRIS. There is one more letter I would like to introduce on the question of James S. Allen, Mr. Chairman. This is dated May 29, 1940. It is a letter from Edward C. Carter to W. L. Holland; it is sent from 129 East Fifty-second Street, New York, which at that time was the address of the Institute of Pacific Relations.

The last paragraph reads:

Last week we had a special meeting on Soviet Policy in the Pacific made up of some members of Corbett's group, but it was an ad hoc meeting. Those present were: Kathleen Barnes, Lockwood, Grajdanzev, Corbett, Muhle, Bisson, Moore, Field, James Allen, Bill Carter, E. C. Carter, and Owen Lattimore, and Leaning.

That is signed by Mr. Carter.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the origin of that letter?

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Mandel is getting the original letter.

The CHAIRMAN. Please lay the foundation for it.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you introduce this letter as a letter taken from the files of the Institute?

Mr. MANDEL. I identify this letter of May 29, 1940, as a letter from the IPR files.

DEAR BILL: You will, I think, wish to scan this docket of the London, Ontario, Study Meeting. Please return it at your convenience. It was really a very good show. The Canadians seemed most deeply to appreciate the presence of the Americans.

Referring to your very generous letter of May 23 and your check for the New Zealand part of the general purposes budget, I wish to thank you most sincerely for your characteristically generous help. May I have the privilege of reporting this to the New Zealand Institute?

Elizabeth has assured me that she willingly accepts the salary cut. She is eager to work harder than ever for the IPR.

By now you will have had a copy of my letter containing the letter from Switzerland regarding the latest news from Adam. I have not had anything from Boeke or Moll. I suppose I might try a letter through Geneva. Have you any special message that you would like me to send?

Corbett's group has been meeting pretty regularly. I will check with him and see what minutes are available.

Last week we had a special meeting on Soviet policy in the Pacific made up of some members of Corbett's group, but it was an ad hoc meeting. Those present were: Kathleen Barnes, Lockwood, Grajdanzev, Corbett, Muhle, Bisson, Moore, Field, James Allen, Bill Carter, E. C. Carter, and Owen Lattimore, and Leaning.

Sincerely yours,

EDWARD C. CARTER.

Mr. MORRIS. In regard to this letter from Edward C. Carter to W. L. Holland, dated May 29, 1940, I call attention to the last paragraph which discusses a meeting held under IPR auspices in discussing Soviet policy in the Pacific.

Mrs. Massing, will you tell us what you know about Max Granich?

Mrs. MASSING. Yes. Max Granich is the husband of Grace Maul and was a brother of Mike Gold. I know he was at one time—but this is much later than when I met him—the editor of China Today. I met Granich through Mike Gold, whom I met in 1926 in New York. I knew the Gold family very well because it was through Mike Gold that I was introduced to my first job in an orphanage working with defective children in 1936, shortly after I arrived here.

Granich was a Communist, and so was Grace Maul. I think Grace Maul had a rather high function in the central committee of the Communist Party, but I am not certain what her status was. I met Granich and Grace Maul in Moscow in 1929 or the beginning of 1930. I saw them a great deal in New York between 1926 and 1928. I knew they belonged to the Communist Party, I mean.

Mr. MORRIS. How high a position do they occupy in the Communist Party?

Mrs. MASSING. I wouldn't know about him. I know about her, Grace Maul. I think she was a member of the central committee. What her specific function was, I wouldn't know. That was as far back as 1926.

I think later on she went on many missions. I knew she was in England. I met them in Paris in the American Express Co. by mere coincidence once. They traveled a great deal. I would say they were Comintern employees, Comintern missionaries, in a way. They were sent on jobs. What their specific jobs were, I wouldn't know. China was the focus, I believe.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to introduce into the record at this time, and Mr. Mandel will identify it as a letter coming from the files of the institute.

Mr. MANDEL. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. It comes from the files of the Institute of Pacfic Relations?

Mr. MANDEL. I identify it as from the files of the Institute of Pacific Relations.

Mr. MORRIS. A copy of a letter from Owen Lattimore to Mr. Max Granich, China Today, 168 West Twenty-third Street, New York City. In this letter, Lattimore says:

Thank you for your letter of December 11. I am afraid that my position as editor of Pacific Affairs makes it impossible for me to join the editorial board of China Today. I am a member of the international secretariat of the Institute of Pacific Relations. This means that one of my employers is the Japanese Council of the Institute of Pacific Relations. There has already been a considerable kick about my being on the board of Amerasia. It is probably better for me not to invite extra kicks by going on the board of China Today, which is more partisan, and more obviously partisan, than Amerasia.

I have been desperately busy the last few months completing a book and, consequently, have published very little in magazines. I am expecting to write some articles in the next few months, but I think you will agree that these articles would have their maximum impact if not published in magazines which are devoted to "the cause of China."

Yours very sincerely,

OWEN LATTIMORE.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. I would like to introduce that letter in the record.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be inserted in the record.

DEAR MR. GRANICH: Thank you for your letter of December 11. I am afraid that my position as editor of Pacific Affairs makes it impossible for me to join the editorial board of China Today. I am a member of the international secretariat of the Institute of Pacific Relations. This means that one of my employers is the Japanese Council of the Institute of Pacific Relations. There has already been a considerable kick about my being on the board of Amerasia. OWEN LATTIMORE.

Mr. MORRIS. Bearing on the testimony of this witness on Max Granich, that is.

Did you know Agnes Smedley?

Mrs. MASSING. Yes; I knew her quite well. Agnes Smedley I met in Frankfurt-am-Main when I got back from the United States in 1928. She had written her life story. I don't quite recall what the title of it in English was, but my second husband, Julian Gumperz, who was the owner of a large publishing firm in Berlin, called the Maleek Verlag, had translated and published it in his publishing firm. She was a very close friend of his. I met her through him. I saw her rather frequently before she went off to China. She was then a correspondent for the Frankfurter Zeitung.

I believe Julian Gumperz was rather instrumental in getting her the assignment as a correspondent. I did not discuss with her at the time whether she was a Communist. As a matter of fact, it is never discussed among Communists whether you are a Communist. You take it for granted. The fact that she was a friend of Julian Gumperz, the fact that she had published in the Maleek Verlag, which was a left-wing publishing firm, made me assume that she was one of us. That is how I met her.

I saw her next in Russia in 1930. She had come back from China. She was rather sick. I am not quite sure whether it was the fall of 1930 or the winter of 1930–31, but it was during this winter that I saw her in Moscow. She lived at the Hotel International. She had with her a German girl that had been with her in Shanghai. She had written the book that made her rather famous—about the Chinese Red army.

I spoke to her about Gerhart, whom she had met in China, and whom she liked very well. I saw her rather frequently in Moscow. I believe, when she was in Moscow, she had some difficulties. I had the feeling, in retrospect I must admit—at that time I would not have quite understood the situation—that she was there in almost a similar situation as I was later in 1937. She was waiting for an exit visa. She didn't get it. She wasn't treated too well by the Russians. She had difficulties with the Russians. In fact, when I saw her again in New York in 19—either 4 or 5—I am not certain because I just saw her once socially——

Mr. SOURWINE. You don't mean 1904; do you?

Mrs. MASSING. 1934 or 1935. She referred to this time where she had seen me in Moscow as having had great difficulties with the party, with the Russians. She never referred to the party but the Russians mainly.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you try to describe her relative importance in the Communist Party?

Mrs. MASSING. She had a very high status as a foremost writer on China. When I spoke to Gerhart Eisler, who was also in China as a Comintern representative during the time Agnes Smedley was there, and I saw Gerhart when he got back from Moscow in 1931—when I asked him about Agnes Smedley, he said she was "a wonderful person" and had been of tremendous help to him.

Mr. MORRIS. When he said "wonderful," he meant wonderful within the Communist scheme?

Mrs. MASSING. Of course. To Gerhart Eisler no person is wonderful if he is not a Communist. "Wonderful" is a good Communist, a useful Communist. He spoke very highly of her.

Later, when Dr. Richard Sorge was on his way to Germany from China before he went to Japan, he saw me in New York. I asked him about Agnes Smedley. He, too, said that Agnes—but he said it very smirkingly—that Agnes was "a very wonderful helper." He didn't say she was working for him. Only when he went back to Japan and saw me in New York again, he said, and this was at the time when I was ordered to go to Japan with him, he said to me, "You have a very responsible job if you go with me. You will be established like Agnes was with me in China," meaning in a rather high position, in a much higher and more responsible job than I had held in New York today in my "apparatus."

Mr. MORRIS. Do any of the Senators care to ask about Agnes Smedley?

Senator SMITH. There is one question but it may not be proper here, but it will take a minute to answer.

On all these trips you made, such as the last one, who paid you? How did you get the money?

Mrs. MASSING. I was a paid Soviet agent. I was on a party salary.

Senator SMITH. Paid by the funds that came from Moscow?

Mrs. MASSING. Yes, indeed.

Senator SMITH. How did they reach you?

Mrs. MASSING. As a matter of fact, in New York I was for some time in charge of the money for our unit. How the money came from Moscow, I wouldn't quite know had I not been once, at the very early start of my career, a courier to bring money from Moscow to the French party. I mean, the money was brought by couriers, as I was one. How it was brought to New York, I don't know, because I didn't bring it. Somebody else did.

Senator FERGUSON. Who gave it to you in New York?

Mrs. MASSING. In New York, my superior, whoever it was at the time, Bill or Boris.

Senator FERGUSON. Was it in rubles or in dollars?

Mrs. MASSING. It was in dollars. As I said once before, rubles were just used in Russia. Even there they are not worth very much and never have been. It was the currency of the country that it was used in. In France, I took French francs.

Senator SMITH. Did any of the parties you have mentioned, in connection with this group you have testified to this morning, transmit to you directly or indirectly any funds for the uses of the party for the purposes you were serving?

Mrs. MASSING. You mean any of the people that I solicited?

Senator SMITH. That you testified about this morning.

Mrs. MASSING. No, except for the members of my "apparatus" which were Russians. No, nobody did.

Senator FERGUSON. Had you any doubt in your mind that Agnes Smedley was a Communist?

Mrs. MASSING. Of course not, Senator; I couldn't have had because Agnes was referred to, and this is the round that is so very hard for us to understand—we know when somebody is a Communist. A Communist knows when a Communist is a Communist. Agnes was one of us. Agnes was referred to in our circles as one of us. Whether she had a party membership, I don't know.

Senator FERGUSON. The reason I ask you this question is: Did you know that the War Department issued an order in effect clearing this woman?

Mrs. MASSING. No, indeed, and I was very much flabbergasted by it because I know very much about her role in China. I knew that she was very instrumental in helping Dr. Richard Sorge, who was one of the most outstanding Soviet spies. She helped him in introducing to him people and help him set up his "apparatus." She was a rather high functionary in Richard Sorge's outfit. I was very amazed at the withdrawal of the War Department when she threatened to sue.

Senator FERGUSON. You had no doubt, notwithstanding the War Department's clearance, that this woman was a Communist?

Mrs. MASSING. I had no doubt that she was an outstanding Communist. I do not know whether she ever took out a party membership.

Senator FERGUSON. I am not talking about that. I am not talking about a party card, or a booklet, as you said this morning. I am talking about who is an instrumentality of the Communists.

Mrs. MASSING. Yes, Senator. After her death, she willed all her possessions and her body to the Chinese Communists. I don't think anybody can doubt any longer she was a convinced Communist and an active Communist.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to introduce into the record at this time an excerpt from the New York Times of May 7, 1951, with the date line "San Francisco." It reads:

Agnes Smedley, pro-Red American writer who died in Oxford, England, exactly one year ago, was buried today in Peiping, the Chinese Red radio reported.

In accordance with her will, the Peiping broadcast said, her ashes were placed in the New Cemetery for Revolutionists at services attended by 800 Chinese Red notables.

Miss Smedley's will, probated in New York last year, bequeathed her estate to General Chu Teh, Chinese Red commander in chief.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be inserted.

AGNES SMEDLEY BURIED—PRO-RED WRITER IS INTERRED IN PEIPING YEAR AFTER DEATH

[From the New York Times, May 7, 1951]

SAN FRANCISCO, May 6.—Agnes Smedley, pro-Red American writer who died in Oxford, England, exactly 1 year ago, was buried today in Peiping, the Chinese Red radio reported.

In accordance with her will, the Peiping broadcast said, her ashes were placed in the New Cemetery for Revolutionists at services attended by 800 Chinese Red notables.

Miss Smedley's will, probated in New York last year, bequeathed her estate to General Chu-Teh, Chinese Red commander in chief.

The Red broadcast said that Miss Smedley's personal possessions, such as typewriter, camera, radio set, and correspondence with General Chu, was placed on exhibition in the hall of the Youth Palace.

Mr. MORRIS. I would like to show this letter to Mr. Mandel and ask him if he will identify it as a copy of a letter from the IPR files.

Mr. MANDEL. I identify this letter as one taken from the IPR files.

Mr. MORRIS. This is a letter signed "Agnes Smedley" and sent to the Institute of Pacific Relations, 129 East Fifty-second Street, New York City.

GENTLEMEN: I understand there is a system whereby the Red Cross can secure an exchange of prisoners. I therefore appeal to you to write officially in the name of your organization, to the American Red Cross, asking that Mr. Chen Han-seng * * *.

Mr. Chairman, may I recall that Chen Han-seng was identified in the first session here as a staff member of the IPR, a man who had worked on the inquiry series of the IPR and a man about whom Mr. Carter wrote to Mr. Motylev, a member of the Soviet IPR that he was writing under the pen name of Raymond D. Brooke.

Then we introduced in evidence at that time photostatic copies of Raymond D. Brooke's articles in the Far Eastern Spotlight which is a publication of the American Committee for Democratic Far Eastern Policy.

Resuming the letter—

* * * asking that Mr. Chen Han-seng and his wife be placed on the exchange list, and that you do all you can to get them out of Hong Kong. Chen Han-seng was not only one of your members, but he was the chief person in charge of the industrial cooperative office in Hong Kong. His wife is very ill. I doubt very much if they were among the Chinese enabled to leave Hong Kong for China during the fighting.

Toward the end of the letter it reads:

China is our ally. Chen Han-seng and his wife are among the most important men in the Far East. Holding the position he does, he would most certainly be most in danger from the Japanese.

That is dated January 31, 1942. It is written from Ojai, Calif.

I would like to introduce that in evidence.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be inserted in the record.

Please find time to write me a line about this. I understand that John Gunther ,like others, is trying to have people in Hong Kong placed on the prisoner-exchange lists. Surely, at such a moment in history, we will not let nationality alone determine our actions. China is our ally. Chen Han-seng and his wife are among the most important men in the Far East. Holding the position he does, he would most certainly, be most in danger from the Japanese.

Very sincerely yours,

AGNES SMEDLEY.

Mr. MORRIS. I would also like to introduce another letter and ask Mr. Mandel to identify this.

Mr. MANDEL. I identify this letter of January 14, 1939, as taken from the files of the Institute of Pacific Relations.

The CHAIRMAN. By whom is that signed?

Mr. MORRIS. This is from Edward C. Carter to Frederick V. Field at the institute address. It reads:

DEAR FRED: You may care to scan these two sets of inquiries: I, material from the Chinese campaign committee in London, including a letter from Miss Smedley; and II, two circular letters from Bates, of Nanking.

After you have scanned them will you pass them on in an envelope to Chen, Liu, Holland, Sheppard, and Mitchell.

I would like to introduce that.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be inserted in the record.

(The document referred to was marked "Exhibit No. 57" and is as follows:)

EXHIBIT No. 57

JANUARY 14, 1939.

Mr. FREDERICK V. FIELD,
129 East Fifty-second Street,
New York City.

DEAR FRED: You may care to scan these two sets of inquiries: I, material from the Chinese campaign committee in London, including a letter from Miss Smedley; and II, two circular letter from Bates of Nanking.

After you have scanned them will you pass them on in an envelope to Chen, Liu, Holland, Sheppard, and Mitchell.

Sincerely yours,

EDWARD C. CARTER.

Mr. MORRIS. The accompanying letter from Miss Smedley is not on that covering letter, I would like to note.

Mrs. Massing, do you know Harriet Lucy Moore?

Mrs. MASSING. I have met her socially in Moscow, probably once or twice, I am not certain. I don't know her well at all. I know of her. I know that her name figured in Moscow and in the American party, meaning that I might have heard it from Grace Maul and from Agnes, from people concerned with China, with the Far East, and I knew where she lived in Moscow.

Mr. MORRIS. Where did she live?

Mrs. MASSING. In the International Hotel.

Mr. MORRIS. Where is the International Hotel?

Mrs. MASSING. I am not absolutely certain whether she didn't live in the Hotel Lux. I went to many American parties in the Hotel Lux. It was the hotel in which only Comintern, foreign Comintern people lived, Comintern employees. The Hotel International was the hotel in which fellow travelers, or agents that were not supposed to be known as such, lived. For example, where Noel Field and Herta Field visited in Moscow in 1938 just before I left, in the spring of 1938. They lived in the Hotel International.

That meant that she was put up not where the regular Intourist people were but in the near party, the people that ought to be under cover. The Lux was the hotel for strict Comintern employees, foreign Comintern employees. For example, my sister lived in the Hotel Lux. Gerhart Eisler lived there.

Mr. MORRIS. You do not recall with particularity whether it was the International or the Lux?

Mrs. MASSING. It was one of the two; I do not.

Mr. MORRIS. When you heard discussion of Harriet Moore, was it in connection with her being a Communist?

Mrs. MASSING. Again I must say nobody said Harriet Moore is a Communist, but Harriet Moore was a name like Grace Maul. Nobody said Grace Maul was a Communist but she just was. You understand, it is difficult for me to say it in any other way. This is just how I heard her name referred to.

Mr. MORRIS. At this juncture, Mr. Chairman, may I mention, to be sure the committee understands, these names are all being introduced now while this witness is on the stand as people who are associated, people on the list of those associated with the Institute of Pacific Relations and that we would like an identification of these people as testimony goes along, and then there will be further development on their association with the IPR.

The CHAIRMAN. These are the names, as I understand it, that were identified by Mr. Carter when he was on the stand.

Mr. MORRIS. At least this is the list that we presented to Mr. Carter and the list has been made available to him.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Morris, it is about 12 o'clock now and the Senate will be in session. There is a very important vote to be taken this afternoon sometime.

You have gone along for 2 hours now. I do not think you can conclude with this witness from the appearance of your records here before you.

The chairman must be on the floor as soon as possible. I wonder if it is not possible to recess now and to take this witness up later.

Senator FERGUSON. I wish before we recess, for this record to show her naming her superiors in the order that she had them.

Mrs. MASSING. My Russian superiors?

Senator FERGUSON. In the United States.

Mrs. MASSING. Yes.

Senator SMITH. Mr. Chairman, if we are going to have another session, would that not be all right?

Senator FERGUSON. I would like to have it part of this record.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Morris advises me that he can conclude in 10 minutes.

Senator FERGUSON. If we could get those superiors.

The CHAIRMAN. I do not wish to rush him. I want him to get the evidence in as he wants it presented.

You will answer Senator Ferguson's question, please.

Mrs. MASSING. My first superior was Valentan Markin in New York.

My next superior was Bill. I knew him as Bill. His name, not his real name, of course—the passport he lived under in New York City was Grinke, Walter Grinke, G-r-i-n-k-e. It was a German name and I am sure it was not his real name, because he was a Russian.

My next superior was Boris. I knew him here under the name of Fred. His real name was Boris Bazorof, B-a-z-o-r-o—either "v" or "f." I am not sure.

That was all, because after Bazorof, Helen Zubelin, whom I knew as Helen, her real name being Elizabeth, took me to Moscow. These were my three superiors.

I had several Russian coworkers, of course, but these were my superiors.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, in connection with the last person we asked Mrs. Massing, Harriet Moore, I would like to quickly introduce in evidence six letters, which I ask Mr. Mandel to identify, as having been taken from the files of the Institute of Pacific Relations.

Senator FERGUSON. While he is identifying them, another question: Did you have plenty of money to operate with in your work here?

Mrs. MASSING. Money for Communists is not of much concern, really. I was on what is called the part maximum. Part max, it was called, as an abbreviation. Everybody working for the party or for near-party organizations would have the same amount of money which varied as to the country one lived in. It was enough to live on, yes.

Senator FERGUSON. And to travel on?

Mrs. MASSING. Of course, I had an expense account. My travels were paid. I had an expense account. Yes, of course.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I will now ask Mr. Mandel to identify these letters.

Mr. MANDEL. I identify those six letters as having come from the institute's files.

Mr. MORRIS. I will quickly identify them. The first is a memorandum on personnel in connection with Soviet studies, dated August 10, 1934, the last paragraph of which reads:

> The fourth group consists of the few people who are already familiar with the institute's record in the Soviet Union or who could be made so. Harriet Moore and Kathleen Barnes are about the only ones already familiar, and they both have the advantage of being good students who have not got the academic jitters about bolshevism. With Harriet, a further period of language study, which she may at present be contemplating, would probably be essential.

I would like to introduce that.

Senator FERGUSON. Who signs that?

Mr. MORRIS. It is unsigned. It is an IPR memorandum.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be inserted in the record.

(The document referred to was marked "Exhibit No. 58" and is as follows:)

EXHIBIT No. 58

(Confidential—not for distribution outside the office)

MEMORANDUM ON PERSONNEL IN CONNECTION WITH SOVIET STUDIES

AUGUST 10, 1934.

In connection with the folders on the Soviet Council and the memorandum on IPR work in the field which I am submitting to you today I would like to answer your memorandum of July 31 on the question of staff appointments in this connection.

The longer memorandum adequately states the reasons, I think, why the position should be supported jointly by the American Council and the Pacific Council. Whether it should be a full-time appointment or a part-time appointment depends on the scope of the work decided on. A really full program, such as outlined in that memorandum, would probably fill the waking hours of any one individual. A legitimate selection could be made for immediate purposes which would warrant the employment of a good reasearch worker on a half-time basis.

There are roughly four groups of people among whom someone could be found. We have information in the office on a very large percentage of those in each class who would be available, but I see no point in listing them here.

The first group is the emigre Russians. Among them can be found some who are not politically antipathetic to the new regime, and whose knowledge of Russian is far better than you will find anywhere else. On the other hand, their knowledge of the Soviet Union is less sound, and their understanding of the American end of the problem is very often weak. On the whole, I would advise you against any Russian.

The second group consists of the academic Russian scholars of American birth and parentage. This group includes such people as Bruce Hopper, whom you know, Mulford Martin, who is recommended highly by Robinson and Alva Johnson, Merle Fainsod, of the government department at Harvard, who is extremely able, I should judge, and a trained scholar, and several others. The disadvantages of this group are chiefly too: Most of them are already embarked on academic careers which they would probably be reluctant to interrupt (this would not apply to Martin, I believe), and they have all got the fingers-crossed attitude toward the Bolsheviks which is so much de rigueur in academic circles. This can be differently described as the scientific spirit or just good scholarly caution. It makes few friends in the Soviet Union. Moseley belongs in this group.

The third group is the graduating class at our summer school. I have no candidate from this group. Few of them are going to know Russian well enough to use it fast and accurately immediately, before they have ploughed through some graduate theses with it, and there is no single stand-out whom I have yet discovered among them.

The fourth group consists of the few people who are already familiar with the Institute's record in the Soviet Union or who could be made so. Harriet Moore and Kathleen Barnes are about the only ones already familiar, and they both have the advantage of being good students who have not got the academic jitters about bolshevism. With Harriet, a further period of language study, which she may at present be contemplating, would probably be essential. This could be arranged, however, or you could decide to start from the beginning and send some young person of promise to Moscow to train him for the job.

Mr. MORRIS. The second is a letter from Edward C. Carter to Frederick V. Field, dated August 31, 1935. It reads:

This is to invite you to participate in a secretariat staff conference that will be held at Sunset Farm, Lee, Mass., from the morning of Friday, October 18, to the evening of Monday, October 21.

I am hoping that amongst others the following can be present:* * *

and among the list of the nine people is listed the name of Harriet Moore.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be inserted in the record.

FREDERICK V. FIELD, ESQ.,
New York City.

DEAR FRED: This is to invite you to participate in a secretariat staff conference that will be held at Sunset Farm, Lee, Mass., from the morning of Friday, October 18, to the evening of Monday, October 21.

I am hoping that amongst others the following can be present: Escott Reid, Richard Pyke, Kate Mitchell, Leonard Wu, Kathleen Barnes, Elsie Fairfax-Cholmeley, Harriet Moore, W. L. Holland, and yourself.

If there are other members of the American Council whom you would like to have invited, I am, of course, eager to ask anyone who you nominate. The principal object of this conference will be program preparation for the California conference. I am hoping that nine-tenths of the time can be spent on the agenda, completely subordinating all questions of place, physical arrangements, etc.

Would you kindly let me know whether it would be convenient for you to reserve these dates.

Sincerely yours,

EDWARD C. CARTER.

Mr. MORRIS. I introduce a list of the officers and committees included in the annual report of the American Council of the Institute of Pacific Relations, Inc., 1940–41.

Among the board of trustees listed in that year was a Miss Harriet L. Moore.

On the executive committee for that year there is the name of Harriet L. Moore. And on the nominating committee in 1941 there appears Miss Harriet L. Moore, chairman, Edward C. Carter, ex officio, Frederick V. Field, Jerome D. Greene, and Ray Lyman Wilbur, ex officio.

In this particular year she was a member of the board of trustees, a member of the executive committee, and chairman of the nominating committee.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be inserted in the record.

Mr. MORRIS. I would like to also introduce into the record a letter from Mr. Frederick V. Field, dated August 22, 1939, to Miss Harriet

The CHAIRMAN. It will be inserted.

(The document referred to was marked "Exhibit No. 61" and is as follows:)

EXHIBIT No. 61

AUGUST 22, 1939.

Miss HARRIET MOORE,
American Russian Institute,
New York City.

DEAR HARRIET: I wonder if you would be interested in writing a little piece for Amerasia based on the enclosed propaganda blurb from Kinney of the SMR? Incidentally, would you return the blurb for our propaganda files?

What I have in mind is something roughly comparable, although I hope better done and a little more elaborate than the piece I wrote on Japanese propaganda in the Topics in Brief for our October 1938 issue.

This present item on the Manchoukuo-Mongolian border fighting of the summer seems to me particularly vicious because they use the names of at least two pretty decent American correspondents to support their allegations. I doubt very much, for instance, whether Steele of the Chicago Daily News ever filed a dispatch to the effect that "the Japanese aerial force was far superior to that of the Soviet and that the bravery and morals of the Japanese-Manchoukuo troops far excelled those of the Soviet-Mongolian forces." This, of course, may be true, but I am sure that neither Morris nor Steele said so, not to speak of the eight other correspondents mentioned. It would be interesting to compare what Kinney says these men said with what they actually sent their newspapers. Furthermore, it would be interesting to compare his account of the border fighting with what appears to have taken place. Incidentally, what did take place? That, too, would be pretty good news.

I really wish you would try your hand at this either in a Topics in Brief of three to five hundred words or in an article of a thousand or more. In answering this note as to whether or not you will agree to write the article you might also attempt a brief paragraph telling me the inner and outer significance of the Soviet-German trade treaty and accompanying Russian editorials.

Sincerely yours,

FREDERICK V. FIELD.

Mr. MORRIS. Here is a letter from Edward C. Carter to Dr. V. E. Motylev, September 11, 1939, Pacific Institute, 20 Razin Street, Moscow, from Sunset Farm, Lee, Mass., in which Mr. Carter discusses a forthcoming article by Harriet Moore on Soviet-German Relations, which was to appear in the Virginia Quarterly.

It says:

It is the best analysis that has appeared in this country thus far.

That is on the question of Soviet-German relations.

I would be grateful if you would let me have your criticisms of it.

I would like that in the record.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be inserted in the record.

Dr. V. E. MOTYLEV,
Pacific Institute, Moscow, U. S. S. R.

DEAR MOTYLEV: A copy of Miss Harriet Moore's article on Soviet-German relations will doubtless reach you in due course, but as second-class mail is sometimes delayed I am enclosing a copy herewith. It is the best analysis that has appeared in this country thus far. I would be grateful if you would let me have your criticisms of it.

I have just been asked to write on this subject for the Virginia Quarterly. My decision will depend a good deal on whether I can supplement my present information with fuller documentation. Perhaps you can help me with this. I have, of course, Stalin's speech in March, Molotov's speech in May, and also Molotov's more recent speech of August 31. You will know what material I most need in addition in order to round out the picture for a really complete and objective treatment, in the event of my deciding to accept the Virginia Quarterly's invitation.

With kindest regards, I am,

Sincerely yours,

EDWARD C. CARTER.

Mr. MORRIS. We have a letter dated November 28, 1942, from Mr. Edward C. Carter to Mr. William W. Lockwood, listing the rapporteurs for the Mont Tremblant Conference, which is the biennial conference of the Institute of Pacific Relations, as follows:

Rapporteurs: Harriet Moore, Frederick V. Field, W. W. Lockwood, William Stone, Frank Coe, J. O. M. Broek, Karl Pelzer.

It shows Miss Moore was a rapporteur at that particular conference.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be inserted in the record.

Mr. WILLIAM W. LOCKWOOD,
American Council, I. P. R., New York City.

DEAR BILL: Because of the increased membership of all the groups attending the Mount Tremblant Conference and because of the limited accommodations at the lodge, it has been necessary for us to limit our usual working staff. We would greatly appreciate it, therefore, if you could indicate which of your members and secretaries could be asked to act as rapporteurs, recorders, or stenographic secretaries and clerical workers. The following come to mind in each of the above categories:

Rapporteurs: Harriet Moore, Frederick V. Field, W. W. Lockwood, William Stone, Frank Coe, J. O. M. Broek, Karl Pelzer.

Recorders: Harriet Moore, J. O. M. Broek, Karl Pelzer, Carolyn Kizer, Miriam S. Farley, Dorothy Borg, Mrs. Eltenton, Fay Smith, Wilma Fairbank, Catherine Porter, Katrine Greene, Elizabeth Downing.

Secretaries: Katrine Greene, Elizabeth Downing.

Since the international secretariat staff is planning to leave New York December 1, I would greatly appreciate if you would answer this letter directly to Miss Hilda Austern, Mont Tremblant, Province of Quebec, Canada.

Sincerely yours,

EDWARD C. CARTER.

NOVEMBER 28, 1942.

Memorandum to: ECC (copy to HA).
From: WWL.

In answer to your letter of today's date, I would like to submit the following suggestions on rapporteurs, recorders, and secretaries for Mont Tremblant.

Rapporteurs: Harriet Moore, Frederick V. Field, W. W. Lockwood, William To Stone, Frank Coe, J. O. M. Broek, Karl J. Pelzer, James Shoemaker, and Brooks Emeny.

Recorders: Harriet Moore, Karl J. Pelzer, Carolyn Kizer, Miriam S. Farley, Dorothy Borg, Mrs. Dolly Eltenton, Fayette Smith, Wilma Fairbank, Catherine Porter, Katrine Greene, Virginia C. Lockwood, Edith Field, Mrs. B. H. Kizer.

Secretaries. Katrine Greene, Rose Yardumian (and perhaps Mrs. Eltention; we shall have to check when she arrives).

As I have already told Hilda Austern, most of the staff will of course be available for miscellaneous staff work at Mont Tremblant, as needed.

Mr. MORRIS. I would like also to make reference to an excerpt from Windows on the Pacific, which is the biennial report of the American Council of the Institute of Pacific Relations, and this reads:

When Harriet L. Moore who served most ably as acting secretary for the year following William Lockwood's departure for the China war theater, resigned in the spring of 1944 to resume her duties as research director of the American Russian Institute, she was replaced by Raymond Dennett.

I would like to introduce that excerpt in the record.

The CHAIRMAN. That is an excerpt?

Mr. MORRIS. The whole volume will be put in the record by reference.

Mr. MORRIS. Mrs. Massing, do you know Guenther Stein?

Mrs. MASSING. Yes; I met him in Frankfort-am-Main, just very casually. I didn't know him very well.

Mr. MORRIS. What did you know about him?

Mrs. MASSING. I knew he was in China. I knew he belonged to Richard Sorge's apparatus in China. I knew he was a coworker. I wasn't told he belonged to the apparatus but working with Richard Sorge I knew what it meant.

Mr. MORRIS. To what extent did you know that Guenther Stein was a member of the Communist organization?

Mrs. MASSING. I only knew it to the extent that he was a coworker of Dr. Sorge. Knowing that Dr. Sorge was an apparatchik of old standing, one of the most famous apparatchiks, I assumed that Guenther Stein was an apparatchik. Whether he was a Communist, I wouldn't know, but he certainly was with Richard Sorge.

Mr. MORRIS. Did you know Corliss Lamont at all?

Mrs. MASSING. I knew him quite well.

Mr. MORRIS. Was Corliss Lamont a Communist?

Mrs. MASSING. He didn't tell me he was a Communist, but everybody knows he was a Communist, as everybody knows that Frederick Vanderbilt Field or Earl Browder is a Communist. I haven't seen his party membership.

Mr. MORRIS. When did you meet him?

Mrs. MASSING. When I first got here in 1926.

The CHAIRMAN. What was that last answer? "He didn't tell me he was a Communist, but everybody knows it"?

Mrs. MASSING. He didn't tell me.

The CHAIRMAN. Then you mentioned Field, and who else?

Mrs. MASSING. Earl Browder. What I mean to say is it isn't necessary for Earl Browder to tell me he is a Communist, because everyone knows it. That was true for Corliss Lamont. I met him several times socially. I saw him in Moscow in 1937 and I had a rather significant little meeting with him there because I wanted to send a message to Roger Baldwin, who was a friend of mine, to let Roger Baldwin know I was being kept in Moscow, hoping that he would arouse, if I should not get back, public opinion.

When I spoke to Corliss about the situation explaining to him what was going on in Moscow, the purges, that I was being held against my will, he listened to me. Obviously, he did not believe me.

He got back to the United States, saw Roger Baldwin, and said to him, "You know, Roger, I saw Hede. My, she has gone sour."

That was the impact of my great distress, that I told him I was being held a prisoner virtually and all he understood was I had gone sour. That is what he told Roger Baldwin.

Mr. MORRIS. I would like to introduce into the record an exchange of correspondence between Guenther Stein and W. L. Holland.

Mr. Mandel, will you identify this as having come from the records of the IPR?

Mr. MANDEL. I identify these telegrams and letters.

Mr. MORRIS. This is a letter dated February 20, 1942. It is from William Holland to Guenther Stein at the Press Hostel, Chungking, China. Mr. Holland asks:

Cable whether willing act as Chungking correspondent Institute Pacific Relations until May 1 supplying substantial fortnightly political economic reports similar China air-mail honorarium 75 monthly.

It is signed: William Holland.

One of the articles in the correspondence is a cable which Stein writes to the Institute of Pacific Relations with the one word, "Accepting," dated February 27, 1942.

I would like to introduce that.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be inserted in the record.

Mr. MORRIS. Do you know Olga Lang?

Mrs. MASSING. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. Was she a Communist?

Mrs. MASSING. Olga was the wife of Karl Wittfogel. She was a Russian. She was a representative of Trud, a Russian newspaper. She attended a unit of it, the Communist unit, of the dwelling that we lived in which was the Friedrich Ebert Sieedlung. I think she was a Communist.

Mr. MORRIS. What do you mean you think she was?

Mrs. MASSING. She attended all party meetings. She worked at the Russian Embassy sometime. She was a Russian that had come as a correspondent of a Russian paper. Her associates were merely amongst Communists. I think she is a Communist. She was a Communist at the time.

Mr. MORRIS. She was at the time?

Mrs. MASSING. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. You know she was?

Mrs. MASSING. Yes. I don't know whether she is today.

Mr. MORRIS. What is the nature of the publication, Trud?

Mrs. MASSING. I couldn't exactly tell you what it was. I don't know. It is a Russian name. I never read it.

Mr. MORRIS. It is an official Russian publication?

Mrs. MASSING. Yes, a Soviet publication.

Mr. MORRIS. An employee of that is, in all likelihood, loyal to the Soviet organization?

Mrs. MASSING. Indeed.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you know of any members of the apparatus or agents for the Soviet Union, or the Communist Party, as we understand it here in America, who were not Communists but only for hire? Would you take in somebody who did not believe in the philosophy and just pay them for what they did as agents?

Mrs. MASSING. No, not that I know of, not in my time.

Senator FERGUSON. All were believers in the philosophy?

Mrs. MASSING. There were variations. There were shadings as to the intensity of belief, but they would believe.

Senator FERGUSON. You did not just go out and hire a person as a stool pigeon and pay them a certain consideration for some work?

Mrs. MASSING. No, not in my time.

Mr. MORRIS. Mrs. Massing, What steps have you taken to inform the American authorities of the evidence you have presented to this committee this morning?

Mrs. MASSING. I have spoken to the FBI at very great length. So has my husband, Paul Massing. I have testified before the grand jury twice and I was a witness in the Hiss trial. I have been terribly misrepresented and my thoughts were not clarified. So I decided to write an article series which I did, together with Eugene Lyons. Due to the limited space, I again felt it did not explain enough the motivation and the philosophy of Communists of my type. I decided to write a book which was published this March.

Senator FERGUSON. Are you a Communist now?

Mrs. MASSING. No, I am not a Communist now.

Senator FERGUSON. When did you drop the philosophy of communism?

Mrs. MASSING. The philosophy of communism I dropped much earlier than I left the party. I was critical for many years. I left the party and my job in 1938.

Mr. MORRIS. Mrs. Massing, have you taken any other steps so the American public will understand what the facts are here?

Mrs. MASSING. I am now lecturing to groups and I write whenever I can.

Mr. MORRIS. There is just one thing I would like to introduce into the record.

There was a series of three articles written by Olga Lang for Pacific Affairs and for Far Eastern Survey. One is in Pacific Affairs, 1940, Bibliography of Recent Russian Literature on Buriat Mongolia, pages 45–62; a review of Soviet Islands of the Pacific, by M. A. Sergeev, pages 110–111.

There is a review by Olga Lang on Chinese Women: Yesterday and Today, by Florence Ayscough, pages 212–214.

There is an article on The Good Iron of the New Chinese Army, pages 20–33 in Pacific Affairs, 1939.

There is also a book Chinese Family and Society, Yale University Press, 1946, under the auspices of the Institute of Pacific Relations and the Institute of Social Research.

I would like the record to show that was Miss Lang's contribution under the auspices of the Institute of Pacific Relations.

Senator SMITH. I want to ask Mrs. Massing this question: there has cropped up in the hearing this morning the names of five men, which names have been used before, whether justly or unjustly, I am not here to say—Carter, Field, Lattimore, Stone, and Currie.

Did you ever have any conferences with any of those men?

Mrs. MASSING. No. I have met some of them socially. I have met Mr. Lattimore just once and I have met Mr. Field just once but not in any working connection.

Senator SMITH. Did you ever meet Mr. Carter?

Mrs. MASSING. No.

Senator SMITH. Mr. Stone or Mr. Currie, you never met?

Mrs. MASSING. I think I met Mr. Stone once.

Senator SMITH. Under what circumstances?

Mrs. MASSING. Also socially through Noel Field.

Senator SMITH. You mean in Noel Field's apartment?

Mrs. MASSING. No, it wasn't in Noel Field's apartment.

If I remember, I think it was at the World Fair where Noel Field came here to represent the League of Nations. I believe I met him. It might have been in Europe. I do not remember. I only met him once.

Senator SMITH. Did you meet any of these people in Washington at any time on your trips here?

Mrs. MASSING. No.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you ever try to recruit anyone else beside the two you have named or the three that worked for our Government, either in the State Department or any place else?

Mrs. MASSING. No. I recruited people from other walks of life but not the State Department.

Senator FERGUSON. Other Government positions?

Mrs. MASSING. No.

Senator FERGUSON. But from other walks of life?

Mrs. MASSING. Right.

Senator FERGUSON. Did they have any connection with the IPR?

Mrs. MASSING. No.

Senator FERGUSON. You have told us all you know about the people who were connected with that institute?

Mrs. MASSING. Yes.

Senator FERGUSON. As I understand it, Mr. Chairman, it was your purpose, Mr. Morris, to bring out just the names. For that reason I am not going to ask you who the others were that you recruited if they were not connected with the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. There is one question I would like to ask: On how many occasions did you, as a courier, carry microfilms from this country abroad?

Mrs. MASSING. I am not certain whether it was 9 or 10 times, but about that amount.

The CHAIRMAN. Those microfilms were given to you by your superior or some person here for you to carry to get to the Russian agents?

Mrs. MASSING. They were always given to me, either by a superior or by the assistant to my superior who would be a Russian.

The CHAIRMAN. To whom did you deliver them?

Mrs. MASSING. I always delivered them to a Russian. I never knew who he was. I would meet him for 10 minutes, 5 minutes, and that is all I knew of him. The identification was always arranged in New York.

The CHAIRMAN. That is all I have.

Senator FERGUSON. It would be some means as you have indicated, a match box, or something else?

Mrs. MASSING. No; it wasn't. It was always a hotel room. I would be called from downstairs by a specific name and since nobody else could know that I was in this hotel room at that date, it was always the right man.

Senator FERGUSON. Would you be registered?

Mrs. MASSING. Yes. Under a different name, naturally.

Senator FERGUSON. That name would be called?

Mrs. MASSING. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. When did you want to meet again, Mr. Morris?

Mr. MORRIS. Tuesday, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. We will reconvene on Tuesday, at 10.

(Whereupon, at 12:20 p. m., Thursday, August 2, 1951, the hearing was recessed until 10 a. m., Tuesday, August 7, 1951.)

INSTITUTE OF PACIFIC RELATIONS

TUESDAY, AUGUST 7, 1951

UNITED STATES SENATE, SUBCOMMITTEE TO INVESTIGATE THE ADMINISTRATION OF THE INTERNAL SECURITY ACT AND OTHER INTERNAL SECURITY LAWS OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
Washington, D. C.

The subcommittee met at 10 a. m., pursuant to recess, in room 424, Senate Office Building, Senator Pat McCarran (chairman) presiding.

Present: Senators McCarran, Smith, Ferguson, and Jenner.

Also present: Senator McCarthy; J. G. Sourwine, committee counsel; Robert Morris, subcommittee counsel; Benjamin Mandel, director of research.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will come to order.

During the last few hearings we have been looking at the Institute of Pacific Relations and some of the personnel through the eyes of a former general in the Soviet military intelligence and a woman who was working for an international apparatus.

Today we have two outstanding scholars and professors in the field of oriental studies who will impart their somewhat different perspectives.

The first witness, Prof. Karl August Wittfogel, will discuss events of the 1930's and 1940's as they relate to the Institute of Pacific Relations.

In order to understand fully the events of the 1930's and how they have a direct bearing on the world, counsel has been asked, as much as possible, to relate the events of the 1930's as they occurred to the present.

Professor Wittfogel, you are a member of the faculty of Columbia University?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. I am a member of the faculty of the University of Washington in Seattle, but my headquarters are at Columbia.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee, at the outset, wants to express its gratitude to you for the information that you have given and that you will give us here. The United States of America is fighting for its life, is fighting for its existence, and those who, like yourself, occupy important places, are to be commended for the courage and the forthrightness that you display in coming to this committee and giving us facts.

You are here under subpena. The country will owe you a debt of gratitude for truth regardless of what may be the result. The Nation owes a debt of gratitude to all who tell the truth in these matters regardless of who may be affected.

Will you kindly stand and be sworn?

You do solemnly swear in the testimony that you are about to give before the Subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary of the United States Senate, it will be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, so help you God?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. I do.

TESTIMONY OF KARL AUGUST WITTFOGEL, NEW YORK, N. Y.

The CHAIRMAN. You may proceed, Mr. Morris.

Mr. MORRIS. Give your full name and address to the reporter please.

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Karl A. Wittfogel, 420 Riverside Drive, New York.

Mr. MORRIS. What is your present position, Dr. Wittfogel?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. I am professor of Chinese history at the University of Washington and director of the Chinese history project sponsored by this university together with Columbia University, where the project is located.

Mr. MORRIS. How long have you held those positions?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. I was made professor at the University of Washington in 1947 and I have been director of the Chinese history project since 1949.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you give us a short outline of your degrees and your educational training?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. I was born in Germany and educated there in high schools and universities and took my Ph. D. in the year 1928 at the University of Frankfort.

Mr. MORRIS. What are your other academic achievements?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. I worked in the field of Chinese economic history from the middle of 1920 on and before leaving Germany I wrote a comprehensive study of Chinese economics and society.

I continued working in the field of Chinese institutional history in America, in China, where I lived from 1935 to 1937 and ever since.

Mr. MORRIS. Where were you born?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. I was born in Woltersdorf in the province of Hanover in northern Germany in 1896.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you tell us briefly about your political experiences in Germany prior to the time that you came to this country, Dr. Wittfogel?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. I became a student and grew up in the chaotic times of the war and after-war situation of the First World War, and was a Socialist student in the period after.

I joined the Communist Party in 1920 and was a fee-paying member of the Communist Party until the winter of 1932 or the beginning of 1933, when Hitler came to power. I had disagreed with the party.

I may say more about that later, but I had disagreed about a number of things, including the attitude toward Hitler, who I considered a grave danger to German life and to European life. Because of my strong attitude against the Hitler movement, I was imprisoned and I was in several concentration camps in the year 1933.

Mr. MORRIS. How long were you in a concentration camp?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. I was detained altogether for about 9 months. In the winter I was released, I left early in 1934, passed through England, where I spent about 8 months, and came to this country.

Mr. MORRIS. Dr. Wittfogel, after you left the organized Communist Party, did you remain, psychologically speaking, within the Communist periphery?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Yes. If you emphasize both, the psychology of the matter and the periphery, namely, the border-line situation, but in form, indeed, yes.

Mr. MORRIS. In other words, even though you were no longer an organized member of the Communist Party, you were hailed and welcomed by members of that party; is that right?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. That is correct.

Mr. MORRIS. You had minor differences with the party on which you retained your independence?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. The difference turned out to be much bigger than it seemed at that time. What seemed to be academic differences became a No. 1 controversy and the ideas which made me split away now are considered the No. 1 heresy in the Soviet Union.

At that time, it looked indeed that way. Also, my difference in attitude about the Hitler movement was conducted in such a way that although I was bitter about this ever since, I still continued to stay in the fringe of the Communist movement after I left Germany.

Mr. SOURWINE. Doctor, did you at that time, in 1934 or at the end of 1933, take any formal action to renounce the Communist Party or to sever your connection with the Communist Party?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. No.

Mr. SOURWINE. Did you do anything which would have served notice to your Communist friends and acquaintances you were leaving the party or severing your relationship with it?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. No; I did not.

Mr. MORRIS. Dr. Wittfogel, I realize it is a difficult thing, since we are dealing with a tapering trend, but could you give us a date at which your break with the Communist periphery was really complete?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Before answering this, I would like to go back to the last question.

Mr. MORRIS. By all means.

Dr. WITTFOGEL. I know that persons going to another country very often, or as a rule, when they wanted to take up or continue their Communist activities, reapplied. I did not. I made no effort, neither did the other side make any effort, to reenlist me here.

I was considered not a very, or shall I say, rather an obviously doubtful case. I know there existed minority Communists, minority groups in this country. I was never asked to join officially the German Communist group. Let me say, shyness was mutual.

Mr. MORRIS. Then we come to the next question: Do you recall it?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. You asked me about the time table.

Mr. MORRIS. If you could fix a date. I realize this is a tapering conclusion, but could you fix a date where you really made a direct break with all your Communist friends?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. There are in a gradual development points of climax. I would say from the late twenties on, the difference between me and the Communist movement in the key theoretical field became obvious.

In 1932, I was called, with great dismay, a man who believed in the objectivity of science, which may sound queer in this country, which may be a compliment, but coming from the Soviets, it was a very strong form of disapproval.

During the coming of Hitler, my attitude toward the Communist movement became one of great bitterness about the situation.

So far as I could see, it brought Hitler to power in Germany. I had the feeling when I came to England and America these are not people who are proper leaders of a decent world labor movement. However, and I think I shared this with many people, not only in this country but in other countries—I mean this situation was being shared. I had been brought up as a young Socialist. I thought that there is practically everything wrong with this movement and with this country—the U. S. S. R.—that this country is the beginning of a new Socialist type of life, and as long as I had that belief I was still attached in a certain way. I was what I would call an ideological cripple. I couldn't move. I thought there was something which was nowhere else.

Mr. MORRIS. Roughly, what year was that?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. This conclusion I reached around 1936 or 1937. I came back to this country. Among friends I said it quite clearly; but when I came back to this country I found here the united front at its height and everybody was around everybody else's neck or arm, or whatever it was.

I had continued arguments, and particularly in that inner group we are dealing with, people like Jaffe—I still continued to have my connections in this group, talking less and less about certain things, becoming more angry and critical about others, but only in the year 1939 did I finally break connections with people whom I considered Communists.

Mr. MORRIS. That was in 1939?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Right; the summer of 1939.

Mr. MORRIS. While you were an organized Communist, did you ever encounter Dr. Chao-ting Chi?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you tell us the circumstances?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. It was in the summer of 1929. I lived in Frankfort-am-Main. There was convoked a Second Congress of the League Against Imperialism. This congress brought people to Europe from all parts of the world.

You may remember at the first congress Mr. Nehru was present. There was a Chinese group, and I remember very clearly Mr. Chi. He wasn't a doctor yet. I had long talks with him.

Mr. MORRIS. Would his appearance at that conference indicate to you he was a Communist?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. He came from the Comintern in Moscow. He had been working there. Usually the people who work there are not members of the YMCA.

Mr. MORRIS. Did you say working at the Comintern?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, at this point may I relate this name, Dr. Chi, has been coming up throughout the hearings.

Here Dr. Wittfogel has encountered him as a Comintern man in 1929.

We previously had testimony that Dr. Chi, who is the presently proposed Chinese Communist delegate to UNESCO, was the person who was instrumental in bringing Mr. Frederick V. Field's registering as a foreign agent for four Chinese Communist principals. That was in 1950.

We have also had evidence introduced into the record that Mr. Holland has referred to this present Dr. Chi in Communist China, and I am quoting, "Chi may well prove to be one of our more influential friends in China." That is dated February 10, 1950.

We have also had testimony of Dr. Chi's long association with the Institute of Pacific Relations here in the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. From what did you read that excerpt?

Mr. MORRIS. That was a letter, dated February 10, 1950, from Mr. Holland, which we have already introduced into the record. It was introduced as exhibit No. 1–A, at the open hearing of July 25, 1951, testimony of E. C. Carter, page 18.

Even though, Mr. Chairman, we are dealing with something here now at this particular time—we are going to bring it down to date—it is important we stress these things about Dr. Chi being, in 1929, a Comintern man. I would like to make that point in response to your opening statement.

The CHAIRMAN. The exhibit to which you refer is already in evidence and part of the record.

Dr. WITTFOGEL. May I just say something? In order to be permitted to work in the Comintern, which is the headquarters of the Communist movement, you have to be not only a rank-and-file member of the movement but a very well trained and extremely well selected man.

The CHAIRMAN. Let me get that a little bit clearer. You are referring now to the Comintern. The Comintern is centered in Moscow?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. The Comintern is the nucleus or center of the Communist Party?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. The Communist Parties of the world.

The CHAIRMAN. You say that anyone who would work in the Comintern, as Dr. Chi had been working in the Comintern, must be not only one of the rank and file but must be quite qualified and highly trusted?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Mandel, I wonder if you would put into the record what position Dr. Chi had in the United States during the war with respect to the United States Government?

Mr. MANDEL. I read from a letter addressed to Mrs. Dudley Stuart Blossom, from Edward C. Carter, dated August 1, 1941.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the source of that letter?

Mr. MANDEL. This is taken from the Institute of Pacific Relations files, and it states here, referring to Dr. Chi, who—went with our best wishes on the same plane to become General Secretary of the American-British-Chinese Currency Stabilization Fund of United States, $95,000,000.

Mr. MORRIS. When they say "on the same plane," what is the reference, Mr. Mandel?

Mr. MANDEL. This was on the same plane with Mr. Lattimore.

Mr. MORRIS. Who had been appointed what?

Mr. MANDEL. Envoy to Chiang Kai-shek's government.

The CHAIRMAN. Appointed an envoy from what country?

Mr. MORRIS. Does it give a description of his position there?

Mr. MANDEL. I will read from the letter preceding the previous quote:

You doubtless know that on President Roosevelt's nomination, Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek invited Owen Lattimore to go to Chungking as his personal political adviser. Lattimore arrived in Chungking 10 days ago. Another member of the International Secretariat, Dr. Ch'ao-ting Chi, went with our best wishes on the same plane.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to relate here is an event in 1939, which has a direct bearing on present-day events.

The CHAIRMAN. The letter from which you are reading, is that in the file at this time? If so, what is its number?

Mr. MANDEL. It has not been introduced.

Mr. MORRIS. I would like to introduce this letter, from which Mr. Mandel has read into the record as the next exhibit.

The CHAIRMAN. Let me ask a question here.

Mr. Mandel, in regard to those excerpts that you have read, where did you secure them?

Mr. MANDEL. From the files of the Institute of Pacific Relations as turned over to us from the organization.

The CHAIRMAN. It may be inserted in the record and marked as designated.

(The document referred to was marked "Exhibit No. 66" and is as follows:)

EXHIBIT No. 66

AUGUST 1, 1941.

Mrs. DUDLEY STUART BLOSSOM,
South Euclid, Ohio.

DEAR Mrs. BLOSSOM: Since I last saw you, four governments have recognized the IPR's achievements and the high quality of IPR personnel by the following appointments.

You doubtless know that on President Roosevelt's nomination, Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek invited Owen Lattimore to go to Chungking as his personal political adviser. Lattimore arrived in Chungking 10 days ago. Another member of the International Secretariat, Dr. Ch'ao-ting Chi, went with our best wishes on the same plane to become general secretary of the American-British-Chinese Currency Stabilization Fund of United States, $95,000,000. Here we have a case of outstanding services of the IPR—in that of Lattimore, an American to the Chinese Government and in that of Chi, a Chinese to the American, British, and Chinese Governments. A former member of the Secretariat, Irving Friedman, for whom I secured an appointment and an opportunity to study India as an employee of the Indian Government trade commissioner in New York, has now been given an important research position in the Treasury in Washington, one for which he is highly qualified.

Officers in the Army, Navy, Federal Research Bank, Department of Commerce, and the Office of Price Administration and Civilian Supplies are asking for and getting substantial help from our research staff. The Office of the Export Control Administration recently asked for the full-time service of all the American Council research staff for a long period. We had to persuade that office that our staff could render a greater service by continuing its work here as a well-balanced, experienced research group rather than by moving en bloc to Washington, where its services would be available only to a single Government department.

Another demand of a different kind has been made upon us. Mr. Henry R. Luce, Mr. Wendell L. Willkie, and Mr. James G. Blaine have asked me to serve as chairman of the disbursements committee which is making a very thoroughgoing survey of China's needs and how the $5,000,000 fund, if raised, can best be spent for maximum relief and at the same time to contribute to long-range reconstruction.

All of the foregoing is for your private information, for part of it is obviously not for general circulation.

This service to governments has not, happily, thus far lessened our service to business groups, the press, and our university and secondary-school constituency. The demands for institute services from all these groups is greater than ever before, and I think we are furnishing more help in all these directions than ever before.

Nor has the international work of the IPR throughout the world been reduced by the war excepting in the case of France and Holland. In the case of Holland nearly all of the activities have been transferred to Batavia, where Van Mook, who has been the principal negotiator with Yoshizawa, has been the IPR leader. (Interestingly enough, Van Mook and Yoshizawa were members of the same round table for a fortnight during the IPR conference at Yosemite.)

While Prince Konoyo has been Premier, Ushiba, the chief IPR secretary in Japan, has acted as his private secretary. While Ushiba has been helping the Premier, Saionji, the grandson of the Genro, has acted as chief secretary of the IPR in Tokyo, save for the period of Matsuoka's visit to Europe. Saionji accompanied the Foreign Minister on his fantastic round of visits to Hitler, Mussolini, and Stalin.

Bruce Turner, for many years secretary of the IPR in New Zealand, has just come to Washington with a member of the New Zealand Cabinet and will shortly be going to London to help get another New Zealand Cabinet officer there.

The Royal Institute in London has recently very greatly augmented its studies of the Far East. The Far Eastern program of the Canadian and Australian institutes is more fundamental and better supported than at any period in the past.

In view of the war emergency and the exceptional service which the institute is asked to render at this time, I am wondering whether you could not consider making a special and nonrecurring gift of $250 to the American Council sometime before the 1st of September.

Sincerely yours,

EDWARD C. CARTER, Acting Secretary.

Mr. MORRIS. Were you in England in 1934 while you were en route to the United States?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. I was.

Mr. MORRIS. Did you encounter any Institute of Pacific Relations personnel in England at that time?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Yes; I met Mr. Carter.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you describe the circumstances of your meeting Mr. Carter?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. Is that Mr. Edward C. Carter?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you describe the circumstances of your meeting Edward C. Carter in England in 1934, Dr. Wittfogel?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. The Institute of Social Research in Frankfurt am Main, which had belonged to the university, and which, like several other institutes of social studies, had been closed by Hitler, had gone to America, and was then located at Columbia.

A member of that institute contacted the Institute of Pacific Relations because it was my plan to go to China. When Mr. Carter passed through England, I was notified that I might come and see him.

The CHAIRMAN. Where were you then?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. I was living in England.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you relate the circumstances of your visit with Mr. Carter at that time, Doctor?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. I think I met him in Chatham House, the Royal Institute of International Affairs.

Mr. SOURWINE. Before Dr. Wittfogel goes forward with that, may I clarify one thing?

Is it the fact, Doctor, that the contact had been made with the Institute of Pacific Relations, or with Mr. Carter, by someone in your behalf and that you were meeting him as an applicant for a position, or a connection with the Institute of Pacific Relations?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Exactly.

Mr. MORRIS. Who was that contact?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. This was Mr. Julian Gumperz, who at that time lived in New York.

Mr. MORRIS. Dr. Wittfogel, will you relate the circumstances of your visit with Mr. Carter at that time?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. I came to see him. Mr. Carter was there with two or three lady secretaries. After I had introduced myself, Mr. Carter asked me a question which embarrassed me no end, or more puzzled me than embarrassed me.

This was his first question: "Dr. Wittfogel, are you a member of the German Communist Party?"

I was not quite accustomed to this kind of thing, and I thought maybe in America everything is different from anywhere else.

I found out later in regard to this question, it was not frequently repeated here. It was a more individual thing.

I answered, "I was, but I am not now," whereupon Mr. Carter smiled somewhat and said, "Well, in any case, you are not a member of the Chinese Communist Party."

Mr. MORRIS. Dr. Wittfogel, did he have the impression that you were still friendly with the German Communist Party?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. We did not go further into this.

Mr. SOURWINE. Mr. Morris, Dr. Wittfogel has already testified at that time and subsequent to that time he had done nothing overtly which would give anyone any notice he had broken with the Communist Party.

Mr. MORRIS. Is that so?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. So, at that time, when you told Mr. Carter that you had been a member of the German Communist Party, he had reason to believe that was the atmosphere in which you were presently discussing the Institute of Pacific Relations?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. I do not know what was in his mind. It is a sheer guess, I would say, and that smile unfortunately no television has preserved for eternity.

I had the feeling he didn't believe me, even the fact I technically was no longer a member of the party. I did not discuss it with him.

Mr. MORRIS. His only reply was, "At least you are not a member of the Chinese Communist Party"?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. That is right.

Mr. MORRIS. While you were in England, did you ever meet Michael Greenberg?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. I was in Cambridge. I met him there.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you tell us the circumstances?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. I saw him there among English Communist friends and he was, according to the general attitude toward him and his own behavior, an organized Communist.

Mr. MORRIS. You met Michael Greenberg at that time as a Communist?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. I hadn't seen his card, but I had seen him under circumstances which would indicate as clearly as you can in this way that this was his position.

Mr. MORRIS. So you had assumed he was a member of the English Communist Party at that time?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. I certainly did assume so. I assumed so later when I met him here during the time of the pact when I was very surprised this man was connected with Owen Lattimore in Pacific Affairs as managing editor, or whatever it is.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Mandel, will you introduce into the record at this time documents showing what Mr. Greenberg's position with the Institute of Pacific Relations was, as well as what his position is with the United States Government?

Mr. MANDEL. I have here, as taken from the files of the Institute of Pacific Relations, a letter on the stationery of the White House, Washington, August 31, 1943, addressed to Miss Hilda Austern, Institute of Pacific Relations, 129 East Fifty-second Street, New York 22, N. Y.

DEAR HILDA: Mr. Currie has asked me to write you about the sending of IPR publications to William D. Carter in New Delhi, India. He says that he is baffled by the problem.

The only thing I can suggest is that you select a few books and try to get them out via OWI.

Sincerely yours,

signed "Michael," and the typed signatured "Michael Greenberg." No title is attached to the document.

Mr. MORRIS. You say that is on White House stationery?

Mr. MANDEL. That is correct.

Mr. MORRIS. Doctor, what was your understanding of Michael Greenberg's position during the war, 1943?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. I don't remember having seen him after a somewhat unpleasant scene in the fall of 1941. I have to say before he proceeded to the White House, there was one man who was in charge of the so-called security. I am sure this man did his duty. I am not saying anything unpleasant about anybody, but that is just an epic fact. This man talked to me about Mr. Greenberg. I told him about my experience.

Sometime after I saw him, Mr. Greenberg landed cheerfully in the White House in a minor capacity.

Mr. MORRIS. As an assistant to Mr. Currie?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you want this letter to go into the record or have it marked?

Mr. MORRIS. I would like to have the letter on the stationery of the White House from which Mr. Mandel just read introduced into the record as the next consecutive exhibit.

The CHAIRMAN. It may go in properly marked.

(The document referred to was marked "Exhibit No. 67" and is as follows:)

EXHIBIT No. 67

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, August 31, 1943.

Miss HILDA AUSTERN,
Institute of Pacific Relations,
129 East Fifty-second Street, New York, N. Y.

DEAR HILDA: Mr. Currie has asked me to write you about the sending of IPR publications to William D. Carter, in New Delhi, India. He says that he is baffled by the problem.

The only thing I can suggest is that you select a few books and try to get them out via OWI.

Sincerely yours,

(Signed) Michael
MICHAEL GREENBERG.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you tell us what position Michael Greenberg held in the Institute?

Mr. MANDEL. Senator Pat McCarran wrote to the Department of State inquiring as to the position of Michael Greenberg. On July 16, 1951, a reply was received from the Department of State from Mr. Carlisle H. Humelsine, Deputy Under Secretary, and I quote from that letter:

Michael Greenberg is not now an employee of the Department. He entered the Department on September 27, 1945, by transfer from the Foreign Economic Administration, under the provisions of Executive Order 9630. He was separated from the Department by reduction in force on June 15, 1946.

Another letter on the same matter came from the United States Civil Service Commission dated July 13, 1951, and signed by Robert Ramspeck, chairman, and states:

Michael Greenberg was appointed to a position with the Board of Economic Warfare on November 9, 1942. On July 7, 1944, he was transferred to the Foreign Economic Administration and on September 27, 1945, he was transferred to the Department of State. His employment was terminated due to reduction in force on June 15, 1946. In connection with his employment with the Foreign Economic Administration, an investigation of Mr. Greenberg was conducted by the Civil Service Commission to determine his general qualifications for Federal employment. As a result of this investigation Mr. Greenberg was barred from competing in civil-service examinations on March 7, 1947, because of questionable loyalty.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you want those inserted?

Mr. MORRIS. Yes, and marked with the next exhibit number.

The CHAIRMAN. It may be inserted.

(The document referred to was marked "Exhibit No. 68" and is as follows:)

EXHIBIT No. 68

MICHAEL GREENBERG

To: Hon. Senator McCarran.
From: Robert Ramspeck, chairman.

Michael Greenberg was appointed to a position with the Board of Economic Warfare on November 9, 1942. On July 7, 1944, he was transferred to the Foreign Economic Administration and on September 27, 1945, he was transferred to the Department of State. His employment was terminated due to reduction in force on June 15, 1946. In connection with his employment with the Foreign Economic Administration an investigation of Mr. Greenberg was conducted by the Civil Service Commission to determine his general qualifications for Federal employment. As a result of this investigation, Mr. Greenberg was barred from competing in civil-service examinations on March 7, 1947, because of questionable loyalty.

Information received from: United States Civil Service Commission, Washington, D. C., July 13, 1951.

To: Hon. Senator McCarran.
From: Mr. Carlisle H. Humelsine, Deputy Under Secretary.

Michael Greenberg is not now an employee of the Department. He entered the Department on September 27, 1945, by transfer from the Foreign Economic Administration under the provisions of Executive Order 9630. He was separated from the Department by reduction in force on June 15, 1946.

Information received from: Department of State, July 16, 1951.

Mr. MORRIS. You came to the United States for the first time in what year?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. In the fall of 1934, having spent the greater part of the year in England.

Mr. MORRIS. Did you see Mr. Edward C. Carter again at that time?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. As soon as I settled down, I went to present myself in the Institute of Pacific Relations. I went there with Mr. Gumperz, who had established the contact. I met Mr. Carter and Mr. Field there.

The CHAIRMAN. That was in this country?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Yes, in the fall of 1934.

Mr. SOURWINE. Do you mean your disclosure to Mr. Carter in response to his question at your first interview; that is, your disclosure that you had been a member of the German Communist Party, and your statement which you said you felt he did not believe that you had left that party, that did not interfere with your forming a connection with the institute? You were, in other words, hired, in spite of that?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. I wasn't hired, but I was promised and given assistance.

Senator FERGUSON. What do you mean by "given assistance"? Do you mean your writings were purchased?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. I was formally attached for several years to the institute with some titles which were technically meaningless, but made me look like a member of the institute.

Senator FERGUSON. Were you compensated for this?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. I was not compensated. I was listed in Pacific Affairs later on as a research associate. I was listed under the secretariat, and so on.

So I was given a formal position which was very useful to me when going to China.

Senator FERGUSON. In other words, the prestige that you received by this listing in connection with the IPR was of value to you?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. It was wonderful. At the time when people knew nothing about me, and I am sorry to say it because the people who gave it to me—I think some of them gave it because they liked me, but I don't know whether those politically in charge did. Anyhow, I had a lovely time. I was introduced to many people and was received by the president of Stanford University. Wherever I went, I was referred to as a man who had written a wonderful book. I knew my then friends, such as Mr. Carter, didn't read this book because they didn't read German.

Anyhow, I had a wonderful time. I must say, later on when I did something which contributed to the scholarship of this country, but I was no longer connected by an umbilical cord or otherwise with the Communists, I was deemphasized and I wasn't even introduced to the janitors of universities.

Senator FERGUSON. In other words, while they thought you were a Communist, you received a listing; is that right?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. That is right.

Senator FERGUSON. In that listing, then, you had entree to certain people and certain society; is that right?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. That is correct.

Senator FERGUSON. But when you were definitely known to be not Communist, then this all disappeared?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. The thing faded away.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you find they did not want you in the Institute of Pacific Relations as a non-Communist?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. I didn't go near it, and I was not invited.

I will come to that later on.

I was invited to one more conference. I made myself disagreeable. After that time—whatever my scholarship was, objective sources seemed to think it had not decreased but increased. This didn't compensate for the wrong development of my political position.

Senator FERGUSON. You think by being a non-Communist in connection with the Institute of Pacific Relations, they had no use for you?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. That is the way it looked.

Senator FERGUSON. You are satisfied as to that?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Yes.

Dr. MORRIS. In 1935, Dr. Wittfogel, it is your testimony you were still within the Communist periphery?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. At that time, which is n v late 1934, did you encounter Dr. Chi, T. A. Bisson, and Philip Jaffe?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Yes; I did.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you describe the circumstances of your meeting those three gentlemen?

The CHAIRMAN. Where was it, when was it, and under what circumstances?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. I do not remember who took the initiative, but I was somehow told that there were two or three gentlemen who wanted to see me. I think it was in Mr. Bisson's office. I had been introduced to Mr. Bisson through the institute.

It suddenly comes back to me it was in the Fo olicy Association in Arthur Bisson's room. Into the room rched a beaming Chinese and it was a gentleman I didn't know. The Chinese introduced himself: "Do you remember me? I am Ch'ao-ting Chi." It was Ch'ao-ting Chi with whom I had the long talks in Frankfort. He came into my house in Frankfort and we discussed many things. The foundation for the only historical book he has written was laid through these discussions.

So there was Chi. There was Jaffe. We had lunch together.

Mr. MORRIS. There was Bisson, Jaffe, and Dr. Chi, whom you had met before as a Communist?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. He wasn't a doctor yet. He was just writing a thesis.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chi?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. Did they come to you as Communists?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Between Chi and me, there was no problem. We had met in 1929. We carried on as a matter of fact. There were some changes. He was somewhat disgruntled in 1929 because he didn't like certain chores he had been doing in the Comintern. This was one of the reasons he had gone west, as he told me, in 1929. I never worked out the details of this. This had more or less disappeared. He seemed to be a perfectly well-adjusted Communist, if I may say so. I was less well adjusted, but we were friendly, and he was a very pleasant man.

So there was no problem politically. I was introduced to Jaffe, who was working with this organization, the American Friends of the Chinese People.

Mr. MORRIS. Did they have a publication China Today?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. Did they discuss that organization and that publication at that time?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Yes, sir; they were proud of it.

The CHAIRMAN. I asked the question: Where did this meeting occur, and when? I do not think I got a specific answer.

Dr. WITTFOGEL. I think late fall or early winter. I think late fall 1934, in New York. We met in Mr. Bisson's room. We proceeded to a Chinese restaurant.

Mr. MORRIS. Did they discuss the American Friends of Chinese People and the publication China Today as if that were a Communist organization and a Communist publication?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. You did not have to discuss it with me. I had seen too many of these organizations. It was very obviously an organization which was run in the way in which Mr. Munzenberg, the greatest German Communist organizer, at that time, ran all these outfits. It was, so to speak, one of those. There was nothing particularly exciting about it for somebody who had seen that for about a dozen years.

Mr. MORRIS. Did you come to learn that those gentlemen wrote for China Today under pseudonyms?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. Do you remember what Dr. Chi's pseudonym was in China Today?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. Was it Han su Chan?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. Do you remember what Mr. Jaffe's pseudonym was?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Something like Phil.

Mr. MORRIS. Was it Mr. Phillips?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Phillips.

Mr. MORRIS. While we are on Dr. Chi, I offer you a photograph from the Workers Monthly, which Mr. Mandel will characterize, and ask you if you recognize the man whose picture is there on the rostrum, and whether it appears to be Dr. Chi?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. It is kind of young. Yes; I would say it looks like him.

Mr. SOURWINE. For the record, is this the same picture which has been offered to another witness?

Mr. MORRIS. Yes.

Mr. SOURWINE. To whom was it offered?

Mr. MORRIS. Edward C. Carter, and Mr. Carter did not identify the man whose picture appears on there as the picture of Dr. Chi.

Mr. SOURWINE. Mr. Carter was shown the picture, both in this magazine and the original, was he not?

Mr. MORRIS. He was.

Mr. SOURWINE. And found more difficulty in the original than in the magazine print?

Mr. MORRIS. That is right.

I would like to also point out the caption under the photograph describes the person as C. T. Chi, which coincides with the name of the gentleman we are discussing.

Mr. Mandel, will you redescribe this exhibit?

Mr. MANDEL. The photograph accompanies an article by Robert Minor. The article is entitled "The First Negro Workers' Congress."

Robert Minor is a well-known leader of the Communist Party. The Workers Monthly, in which this appears, is dated December 1925. The Workers Monthly had been previously characterized as the official monthly organ of the Workers Communist Party of America. Under the picture is a quote from C. T. Chi, as follows:

The world of imperialism is passing. Let us join hands with all enemies of imperialism disregarding race, creed, or nationality.

Mr. MORRIS. Doctor, do you remember having a conversation with Mr. Joseph Barnes in this 1934–35 period?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Yes; I do.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you relate to us the circumstances of your conversation with Joseph Barnes?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. I was introduced to him through Mrs. Elizabeth Field and we went together to a Chinese restaurant and had lunch together.

Mr. MORRIS. Elizabeth Field was then the wife of Frederick V. Field?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. That is right.

Mr. MORRIS. Is she now the present wife of Joseph Barnes?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. That I don't know. I think she married him after her divorce from Mr. Field. I think she was divorced afterwards from Mr. Barnes.

Mr. MORRIS. Doctor, was the conversation that you had with Mr. Barnes the kind of conversation that would take place between two people who accepted each other as Communists?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. It was a friendly, political conversation. There was no friction and no argument between us. He told me about the work he and Mr. Field had been doing in building up the student movement in Harvard which was under Communist influence.

The CHAIRMAN. What was that?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. The students' association.

The CHAIRMAN. What movement is that?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. The students—what is the name of this?

Mr. MANDEL. The Liberal Club?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. No. It doesn't matter.

Senator FERGUSON. Who was building it up at Harvard?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. I think Barnes was a leading man in building up this student group of which there were many.

Mr. MORRIS. Working in conjunction with Field?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. That is right.

Mr. MORRIS. It was a Communist movement?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. This was a group which, at that time, was well known to be very strongly, if not completely, under Communist influence. I am sure you will remember that name. It was a students' organization which flourished at that time but later on lost its strength.

Mr. MORRIS. Dr. Wittfogel, was your conversation with Dr. Barnes of such a nature that you could conclude he was a Communist?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. I had the feeling that he was informed about my background, which was a Communist background, and we proceeded in a very friendly way. I do not remember the details, but it certainly was conducted in a spirit of political congeniality. That is all I can say.

Mr. MORRIS. Dr. Wittfogel, what year was this?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. 1934, late in 1934. It may have been early 1935.

Mr. MORRIS. From that time, Dr. Wittfogel, or at that time, did you decide to make a trip to China?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. Would you tell us what route you took to China?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. I went via Chicago, San Francisco, to Hawaii and Japan to China.

Mr. MORRIS. When you went to Japan, Dr. Wittfogel, did you encounter Chen Han-seng?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. That is right.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you tell us who Chen Han-seng was?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Chen Han-seng was a Chinese economist who did not get along with the Nationalist Government and who lived more or less in exile in Japan. I knew that he had connections with the Institute of Pacific Relations.

Mr. MORRIS. What was his connection at that time with the Communist Party?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. A very friendly one. He told me that he was not an organized member, being somewhat of a Bohemian type, and didn't like discipline, and so on. Politically, he identified himself.

Senator FERGUSON. As what?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. With the Chinese Communist movement.

Mr. MORRIS. Did you come to learn later on he was an organized member of the Communist Party?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. I heard later on in 1947 that he eventually had joined the Chinese Communist Party.

Mr. MORRIS. But at that time when you met him, and that is in 1935, in Japan, he was not an organized member of the party but someone who was very friendly to the Communist movement?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Yes. I think he would have considered them his people and they would have considered him their man.

Mr. MORRIS. Dr. Wittfogel, when did you arrive in China?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. I think in June 1935.

Mr. MORRIS. While you were in China, Dr. Wittfogel, did you meet Owen Lattimore?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you relate to us your associations with Owen Lattimore at that time?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. He was editor of Pacific Affairs and lived somewhere in the country in the Province of Shansi. During that summer another member of the Institute of Pacific Relations, Mr. Bruno Lasker, whom I had also met in Japan, was now in Peiping or in Tientsin. I think in Peiping. I think he was connected with, or assistant editor of Pacific Affairs, so Mr. Lattimore invited him to come to his place.

There was a plan of two other gentlemen to take a trip. One of these, Dr. Woodbridge Bingham, was with Owen Lattimore, staying there in this cool summer place. I went originally to see Mr. Woodbridge Bingham, but then I met Mr. Lattimore, so our contacts were established. As a matter of fact, afterward, the three of us took a trip to the west of China together.

Mr. MORRIS. Dr. Wittfogel, did you tell Mr. Lattimore about your experience with Dr. Chi in Germany in 1929?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. We talked a great deal about Dr. Chi—Mr. Chi, I mean.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you amplify that conversation you had with Owen Lattimore about your previous experience with the then Mr. Chi?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. You see, there wasn't only one conversation. There were many. We had a lot of time. We traveled for days and sometimes we stayed for a half a day or a day in a Chinese inn. Mr. Lattimore was very much interested in Chi as quite a brilliant young man. He was just writing the thesis I have referred to, Key Economic Areas in Chinese History.

Since I had met Chi, too, we discussed the things which, from my point of view, were Chi's interest in my ideas which he later on dropped without much major difficulty, so I don't know. I had practically a vested interest in Chi as a man who took up some of my ideas, and Lattimore was interested in him. So naturally I told him about the circumstances I met him under, and that Chi had worked in the Comintern and came back at that time via Germany to America and that he was going on doing this political work.

Mr. MORRIS. You did tell him both of your encounter with the then Mr. Chi in Germany as well as your encounter with Jaffe and Bisson in 1934?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. I sure did.

Mr. MORRIS. Was there any episode that took place that would corroborate your recollection of the fact that you had these conversations with Mr. Lattimore? Did you visit anybody connected with Chi?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. That is right. Professor Chi, who I think has come up in one of those epic features of the Lattimore story, namely, this letter he wrote to Mr. Barnes about Mr. Chi, where he mentions the father and the son Chi. There he refers to exactly this old Professor Chi who had a high position at the university. I think he was commissioner of education at that time of the Province of Shansi, and he had been head of the law school.

We were kind of interested in how this Papa Chi would take his son's Communist adventures, and naturally we approached the matter subtly. You know that a Chinese is a very dignified man and well restrained. Like other fathers, you could see the papa was not too happy with the way his son developed, but he accepted it as the fact. He loved him nevertheless.

I met Professor Chi later on in America.

Mr. SOURWINE. At that time, did Mr. Lattimore know Ch'ao-ting Chi?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. I think he had met him here in New York. I think they had discussed the beginning of his thesis.

Mr. SOURWINE. When you were discussing Dr. Chi with Mr. Lattimore, the two of you were then discussing someone known to both of you, not merely by reputation?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. Do you recall, Dr. Wittfogel, whether or not you mentioned Mr. Bisson to Mr. Lattimore at that time?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. I guess I did, but we didn't discuss him.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Mandel, I wonder if at this time you would put into the record what Mr. Bisson did in connection with the Institute of Pacific Relations, as well as what positions he subsequently held in the United States Government?

Mr. MANDEL. I read from a volume published by the Institute of Pacific Relations entitled "Windows on the Pacific," the biennial report of the American Council, Institute of Pacific Relations, Inc., 1944–46, page 11. In referring to certain individuals, including Mr. Bisson, the quote says:

* * * T. A. Bisson of the international secretariat left for Tokyo, where they are working under General MacArthur on a research project concerned with problems of Japanese reconstruction.

Mr. SOURWINE. What was the date of that?

Mr. MANDEL. That was from a report of the institute dated 1944 to 1946. The date of employment is not given in the quote.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Mandel, do you have a record of Mr. Bisson's employment at General MacArthur's headquarters in 1948?

Mr. MANDEL. I will present that subsequently.

Mr. MORRIS. Doctor, did the question of your telling Owen Lattimore you were a Communist at this time ever come up?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Yes. There was an episode when the question came up. I was practically never asked the question whether I was a Communist, but one of the few instances occurred during our trip that we took, the three of us together.

Mr. MORRIS. This is in 1935?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Yes.

Mr. SOURWINE. Who were the three?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Mr. Woodbridge Bingham, Mr. Lattimore, and myself. I think it was in the old fortress of Tung-Kuan. That is overlooking the Yellow River.

I had told about my experience at the time before Hitler came to power and certain episodes. I think once as the head of a mixed students' group, I had a discussion with the head of the Nazi student organization. I think I referred to Mr. Knickerbocker's book. The first chapter of the book essentially was devoted to a description of one of the biggest arguments we had in Berlin with the Nazi student leader, and I told this story, and others.

Mr. Knickerbocker thought I wiped the floor with the Nazis, and I still think I did. So I told it in due modesty, but I brought it out the way you do when you look back on things in the past. At the end Bingham asked me, "Karl August, after all you tell me, weren't you a member of the Communist Party?" This embarrassed me no end, because for some reason or other it does not come very natural to me to lie. So I hemmed and hawed and I said a number of things, but at the end I more or less said that I hadn't been.

Senator FERGUSON. In other words, you denied you were a Communist?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. That is right.

Senator FERGUSON. To Bingham?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. That is right.

Senator FERGUSON. Why did you deny you were a Communist?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. I had no intention of joining it again. I wanted to go to America. I want to build a new life, and I saw no reason to tell him this story which might, if handled indiscreetly, frustrate my future plans.

Mr. MORRIS. You knew Bingham at the time had no connection, or you felt he had no connection with the Communist Party?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. He never had.

Mr. MORRIS. In other words, you felt it was impertinent, however, of him to ask you so direct a question?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. I think he is a very decent man. I think he asked it out of great naïveté.

Many people in New York who had a much greater interest in political matters but were more sophisticated never asked that question because they made up their opinion, and I think people didn't ask this kind of question. This is something which, in one way, sounds amusing, but in another way it is not so amusing. I have been told there were dozens of people in England who knew Fuchs was a Communist. Scotland Yard officers didn't know it, but there were dozens of people who knew it. You didn't talk much about it. It was known, but there were reasons why people, though they didn't like communism, maybe they had been former members of the Communist movement, but yet why should they get in more difficulty? So they kept it to themselves. So when people like Bingham asked that question, I think he did it because he was a naive young man at that time.

Lattimore, I think, was more sophisticated.

Mr. MORRIS. Dr. Wittfogel, did Mr. Lattimore ever make any comment on Bingham's question?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. He sure did. As soon as I was alone with Lattimore after Bingham had gone, he smiled the same nice smile for me which we didn't have a television set for yet, and made it very clear to me that he thought Woodbridge Bingham was a very nice man but he shouldn't have asked the question, and it was obvious what kind of an answer I would give under the circumstances.

Mr. MORRIS. Dr. Wittfogel, did Lattimore leave China shortly after that and go to Moscow?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Yes; in the spring of 1936 he left China.

Mr. MORRIS. Did you next see Mr. Lattimore after that trip down to the west?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. After the trip to the west, we went back to Peiping. He stayed there. I stayed on, but he went away to Moscow, England, and America, and came back in 1937.

Mr. MORRIS. When he came back in 1937, could you tell us whether or not he had discussed with you some of the deviations that you had expressed in Moscow?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. I had made these deviations quite clear to him. I remember a number of talks I had with Lattimore about what I considered the growing bureaucratic monster in the Soviet Union. I had discussed my peculiar academic position in the interpretation of China. He obviously liked it. His writings show it—that he was very much interested. The largest book he wrote shows a great many traces of it. So he went to Moscow and told me he discussed my ideas with people there. As a matter of fact, in one of his last books, he mentioned that he had talked about an ex-Communist's ideas in Moscow. He may have forgotten the ex-Communist was I, but he told me he had discussed my ideas, and I think Freda Utley says the same, and he encountered some difficulties. They didn't like it as well as he thought they would.

Mr. SOURWINE. With whom in Moscow did he discuss your ideas?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. As far as I remember, the members of the Soviet group of the Institute of Pacific Relations, and maybe others, too.

Mr. MORRIS. Was any name of an American mentioned in that connection?

Was Harriet Moore's name mentioned?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. There was no mentioning of Miss Moore in that connection, but there was something else which kind of surprised me somewhat, though it didn't completely surprise me, because I had heard that Moscow did not think well of me before, when I wrote the novel on my concentration-camp experiences.

I first got back a letter. The Russians considered it the best book of its kind, and later made a movie of, or a movie was made, based on my main idea. They didn't publish the book for a long time because they thought there was something wrong about me politically. Owen Lattimore told me Harriet Moore had talked with people of the Comintern. They said, "There is something wrong with this Wittfogel because he went west; he should have come to the Soviet Union."

Mr. MORRIS. Will you tell us what signifinance talking with people in the Comintern had to you, Dr. Wittfogel?

Should Harriet Moore have had access to the Comintern?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Maybe they changed the rules for her and made a special law for her, if she was not connected with the Communist movement, that is. I never knew of any non-Communist who would go in and talk with Comintern people about Communists. This is not the way it was being done. Sometimes the law of gravity may not work and stones may move upward, but if the stones fall down—I think the fact that Harriet Moore had access to this kind of information from the Comintern—well, I leave it to you. I think it is very obvious.

Senator FERGUSON. Do you know whether or not she was making a study in relation to the U. S. S. R. in 1940?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. You mean later on?

Senator FERGUSON. In 1940.

Dr. WITTFOGEL. No; I don't remember.

Senator FERGUSON. Do you know whether she went to the U. S. S. R. to make a study?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. I knew she had all kinds of connections—headed various organizations connected with the U. S. S. R.

I know she wrote on foreign relations of the U. S. S. R.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, we introduced in the record previously as exhibit 41 in our hearing of August 2, 1951, a letter from Mr. Carter to Mr. Lockwood. Assignment No. 3 on the first page of that letter reads, Mr. Carter talking to Mr. Lockwood, when they were discussing what should be done in connection with the development of the institute:

> Send Harriet Moore to U. S. S. R. to go through all Government and party writings on postwar problems and supplement this by interviewing party and politburo chiefs.

That was assignment No. 3 that Carter was giving Harriet Moore. Would you read that, Dr. Wittfogel, and make comment on Harriet Moore's having access to the Communist records?

Senator FERGUSON. In your opinion could anybody other than a Communist do what was asked there in No. 3 at the bottom of that page?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. This is so very, very high up. This is a very unusual thing. I am not an expert to give more than my opinion. I have been a few times in the Soviet Union, and I have seen a bit of the wildlife of the Communist part of the world. I think it is too—people may assign any task to you, but I don't think such a thing could have any meaning or success if you were not connected with it.

Senator FERGUSON. If you were not a Communist and connected with it; is that your opinion?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Of course, whether you have to have a card is a question of bookkeeping.

Senator FERGUSON. I am not talking about a card.

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Yes, politically.

Mr. SOURWINE. Doctor, how about your opinion of a person who would assign a non-Communist to do that job that is there described?

Mr. MORRIS. That is Mr. Carter.

Dr. WITTFOGEL. A non-Communist?

Mr. SOURWINE. Yes. If I may rephrase the question, would a person like Mr. Carter, as you know him, be at all likely in your opinion to assign a non-Communist to a job of that nature?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. After my first talks with Mr. Carter, I have had no close connection with him. I would be surprised if he would be so naive, but I cannot give a definite answer.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to point out that our last witness, Mrs. Hede Massing, has identified Harriet Lucy Moore, whom we are discussing now, as a Communist. She said she had met her in Moscow as a Communist.

In addition, Mr. Chairman, I would like to call attention again of the Chair to a series of documents which were introduced at that time which show that Harriet Moore was a leading member, in fact acting secretary in the middle forties of the Institute of Pacific Relations. I would like those reintroduced in the record at this time, Mr. Mandel.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you want to identify them?

Mr. MANDEL. Exhibit No. 60, taken from the annual report of the American Council of the Institute of Pacific Relations, dated 1940 to 1941, shows Harriet Moore as holding the following offices: She was a member of the board of trustees. She was a member of the executive committee for 1941 and she was chairman of the nominating committee for 1941.

Mr. MORRIS. How many members were on that nominating committee, Mr. Mandel?

Mr. MANDEL. There are five, including two ex officio members.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you identify the members of the nominating committee in 1941 of which Harriet Moore was chairman?

Mr. MANDEL. Harriet L. Moore, the chairman; Edward C. Carter, ex officio; Frederick Field, Jerome D. Greene, and Ray Lyman Wilbur, ex officio.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, we have had testimony from Mr. Carter on the question of Harriet Lucy Moore. Mr. Carter saw fit to comment on a conversation that he had with Mr. David Dubinsky, head of the International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union. At that time, Mr. Chairman, the story that Mr. Carter told did not square with our records, and we elected to write Mr. Dubinsky to ask him his recollection of the testimony that Mr. Carter gave at this time.

I wonder, Mr. Mandel, if you will read into the record the letter that we sent to Mr. Dubinsky as well as Mr. Dubinsky's subsequent answer.

Mr. MANDEL. The letter is dated August 1, 1951, to Mr. David Dubinsky, president, International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union, 1710 Broadway, New York, N. Y.:

DEAR MR. DUBINSKY: I enclose herewith testimony of Mr. Edward C. Carter before the Senate Internal Security Subcommittee relative to Miss Harriet L. Moore and dealing with the Russian War Relief in which your name is involved.

We would appreciate it if, in the interest of accuracy, you would make a comment regarding what you remember actually took place.

Your cooperation in this matter will be deeply appreciated.

Sincerely,

ROBERT MORRIS, Special Counsel.

Mr. ROBERT MORRIS,
Special Counsel, Internal Security Subcommittee,
Committee on the Judiciary, United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. MORRIS: I have your letter of August 1, together with excerpts of testimony given by Edward C. Carter before the Senate Internal Security Subcommittee on July 26, in which my name and that of the International Ladies Garment Workers' Union, of which I am president, are mentioned.

I note Mr. Carter's statement to the effect that our refusal to participate in Russian War Relief because of the important position held in that organization as secretary by Miss Harriet Moore was based on mistaken identity.

At the outset, I want to emphatically deny his statement that I have ever "conceded" that my objection to Miss Moore was based on an error of identity. Mr. Carter's correspondence in 1941 did not even bring up the subject of another Miss Moore to whom he now refers.

Our attitude concerning Miss Moore and her record has not changed in the slightest although we later on contributed funds to Russian War Relief. This being the case, I deem it advisable to give a little of the history of the entire matter.

When Russian War Relief was organized in 1941 and an appeal was made to us to contribute to it, we had a study made of the officers because of our opposition to participating in any Communist-front organization. A member of our staff was assigned to this task and he submitted to us the enclosed memorandum. Based on this report, we definitely refused to be associated with Russian War Relief in any way and decided to make our contribution for Russian relief through the American Red Cross.

Several months later, Russian War Relief also made an appeal to the Rockefellers, who, having learned of our union's opposition to Russian War Relief, were interested in ascertaining the reason for our position in this matter. We thereupon submitted this same memorandum to them and they, too, based on the facts contained in the memorandum, refused to participate in the fund. Mr. Carter, fearful that this may affect the drive generally, formally inquired as to the reason for our opposition to Russian War Relief.

While this memorandum raised questions in our minds about Mr. Carter's own associations, it gave concrete evidence that Miss Moore was definitely tied up with communistic activities. We therefore contended that so long as she remained in the key position of secretary, our union would refuse to cooperate with Russian War Relief. We were subsequently notified by Mr. Carter that Miss Moore had resigned her post. Thereupon we changed our position and transmitted to Russian War Relief approximately $500,000 over a period of a number of years.

Quite some time later, we learned that Mr. Carter, although complying technically with his promise to us as the head of the organization, in typical Communist fashion placed Miss Moore in another equally important position in Russian War Relief.

Now I learn that Mr. Carter is using my name and that of the International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union to alibi himself and Miss Harriett Moore in the proceedings before you.

Sincerely yours,

DAVID DUBINSKY,
President, International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you want that inserted in the record?

Mr. MORRIS. I would like both my letter and the letter of Mr. Dubinsky to me as well as the enclosure, the memorandum that was enclosed therewith, inserted into the record as the next exhibit.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be inserted in the record and marked consecutively.

(The documents referred to were marked "Exhibit No. 69–A" and "Exhibit No. 69–B," respectively, and are as follows:)

REPORT ON RUSSIAN WAR RELIEF, INC. (November 9, 1941)

SUMMARY

Russian War Relief, Inc., is probably the best organized and most innocent-appearing of all "innocent" fronts of the Communist Party. The long list of endorsers contain dozens of prominent, respectable personalities and relatively few of the shopworn stooges of the Marcantonio-Quill type, whose names have been attached to scores of Communist Party fronts in the past.

The real nature of the organization, however, is not determined by the endorser but by the character of the people who have organized the movement, who do its work, who hire the help, who write the publicity, and who make all the practical decisions. From this point of view, Russian War Relief, Inc., is as much an innocent front as any in the past.

On the board of directors of Russian Relief, Inc., there is a group of at least five—Edward C. Carter, Harriet Moore, Dr. Henry E. Sigerist, Vilhjalmur Stefansson, and Col. Raymond Robins—who have proven their sympathy with the Stalin regime in a network of propaganda organizations where they worked closely and harmoniously with outright Communists in furthering some particular aim of the Communist Party. Cooperation with Communists, especially in defense of the Moscow trials and during the period of the Stalin-Hitler Pact, may be taken as the highest mark of reliability. These five above-named directors of Russian War Relief, Inc., have never at any time hesitated to cooperate with known Communists. Furthermore, they have never engaged in any activity, such as Aid to Britain before June 22, 1941, which would have been obnoxious to the Communist Party.

In addition to these five, there are on the board of directors, Mrs. Vincent Sheehan, the wife of the writer who until the Stalin-Hitler pact was a frequent participant in innocent fronts.

The experience of all innocent fronts has been that the presence on a leading committee of a reliable group of experienced, active Communists and fellow travelers is sufficient guaranty that the organization will serve the needs of the Stalin regime and the Communist Party rather than the purpose for which it was established.

The arrangements for the Madison Square Garden meeting of October 27 and the demonstration against Lord Halifax which occurred there are proof that this organization is no exception to the general rule.

EDWARD C. CARTER

The initiator of Russian War Relief, Inc., and its present chairman is Edward C. Carter, secretary general of the Institute for Pacific Relations and director of the American-Russian Institute for Cultural Relations With the Soviet Union.

The executive secretary of the Institute for Pacific Relations, working under Mr. Carter, is Katherine Terrall, who was also national vice president of the American Peace Mobilization until the invasion of Russia. Another colleague of Edward C. Carter's is Frederick Vanderbilt Field, a director of the Institute for Pacific Relations. Mr. Field was elected national secretary of the American Peace Mobilization in September 1940. Mr. Carter may not himself have been a member of the American Peace Mobilization but his close association with agitators against Aid to Britain is significant.

Mr. Carter's reliability for the Communist Party was publicly demonstrated a number of years ago when the Moscow trials were beginning to disgust an increasing number of American liberals who had been sympathetic to the Soviet Union. A group of "friends of the Soviet Union" arranged a meeting in Mecca Temple on March 24, 1938, where Ambassador Troyanovsky and others "explained" the trials. Edward C. Carter also addressed this meeting, saying:

"When they (the Russian people) think of the trials, they are thankful that their Government has at last been firm in dealing with what they regard as Fascist-supported intrigue to overthrow the Government of the Soviet Union."

His speech, which reveals a great deal about his point of view, was printed in full in Soviet Russia Today, May 1938, a photostat of which is attached. It is further significant that the pro-Communist editors of that magazine had the following to say of Mr. Carter in the same issue:

"Dr. Edward C. Carter is the secretary general of the Institute of Pacific Relations. He was chief secretary of the YMCA with the American Expeditionary Force in France during the World War and later foreign secretary of the British YMCA. He has been decorated by a number of foreign governments for his signal contributions to international understanding. He is a frequent contributor to our leading periodicals, particularly on eastern problems."

The purpose and tone of this Mecca Temple meeting is indicated in the New York Times report of this meeting on March 25, 1928:

"Conceding that the facts revealed by the recent Russian trials 'were a great shock to all of us,' Alexander A. Troyanovsky, Soviet Ambassador to the United States, defended last night the 'elimination' of the 'conspirators' and said that the fate of Austria showed the folly of weakness or tolerance toward fascism.

"He belittled the importance of the defendants in the trials, contending that most of them had long lost all influence and had been repeatedly rejected by 'the vote of our democratic organizations.'

"Mr. Troyanovsky addressed a mass meeting at Mecca Temple, 130 West Fifty-sixth Street, which was held under the auspices of a committee of sponsors headed by Corliss Lamont and including Federal Judge Julian M. Mack, Lillian D. Wald, Maurice Hindus, Raymond Robins, and Francis J. Gorman, president of the U. T. W. of A.

"Upton Sinclair also addressed the gathering by telephone from his home in Pasadena, Calif. The other speakers were Dr. Edward C. Carter of the Institute of Pacific Relations and Vilhjalmur Stefansson, Arctic explorer; James Waterman Wise and the Rev. Thomas L. Harris of Philadelphia."

HARRIET MOORE

The Secretary of Russian War Relief, Inc., is Harriet Moore, who is also secretary, a director, and editor of publications for the American-Russian Institute.

Other directors of Russian War Relief who are also associated with the American-Russian Institute are Edward C. Carter, Dr. Henry Sigerist, Vilhjalmur Stefansson, and Col. Raymond Robins.

In editing the American Quarterly on the Soviet Union and a Research Bulletin on the Soviet Union, Harriet Moore has kept these publications in line with the policies of the Soviet regime at all times; giving the official Soviet versions of its policy and reprinting the official speeches and documents of the Soviet Union.

Beginning with the very first issue of the Quarterly in April 1938, there are articles whitewashing the Moscow trials and denouncing the "dissenters and highly placed counter-revolutionaries". This is followed in other issues by a glorification of the Soviet elections (October 1938) and an apology and defense of Soviet policy on oil sanctions against Italy during the Ethiopian War as well as Stalin's hand in Spain (The National Defense Program of the Soviet Union by Harriet Moore in the April 1939 issue of the Quarterly). Not a single issue either of the Quarterly or the Bulletin appeared under Harriet Moore's editorship without flattering accounts of Soviet penology, the Russian standard of living, Soviet music, Soviet genetics, etc.

As far back as September 30, 1936, Harriet Moore explained in the Research Bulletin on the Soviet Union how the new Soviet Constitution and the dictatorship of the proletariat in Russia really amounted to a democratic system. She writes:

"Of what does the dictatorship of the proletariat consist? The dictatorship of the proletariat appears to be, at any given time, the particular organization of the state which assures the principle that nothing shall be done within the state detrimental to the interests of the builders of communism, foremost among whom are the proletariat. It must be regarded as a coercive power in relation to all opponents of this building, but as a cooperative power in relation to all other members of the working population insofar as their interests are identical with those of the proletariat.

"It (the Communist Party of the Soviet Union) is one of many types of popular organizations, like the trade-unions, cooperatives, etc., and enjoys exactly the same rights of participation in the Government as they do. * * *"

Her article continues to praise the extent of national autonomy in the Soviet Union and concludes:

"* * * the Soviet Union has now achieved, if not a level of abundance, at least a level of national wealth at which it can guarantee to every citizen employment, social security, education, and leisure. These the Soviets have always considered as a minimum of the inherent rights of mankind for which they fought the revolution."

In the Bulletin of December 30, 1936, Harriet Moore discusses Criminal Law in the Soviet Union. She points out that the trials and executions that followed the assassination of Kirov in 1935 prove that the Soviet Union practices great leniency.

In the March 30, 1937, issue of the Bulletin Edward C. Carter reviews the court proceedings in the Moscow trials and concludes:

"For those who sincerely want to understand the Soviet Union and this series of trials this verbatim report will be welcome indeed. From it the student will discover the untenability of the theory that this was a 'frame-up.' The Kremlin's case was genuine, terribly genuine."

Harriet Moore discusses the nationalities question in the Bulletin of June 30, 1937, and finds that—

"Today the nationality policies of the Soviet Union have progressed to the point where the member nations are approaching real equality, culturally and economically."

Harriet Moore developed the same theme in the February 1936 issue of Soviet Russia Today.

The publications of the American-Russian Institute constantly attempt to describe Soviet institutions in such a light that they appear to be as democratic as those in this country. Discussing the Russian trade-unions, for instance, the Bulletin on the Soviet Union of October 3, 1941, says:

"Soviet trade-unions are voluntary labor associations markedly similar to those existing in this country in structure, functions, and activities."

In the next issue of the Bulletin an interview with the Metropolitan Benjamin of the Russian Orthodox Church is printed. This interview purports to show that the Russian people really enjoy full religious freedom under the Soviets.

In discussing Russian foreign policy and suggesting a diplomatic course for this country, Harriet Moore has at all times echoed the views of the Soviet Government and the Communist Party. Throughout all phases of Russian policy and even during the life of the Stalin-Hitler pact, Harriet Moore always stressed that the aims of the United States of America and the U. S. S. R. were identical and that this country ought to lift all embargoes and permit widest trade with Russia.

In an article entitled "U. S. S. R.'s Position in the Far East: What It Means to the United States" for the magazine Amerasia of May 1938, she writes:

"The foreign policy of the U. S. S. R., whether it be in the Pacific or in Europe, is no new thing. That it is one which pursues peace in as concrete and direct a manner as the meanderings of other powers permit is generally accepted even among liberals who in recent months have allowed their friendly interest in the Soviet Union to lapse. Nonaggression becomes a keynote * * * the U. S. S. R. has not sought foreign adventures."

Her reference to the liberals is undoubtedly directed at those liberals who become critical of the Soviet Union as a result of the Moscow trials and Stalin's role in Spain. The article continues:

"It is surprising how often communism and the Soviet Union can be used as a smoke screen. The general public ultimately glimpses the reality as the smoke is dispersed by actualities, but this has not discouraged the repeated use of this device. Few people are still deceived by the anti-Communist label attached to the alliance of Japan, Germany, and Italy. Nor do many American citizens actually consider Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. LaGuardia followers of Mr. Browder. Experience has dispelled the smoke screen in these cases but the same anti-Moscow fog is being generated, with as little cause, to becloud the issue of collective security.

"For those Americans who are interested primarily in preventing the extension of war, the Soviet Union again enters the picture with a similar interest. Those who favor a boycott of the aggressor and hope for an eventual Government-imposed embargo, automatically find themselves sharing with the Soviet Union a belief in the efficacy of economic sanctions, collectively applied. For them the presence in the councils of the nations of the Soviet Union as a large power strongly advocating and ready to support such a plan to very positive factor, whether or not they like its social system."

It is worth noting that this article and another in defense of the Stalin-Hitler pact which will be quoted later appeared in Amerasia, which is edited by Frederick Vanderbilt Field, a party liner who was national secretary of the American Peace Mobilization during the Stalin-Hitler pact and a "warmonger" before the pact and now again.

The first Bulletin on the Soviet Union following the Stalin-Hitler pact expressed the same confusion and attempt to reassure the followers that was seen in all Communist publications. The Bulletin even repeats the absurd argument that this was all a clever trick on the part of Stalin to break up the anti-Comintern alliance and expose Hitler. The Bulletin of August 31, 1939 reports:

"The new nonaggression pact, signed on August 23, is one of the series of similar treaties which the Soviet Union has made with its neighbors and others—with Afghanistan, China, Estonia, Finland, France, Italy, Latvia, Lithuania, Persia, Poland, Rumania, and Turkey. * * *

The article goes on to show that there is really nothing alarming about the Stalin-Hitler pact and after an elaborate quotation from Stalin is concludes:

"It dispersed the anti-Cominterm smoke screen; it established one more treaty to be torn up before Hitler can move against the Soviet Union * * *"

After the war broke out and Stalin began to share in Hitler's conquests, the Bulletin on the Soviet Union under Harriet Moore's direction continued to defend the line. On October 20, 1939, the Bulletin contains a long "historical" justification for Stalin's conquest of half of Poland and his policy toward the Baltic states.

The Bulletin of April 25, 1940, reporting on the Finnish war, declares:

"The termination of the Finnish war gave the Soviets a treaty which in their opinion 'reliably and durably' safeguards 'the security of Leningrad, Murmansk, and the Murmansk railway.' "

The same article justifies Stalin's diplomacy toward Rumania and indicates that Molotov's policy was that—

"Although the U. S. S. R. had never recognized the Rumanian seizure of Bessarabia it has never raised the question of recovering Bessarabia by military means."

As the war continued and British and American protests multiplied to the effect that Russian trade with America constituted a leak in the British blockade of Germany, the Bulletin on the Soviet Union (May 17, 1940) contains an article on Russian Foreign Trade and concludes that—

"There is little evidence that any of these purchases (copper, rubber, tin, etc.) have as yet exceeded Soviet consumption needs * * *"

This theme is also developed by Harriet Moore in the November 1940 issue of American Quarterly on the Soviet Union. The article is entitled "American Relations With the Russian Empire and the U. S. S. R." and in it she deplores the hostility in this country for the Soviet Union, especially since the Stalin-Hitler pact.

Harriet Moore has an article called Changing Far Eastern Policies of the Soviet Union in the May 1941 issue of the Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science. It consists of the official Soviet version of the diplomatic steps that had been taken in recent years. Her judgment is that—

"The defense of the territory of the U. S. S. R. is the primary aim of all Soviet diplomacy * * *."

This was written after Stalin had partaken of all Hitler's conquests, after the Baltic States had been absorbed into Russia, and after the war with Finland.

Harriet Moore's feelings about the Soviet Union, the war, and America's part in it during the life of the Stalin-Hitler Pact are perhaps best expressed in an article called Two Wars or One in the January 1940 issue of Frederick Vanderbilt Field's magazine Amerasia. In this article she says:

"The Soviet foreign policy, whatever may be judged to be its motives, is clearly aimed at preventing the approach of any strong, antagonistic, capitalist power to its borders. The U.S.S.R. supported efforts to establish collective security in the hope of maintaining a balance of power in Eastern Europe and it was only the Munich settlement which made a Soviet-German agreement necessary."

The article goes on to stress a pact with Japan on the part of the Soviet Union as a possibility if the western powers arrive at another "Munich" settlement with Japan. The article continues: "Theoretically, American and Soviet interests in the Far East are similar in that both countries want a free and independent China—America for trade and investment, the U. S. S. R. as a peaceful and progressive neighbor." Harriet Moore concludes with this suggestion for an American foreign policy: "It (the U. S. A.) should exert its influence to stop the European conflict as soon as possible by means of a negotiated, balance-of-power peace, such as were originally envisaged in Wilson's 14 points."

In the Far Eastern Survey, a publication of the Institute of Pacific Relations of March 12, 1941, Harriet Moore has an article entitled "Soviet 'Enigma'?" The point of the article is that Russia is not on Germany's side, but is really neutral and that there is no reason why America should not extend more trade to the Soviet Union. She denies that trade with Russia helps Germany and insists that "Britain and the United States have found little reason to be critical of Soviet far-eastern policies * * *."

A few months later, after the Nazi invasion of Russia, Harriet Moore wrote another article for the same magazine (August 11, 1941). Here she enlarges on the theme that the United States and the Soviet Union have a "historical community of interest." She criticizes those Americans who, during the life of the Stalin-Hitler pact, pointed to the similarity between National Socialism and Bolshevism. She holds this view to be incorrect and that this view has hindered the proper relations between this country and the Soviet Union. As for the problem of democracy in the Soviet Union, Harriet Moore quotes with approval the opinion of Edgar Snow: "There are many levels of democracy. For purposes of international political mobilization against a common menace, it might have been well to take a nation's word for the kind of government it prefers to think it has."

DR. HENRY E. SIGERIST

Another member of the board of directors of Russian War Relief, Inc., is Dr. Henry E. Sigerist. He is also a director of the American Russian Institute.

Dr. Sigerist was on the committee sponsoring the March 24, 1938, meeting in Mecca Temple at which Ambassador Troyanovsky and Edward C. Carter spoke. This meeting is described on page 4.

In March 1937 and again in May 1938 he signed special appeals to American liberals urging them to support the Moscow trials. These statements are such that only very close sympathizers of the Communist Party, if not members, could possibly sign their names to it. Copies of these statements are attached.

The Daily Worker of November 5, 1937, carries an advertisement for a "Twentieth Soviet Anniversary Ceremonies" meeting which names Dr. Henry E. Sigerist as a speaker, together with Troyanovsky, and Vilhjalmur Stefansson. The meeting was sponsored among others by Col. Raymond Robins.

In November 1937 and again in November 1938 (Dr. Sigerist wrote articles for Soviet Russia Today reporting on his trips to the Soviet Union and his discovery that the U. S. S. R. has a better system of public health than we have in this country.

Throughout the period of the Stalin-Hitler pact and the Soviet war with Finland, Dr. Sigerist continued to visit Russia and write articles for Soviet Russia Today on "Soviet medical progress" (Soviet Russia Today, November 1939, January 1940).

VILHJALMUR STEFANSSON

Another director of both Russian War Relief, Inc., and the American-Russian Institute is Vilhjalmur Stefansson, the Arctic explorer.

He wrote laudatory articles for Soviet Russia Today, in April 1938, about Soviet explorations in the Arctic and, in February, 1940, during the Soviet war with Finland.

On October 25, 1937, under a Moscow date line, the Daily Worker prints a report of the Golden Book of American Friendship for the Soviet Union, which was presented to the U. S. S. R. on its twentieth birthday. Among the signers of this book, the Daily Worker reports, was Col. Raymond Robins and Vilhjalmur Stefansson.

He addressed the twentieth anniversary mass meeting of the Soviet Union together with Troyanovsky and others. (See p. 13).

Mr. Stefansson addressed the mass meeting on the Moscow trials at Mecca Temple on March 24, 1938, together with Ambassador Troyanovsky and Edward C. Carter. (See p. 3).

Most recently, Vilhjalmur Stefansson's name is found on the sponsoring committee of a "Rally to Honor Eight Years of United States Soviet Ties" (Daily Worker, Nov. 9, 1941).

"RALLY TO HONOR EIGHTH YEAR OF UNITED STATES-SOVIET TIES

"Louis Bromfield and Van Wyck Brooks, both Pulitzer prize winners, are among the noted sponsors of a meeting in honor of the eighth anniversary of the establishment of diplomatic relations between the United States and the Soviet Union, to be held in Manhattan Center, Eighth Avenue and Thirty-fourth Street, Monday evening, November 17.

"Other sponsors include Ales Hrdlicka, director of the Smithsonian Institution; Dr. Walter B. Cannon of Harvard University; Dr. Dick J. Struik of Massachusetts Institute of Technology; Kenneth Leslie, editor of the Protestant Digest; Frank Bancroft, editor of Social Work Today, Marcy Blitzstein, composer; Richard Storrs Childs, publisher; Vilhjalmur Stefansson, explorer; Herman Shumlin, producer; Donald Ogden Stewart, writer; Paul Robeson, singer; Alice Stone Blackwell, women's leader; Clifford Odets."

"RALLY MARKING UNITED STATES-SOVIET TIE TO HEAR OFFICER—LIEUTENANT COMMANDER SEELY AND OTHER NOTABLES TO SPEAK MONDAY

"Lt. Comdr. Charles S. Seely of the United States Navy (retired) will analyze the military prospects and situation in the Soviet-German war at a meeting next Monday evening, November 17, in Manhattan Center, Thirty-fourth Street and Eighth Avenue.

"The meeting, which marks the eighth anniversary of American-Soviet diplomatic relations is sponsored by the American Council on Soviet Relations.

"Commander Seely spent 15 months in Europe just before the beginning of the war. Upon his return to the United States he wrote Russia and the Approach of Armaged-don.

"Other speakers at the meeting will be Mrs. Joseph E. Davies, wife of the former ambassador to the Soviet Union; Prof. Arthur Upham Pope, chairman of the Committee for National Morale; Clifford T. McAvoy, legislative director of the Greater New York Industrial Union Council; Corliss Lamont, national chairman of the American Council on Soviet Relations; Jack McMichael, chairman of the American Youth Congress; and Thomas L. Harris, former adviser in religion at Harvard University. Dr. Henry E. Sigerist, director of the Institute of the History of Medicine at Johns Hopkins University, will preside."

COL. RAYMOND ROBINS

A fifth member of the board of directors of Russian War Relief, Inc., is Col. Raymond Robins who was head of the Red Cross Mission to Russia in 1917 and has been a director of the American-Russian Institute.

In an article for Soviet Russia Today in November 1937 the colonel reported that there is "Equality of opportunity for every child born under the Red Flag * * *" and in foreign affairs he reported that "today the whole influence of mighty Russia, through its wise foreign policy, guided by Stalin and Litvinoff, is being used to prevent the threatened Fascist world war."

Colonel Robins signed the open letter to American liberals on the Moscow trials, referred to on page 13.

He signed the Golden Book of American Friendship for the Soviet Union. (See p. 14.)

EXHIBIT No. 69–B

AUGUST 1, 1951.

Mr. DAVID DUBINSKY,
President, International Ladies Garment Workers Union,
1710 Broadway, New York, N. Y.

DEAR MR. DUBINSKY: I enclose herewith testimony of Mr. Edward C. Carter before the Senate Internal Security Subcommittee relative to Miss Harriet L. Moore and dealings with the Russian War Relief in which your name is involved.

We would appreciate it if, in the interest of accuracy, you would make a comment regarding what you remember actually took place.

Your cooperation in this matter will be deeply appreciated.

Sincerely,

ROBERT MORRIS, Special Counsel.

Dr. WITTFOGEL. A few things come to my mind to supplement what was said before. Point 1: I think it was American Students Union, ASU, which I was thinking of.

Senator FERGUSON. You are talking about Harvard?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. That is right.

Mr. SOURWINE. The organization which you said Mr. Barnes was extremely active in promoting?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. That is right.

Point 2: When you asked me about whether Lattimore knew that in these early days I was a Communist—he has later written me a letter in which he told me that he hasn't been aware of this—we do not have to refer to the nonexisting television set. As I said, all our talks about Chi the son and Chi the father made sense only in connection with the background of the Chis' story when it was perfectly clear that we were dealing with a man who had this Communist background, and my relations were in the same set.

Mr. SOURWINE. Before you go into point 2, Doctor, at one point in line with your previous testimony that you and Mr. Lattimore had gone to see the elder Chi, partially at least for the purpose of finding out how he reacted to his son's Communist escapades——

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Not quite. We were in the town where he lived and we thought of looking him up.

Mr. SOURWINE. Was there any discussion between you and Mr. Lattimore on the question of how the elder Chi would react?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Yes, exactly. We talked about it, but we were going to see him anyhow and in this connection the question came up, how is he going to take this? How is he taking his son's political escapades?

Mr. SOURWINE. There is then no question whatsoever that prior to the time you actually went to see the elder Chi, both you and Mr. Lattimore knew the younger Chi to have been a Communist?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Quite, quite.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you discuss with Lattimore the fact that Chi was a Communist before you went to see the father?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Yes, sure.

Senator FERGUSON. When did Lattimore write you a letter?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Last winter, in December.

Senator FERGUSON. Last December?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. I think so.

Senator FERGUSON. What were the contents of that letter? Do you have a copy of it?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. It was a letter in which he said that he had heard something about testimony I had given before the Un-American Committee in secret session—some of it leaked out in the press—and he challenged me; one of the statements was—would you like to see this?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes; I would like to see the letter.

Dr. WITTFOGEL (reading):

In your testimony——

Senator FERGUSON. You are reading from the letter?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. From the letter.

In your testimony, as quoted in the newspaper, you mention that we first became acquainted in 1935. You apparently did not mention, however, that you did not tell me that you had been a Communist Party member, although you did not disguise either your immense reading and scholarship in Marxist literature or the fact that you were intensely hostile to the Stalinist regime in Russia.

The letter was written on December 18, 1950.

Senator FERGUSON. What is your comment on that? Was there any doubt in your mind that you had told him?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Since 1947 I have learned that Lattimore brazenly denies facts that can be established, so I just thought this was a repeat performance of something that happened between me and Lattimore in 1947; and I said at the end, this is the end of our relations. I can place no more belief in what he says.

Senator FERGUSON. Then you had a disagreement with Lattimore in 1947?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. That is right.

Senator FERGUSON. They will cover that later, but you had mentioned it in the letter, and I thought it should be covered at this time in the record.

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Yes; I think it is kind of pertinent, because I would say that Lattimore's story when he came back in 1947 telling me about what he had heard about Harriet Moore does not make much sense either, if he is not a political imbecile. Comintern people do not comment just on the political views of whether people should have gone to Russia or somewhere else, unless they feel they belong in their field of jurisdiction. Lattimore seemed to be fully aware of that at that time.

Mr. MORRIS. You have no doubt in your own mind, Dr. Wittfogel, that you had told Lattimore about Dr. Chi?

Mr. WITTFOGEL. No doubt whatsoever.

The CHAIRMAN. That was the subject of discussion on your visit to the elder Chi?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. That is right.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, Mr. Mandel informs me that we now have Mr. Bisson's record with the United States Government which was not available when we came to Mr. Bisson's name in the testimony. So I will ask him if he will very briefly describe what Mr. Bisson's employment with the United States Government was.

Mr. MANDEL. I read from Who's Who, volume 24, where T. A. Bisson is listed as former adviser, Government Section, Supreme Commander for the Allied Powers, Tokyo, Japan, principal economist, Board of Economic Warfare in 1942–43.

Mr. MORRIS. What was the year of his employment at Tokyo?

Mr. MANDEL. That will be given.

A letter to Senator Pat McCarran from Robert Ramspeck, Chairman, United States Civil Service Commission, dated July 13, 1951, states:

> Thomas Arthur Bisson received appointment as principal economic analyst on the Board of Economic Warfare on January 22, 1942, in which position he served until July 10, 1943, when he resigned voluntarily. On October 4, 1945, Mr. Bisson was appointed to a position with the Supreme Commander for the Allied Powers, Department of War. His employment with that Department was terminated on May 23, 1947, due to the completion of his contract.

Mr. MORRIS. Now, Dr. Wittfogel, can you recall an invitation that you received to make a trip to Yenan?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. To Yenan? You mean the then capital of Communist China?

Mr. MORRIS. Yes.

Dr. WITTFOGEL. In the early summer of 1937, I was still in Peiping. Lattimore was there; a number of other people around, and during that time Mr. and Mrs. Jaffe and Mr. Bisson came to visit Peiping. The person who I thought was around, too, was Ed Snow, the author of Red Star Over China. He was just writing that book.

Mr. MORRIS. Peiping, and this is 1937?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Early summer of 1937.

Mr. Snow had been the first known foreigner who went to see Yenan, as you remember, and that is what gave, among other things, his book great news value. I knew him fairly well at that time. As a matter of fact, I am partly responsible for the unfriendly remarks about the Soviet bureaucracy which appeared in the first edition and which were very much softened in the later editions of his book.

Snow had told me how he had had his Communist contact and how they organized it for him to go to Yenan. So, Snow came to me one day and said, "You see, there is a possibility of some persons going to Yenan," and I said "Who?" He said; "Jaffe, Bisson, Lattimore, and yourself."

Now, as I have indicated, I was on my way out, not of the party but of the fringes. It was a time when I had ever more angry arguments. I had some very unpleasant arguments with Jaffe and Bisson, Bisson being particularly generous concerning the execution of Tukhashevsky and other top-ranking generals. He said, "It doesn't matter; they have so many generals." It was a very large gesture, and it indicated the kind of difference in feeling and sense of direction. So I said, "I don't think I want to go." Whereupon, instead of myself, Mrs. Jaffe joined the group, and the four of them went.

Mr. MORRIS. Could any group have gotten together to have gone to Yenan, the capital of Communist China?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. You mean spontaneously?

Mr. MORRIS. Yes.

Dr. WITTFOGEL. That is ridiculous.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you explain that?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. The place was very isolated. You had to have the cooperation, and the people from the other side would be very careful whom they would let in.

Senator FERGUSON. Was there an iron curtain around Yenan?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. There was the Nationalist region, and troops were around it, although conditions had very much relaxed after the Sian incident. Still the Nationalist Government didn't like it particularly, and obviously; and there was the other side of the story, too.

Mr. MORRIS. Would you need Chinese Communist cooperation?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Certainly you would need cooperation, but in this case it went further. Snow told me the thing was organized—I mean between him and his Chinese contact man—in Peiping. He did not disclose who made the choice, who was behind it.

Mr. MORRIS. But you knew this trip then was organized by Snow and his Chinese Communist contacts?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. That is right.

Mr. MORRIS. Now, Dr. Wittfogel, why did you decline to go on that trip? What was your reason?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Because I wanted to disentangle myself. I did not want to go further into this.

Mr. MORRIS. In other words, you were in the stage where you were becoming disentangled, breaking away from the Communist organization, and you felt such a trip like that would be the act of someone who would be getting closer to the organization?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. It might very well lead to closer relationship. They all came back very cheerful and warmed up. As said by others, Yenan had a very good way of organizing friendly ways of receptions.

The CHAIRMAN. Who went on that trip?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Mr. and Mrs. Jaffe, Mr. Bisson, and Mr. Lattimore.

Mr. MORRIS. The four of them made the trip?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. That is right.

Mr. MORRIS. Did they discuss the events on the trip later with you?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you amplify that to the best of your recollection? Did they run into anybody else on the trip, for instance, on the way up to Yenan?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. There was a queer incident. Yes; they told me. I remember Bisson's story. I think it was confirmed later by the others. I met Bisson first; I was at the seashore when he came back. This was a thriller, and also I mean it will go into the history of human stupidity, of which several volumes shall be written.

I asked him whether there were any other foreigners moving toward Yenan. He said, "Yes; there was another car." This is a very rugged country. They were very unhappy, and one of the key remarks, I am sure not only of Jaffe, but others, because human memory is of that kind. Jaffe was somewhat angry. He said, "I wish the Japanese would come and clean up this mess." For a pro-Communist it was a very funny remark to make. It was repeated with a certain smile afterward by Bisson.

So, it was kind of difficult country, and why anybody should go up on a trip up there is not very likely to imagine.

They saw there was another car moving in the same direction. There were rivers; there were few bridges. They had to get together. In certain parts there was maybe only one ford. According to this account, they found out that the people in that car were Russians. These Russians were not very talkative men. They were very restrained. I said, "What kind of Russian were they?"

"We occasionally talked with them there, particularly the chauffeur, who spoke English quite well."

Mr. MORRIS. Bisson said he spoke to the chauffeur; you did not?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. I didn't. They talked with one of these chauffeurs, they talked with him; and they were told these were White Russians who were going to Yenan to do business.

Mr. MORRIS. To do business with the Chinese Communists?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. This is one of those unique experiences. According to their own records, the Chinese Communists did business with nobody; and to a Communist the White Russian was not exactly the most attractive man in the world to do business with, the way I knew White Russians. That is, those who were really white were hated. They certainly would not seek out Communist business partners. There wasn't much business to do. Anyhow, that is the story they told.

I said, "Did these men in that mysterious car arrive in Yenan, too?"

They said, "Yes, they did arrive."

"What happened?"

The four went on, yodeling, had theater performances, they had a wonderful time. The Russians just disappeared. There was no indignation. These guys were not thrown out. They were just there and disappeared, and nobody paid any attention.

It puzzles me still today, and I just throw it in as one of these little incidents.

Mr. MORRIS. At this time I should like to introduce in the record a letter that Mr. Lattimore wrote to Mr. Field on April 19, 1937, bearing on a record of Lattimore's conversations with Mr. Wittfogel at that particular time.

I wonder, Mr. Mandel, if you will identify that letter and read the last two paragraphs thereof.

Mr. MANDEL. This is a letter taken from the files of the Institute of Pacific Relations. It is on the letterhead of Pacific Affairs but inserted is an address, 33, Ta Yuan Fu Hutung, Peiping, China, dated April 19, 1937. The letter is signed by Owen Lattimore and is addressed to Frederick V. Field.

I read the following excerpts:

The amount of stuff under which my desk is groaning has prevented me from taking full advantage of the easy settling down: but of course we have already accumulated to our credit a number of hours of Wittfogelian conversation and dined there one night with the Bissons and Bertram and Ida Pruitt. By the way even Wittfogel's enthusiastic and triumphant letters don't give any adequate idea of the bulk, quality, and really fundamental importance of the work he has been doing. He has an organizing and executive ability that could give Henry Ford a start and a licking; and on top of the unbelievable quantity of work that he and his wife have been doing, he has found time to supervise a survey of source material that I needed for my work.

You sure have piled Amerasia on the market here; and I believe you've made a dent. When I've had a chance for more of a talk with Bisson, I'll see if I can't do more toward pulling my weight as a member of your editorial team.

All the best,

OWEN LATTIMORE.

Mr. MORRIS. I would like to introduce that letter in the record, Mr. Chairman, as the next consecutive exhibit.

The CHAIRMAN. It may be inserted in the record.

(The document referred to was marked "Exhibit No. 70" and is as follows:)

EXHIBIT NO. 70

PACIFIC AFFAIRS,
THE INSTITUTE OF PACIFIC RELATIONS,
New York City, April 19, 1937.

FREDERICK V. FIELD, ESQ.,
American Council, Institute of Pacific Relations, New York City.

DEAR FRED: Your letter of February 26 gives us I think the starting point for the suggested article on the problems with which the Chinese language school is designed to cope. I am presuming that the first school will be held this summer. If so, the article should be planned for our December number, so that Kennedy can include the experience gained from the first trial in his article. This would also make it possible for you to get the criticism of the Wittfogels, both on the article, when drafted, and on the general problems. I think they both have some pretty shrewd ideas as a result of their work in the language school here, which has both strong and weak points.

Your biographical note on Kennedy was a help; obviously I had underestimated him. By the way, what about putting pressure on him to review Chinese and Japanese books occasionally? I have thought for a long time that we ought to mobilize as many as possible of the people living in countries like America and England and Holland who can review books in Chinese, Japanese, and Russian, but have never known quite how to go about it. As a general proposition however, the idea of a panel of such people, each of them turning in an occasional review of a book in one of these languages ought not to be unreasonable.

Finally, having brought the subject thus far, and being handicapped in carrying it further by the time lag in correspondence, may I leave it to you to push the proposed article through the next stage?

Your reference to your annual report: I shall go through this shortly and let you know if I can make useful suggestions.

I'm glad you like our March issue. I am afraid I may have let Catherine down on the June issue; as it turns out, there was plenty of material floating around, but I had not sufficiently insured myself against accidents of delays en route, change of boats, and so on, with the result that I am afraid that Catherine had to take at the last moment more decisions than it was fair to impose on her. I'm especially glad you liked Freda Utley's article. I remember suggesting to you some time ago that both she and George Taylor might make good contributors for Amerasia; but of course I don't know what your policy is with regard to non-American contributors.

The articles suggested to you by Arthur Christy on Shinto Nationalism in Japan and on contemporary face-lifting operations on Confucianism in China reached me in Nanking. I took up the question there with Bates, for the article on Confucianism but he had no suggestion. For the Shinto article he suggested a man named Holtom in Japan, who contributed an article on State Shinto during 1935 to the Japan Christian Year Book 1936. I shall accordingly write to Holtom making the suggestion. If in the meantime you flush any coveys of talent for the companion Chinese article, you might let me know.

Owing to the fact that we sublet our house while we were away, to people who were nice and orderly and left everything right side up, we settled down again here with miraculous ease. Inside a couple of hours everything was unpacked and in its right place, and you would not dream that we had been away for more than a year. David, at whose age it is really quite a strain to be yanked around the world with one arm perpetually almost out of its socket, settled down blissfully. Of course we met a dust storm in the first couple of days, and poor David got it in the neck, the inside of the neck, in the form of a streptococcic throat, but he is practically well already.

The amount of stuff under which my desk is groaning has prevented me from taking full advantage of the easy settling down, but of course we have already accumulated to our credit a number of hours of Wittfogelian conversation and dined there one night with the Bissons and Bertram and Ida Pruitt. By the way even Wittfogel's enthusiastic and triumphant letters don't give any adequate idea of the bulk, quality and really fundamental importance of the work he has been doing. He has an organizing and executive ability that could give Henry Ford a start and a licking; and on top of the unbelievable quantity of work that he and his wife have been doing, he has found time to supervise a survey of source material that I needed for my work.

You sure have piled Amerasia on the market here, and I believe you've made a dent. When I've had a chance for more of a talk with Bisson I'll see if I can't do more toward pulling my weight as a member of your editorial team.

All the best,

OWEN LATTIMORE.

Mr. MORRIS. I would also like to introduce in the record a letter from Wilma Fairbank on October 19, 1943, on the letterhead of the Department of State to Mr. Bisson. I am introducing this letter at this time purely to show that Mr. Bisson was at that time acting editor of Pacific Affairs, which was the publication of the International Secretariat of the Institute of Pacific Relations. I would like to introduce it after it has been authenticated.

Mr. MANDEL. For that purpose alone.

I read in the record a letter taken from the files of the Institute of Pacific Relations, dated October 19, 1943, on the letterhead of the Department of State, Washington, marked "Personal," addressed to

Mr. T. A. Bisson, American Council, Institute of Pacific Relations, 129 East Fifty-second Street, New York City, addressed "Dear Art" and signed "Wilma Fairbank," with both typewritten and handwritten signature.

The letter reads as follows——

Mr. MORRIS. Just read that part which shows he is acting editor of Pacific Affairs.

Mr. MANDEL (reading):

> Harriet writes me that Chien Tuan-sheng's article on local government (?) is going to be published in the December issue of Pacific Affairs. I understand that you are now acting editor.

Mr. MORRIS. That is all we would like in the record at this time, Mr. Chairman. We would like the whole letter in the record, but we call attention only to that portion.

The CHAIRMAN. It may be inserted in the record.

(The document referred to was marked "Exhibit No. 71" and is as follows:)

EXHIBIT NO. 71

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, October 19, 1943.

Personal.

Mr. T. A. BISSON,
American Council, Institute of Pacific Relations,
New York City.

DEAR ART: Harriet writes me that Chien Tuan-sheng's article on local government (?) is going to be published in the December issue of Pacific Affairs. I understand that you are now acting editor. I don't know what financial arrangements may have been made but this letter is a request that whatever payment is made for the article be made through me. This is not to get me a cut as literary agent but because Chien has asked me to send out to him whatever he earns in greenbacks and by hand. My last attempt on his behalf was to hand John Davies five $20 bills for his Foreign Affairs article to be delivered to Chien in Kunming. The money, in John's brief case, went halfway down by parachute with him into the Naga Hills, dropped the rest of the way and was finally returned intact by the tribesmen several days later for a 40-rupee reward.

I trust that you got the copy of your article republished in Chinese which John sent you from Chungking, and with it a letter of explanation and commendation from John.

Sincerely,

WILMA FAIRBANK.

Mr. MORRIS. Now, Dr. Wittfogel, did you have any arguments with Lattimore of this period—namely, 1937—about the Russian purges which had just been effected?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. I think we talked about the purges in 1937, too, and I am quite sure I told him about the argument I had had with Bisson and Jaffe about it. At that time that was all there was. After he had been in Yenan I met him in America and he wrote a note in Pacific Affairs which has been a comment on the purges in which he, contrary to other observers, thought the terror of that time made the people in Russia more eager to speak up against their Government and kind of developed the spirit of democracy.

I talked to him about it, and I told him I thought that was an absurd argument.

Mr. MORRIS. In other words, he did defend the purges?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Yes; that is on record. I put now on record that I heard an argument with him and disagreed with him on his defense.

Mr. MORRIS. Do you know a man who wrote under the name of Asiaticus?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Yes; I did.

Mr. MORRIS. Did you meet him in Shanghai in 1937?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you relate to us the circumstances of your meeting a man known as Asiaticus in Shanghai in 1937?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. The name "Asiaticus" was known to me in Germany as the name of a German Communist who had held a leading position in the German party, who was known as Heinz Moeller,[1] and who I think in the middle of the twenties left Germany. His faction was defeated, and one of the ways of leaders of such groups would be to make themselves useful in Moscow and be reassigned, as Gerhardt Eisler was later on.

This man went to China and participated in the early developments of the expansion of the Kuomintang regime, when there was cooperation with the Communist Party at that time, from Canton into the Yangtze Valley up to 1927. And Moeller, who, like I think a number of other Communists, held a position in the Kuomintang government, as Mr. Stalin would say "apparatus."

He worked there in some kind of press or publicity center and put his articles and some others together in a book which was published I think in 1928 in Germany under the title, translated, "From Canton to Shanghai."

Mr. MORRIS. Did a Communist publishing house publish that, Dr. Wittfogel?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Yes, that is right, in Germany, and I was interested. He was a protege of Gerhart Eisler's, and I thought this was not a very good book. It was poorly written, and I think it was dull stuff. So I inquired about the circumstances and I heard more about this Heinz Moeller. It was published at that time. It was just before the fall of Eisler; and Eisler wanted it, and he was then powerful. The book was printed.

Mr. MORRIS. You say you met Asiaticus in Shanghai in 1937?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. That is right.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you tell us the circumstances?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. I met him in the house of, I think, some doctor, some people from Europe who I don't think were political. I don't remember any details about them. They said there was a man who would like to see me, and he introduced himself as Asiaticus-Moeller. He told me he had been expelled—maybe I knew it, I don't remember exactly how this came about—from the party, but that he had made his peace with the great father in the Kremlin, and that he had been back in Moscow and that he was in good standing again, and at that time he was writing for Izvestia, which would indicate indeed he was in good standing.

Mr. MORRIS. You say you did meet him in Shanghai in 1937?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. That is right.

Mr. MORRIS. Dr. Wittfogel, I would like to present to you a copy of a letter which we introduced into our official files here as exhibit No. 4 on the first day of the hearings. This is a letter from Mr. Lattimore, of July 10, 1938, to Mr. Carter.

[1] Heinz Moeller also spelled Hans Mueller.

Dr. WITTFOGEL. What was the date?

Mr. MORRIS. July 10, 1938. I would like to call your attention to this paragraph, which I will ask you to read. It is the next to the last paragraph on that first page of the letter of Lattimore to Carter, dated July 10, 1938.

Dr. WITTFOGEL (reading):

> I think you are pretty cagey in turning over so much of the China section of the inquiry to Asiaticus, Han-seng, and Chi. They will bring out the absolutely essential radical aspects, but can be depended on to do it with the right touch.

Mr. MORRIS. Do you know the three people referred to in that article?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Yes; I do.

Mr. MORRIS. Did you know the three of them to be Communists?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. The Chi story I have told. No doubt I have said I discussed it with Lattimore. The Asiaticus story I told you and I talked to Lattimore after he came back here. We talked about Asiaticus, too, several times. I told him the story the way I knew it; I told Lattimore that.

Senator FERGUSON. When was he writing for Pravda?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. For Izvestia?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes.

Dr. WITTFOGEL. In the summer of 1937 he said he wrote for Izvestia.

Senator FERGUSON. There was not any doubt that he told you in 1937 he was in good standing again and had been up to the Kremlin in Moscow?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. That is right, and that he had come back. So the two of them are men who I would say were technically Communists and the third was politically a Communist.

Mr. MORRIS. Did you know what the China section of the inquiry was?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. No; I don't know the details of it. I know it would take up the various aspects of China during the war, its background and what it might lead up to, a general idea.

Senator SMITH. Talking about Mr. Lattimore and these other three men, do you know whether or not Mr. Lattimore was or is a Communist?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. In all my correspondence with him and in person the exchange of remarks with Lattimore he has always taken the position that he is not a Communist, not an organized member of any political——

Senator SMITH. What is your judgment from what you know of him and your contacts with him?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. For reasons which may be shown later I would not take Lattimore's statements at their face value, and this letter of which I have seen other parts in the press indicate him as a key man at the time, but I was not aware of it. I would say during his earlier days his ideological attitude was a much more easy-going one, let me say, but many features of his own political inclinations that I have discussed so far showed, I am certain, that a consistent pro-Soviet pattern had developed.

Senator SMITH. Do you know whether or not he ever was a full-fledged member of the party?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. No; I do not know.

Senator JENNER. For all intents and purposes he might as well have been; is that right? He was following their line, their philosophy, playing their game?

Mr. MORRIS. Senator Jenner, I think Dr. Wittfogel would rather relate, as we come along through the years, the particular incidents and episodes that he had vis-à-vis Lattimore and let the committee draw its conclusions about that. Mr. Wittfogel has been very careful to testify to his actual experience with Mr. Lattimore. He wants to lay great stress on what actually did happen rather than for him to draw any conclusions.

Senator SMITH. When was the last time you saw Mr. Lattimore?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. I think a few months ago in a room in the Institute of Pacific Relations. We both listened to a report given by Mr. Holland.

Senator SMITH. Have you had contact with him by telephone or correspondence since the announcement that these hearings were to begin?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. No; I have not.

Senator FERGUSON. Last December was the last correspondence you had?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. Now, Dr. Wittfogel, have you any doubt in your own mind as to Asiaticus, Han-seng, and Chi?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. They would be just 100 percent. I would say from the point of view of careful political maneuvering, it would be an idiocy. If I would have run any undercover organization or anything which should look respectful and achieve some usefulness for the Communists, this was a silly suggestion. You see, if you lay all your cards on the table, how can you play the game?

Mr. MORRIS. Dr. Wittfogel, do you recall having an argument or a conversation with Lattimore as editor of Pacific Affairs at that period of time, I mean in 1937, in which you complained that there were too many pro-Communists and Communist writings in Pacific Affairs?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. I think I had such a talk after his return from China. I met him in New York. We talked about many things.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you recall as much as you can of that conversation?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. I don't remember any details, but I remember the gist of the argument very clearly. That was that I said, "Now there is a feeling that is a kind of unbalanced thing you have, too many Communists and pro-Soviet people."

He said, "You think so?"

Like many advices or criticisms I have given, I think it made no impression.

Mr. MORRIS. At that time he was editor of Pacific Affairs?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. That is right.

Mr. MORRIS. Did you know Frederick Field in this period, 1938?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. I had met him in 1934 or 1935, and I met him again during this period.

Mr. MORRIS. Did you try to obtain a Rockefeller grant through Field and the Institute of Pacific Relations at this time?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you relate that to us?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. To continue the work which Mr. Lattimore so flatteringly described in the letter you cited, I wanted to ask for a grant to write up this large amount of material from the Dynastic Histories.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Field aided you in that?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. He made the application in 1948, in the spring.

Mr. MORRIS. I realize the limitation of words, Dr. Wittfogel, but would you describe yourself at that time as a person still within the Communist periphery?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. I was very much at the periphery, but I was still there. This is one of those things—maybe most people who have taken my own development just moved faster, but I would say, taking myself as an exhibit it is something interesting: I came back with the feeling that the last asset was gone, which I still had upheld, that maybe everything may be rotten, but there is still some hope for socialism in Russia.

I had discussions in the Institute of Social Research. I said this quite clearly, but afterwards for over a year I was still sticking around. It was just very hard to break away from a group of people whom you have known and the environment you have been in for a long time.

Some ideas you still hold, and then there was the great fight against Hitler. At that time they were very much in it, and that overshadowed everything else. Thus I was still seen from the ouside, and I think objectively, at the fringe of it.

Senator FERGUSON. When did you get out?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. All contacts were broken in the summer of 1939.

Mr. MORRIS. Dr. Wittfogel, did you know Phil Jaffe and stay at his summer house in the summer of 1938?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. This I have to preface by a remark about my relations. You see, it was not quite easy going.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, did you stay at his house in 1938?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Now you may make your explanation.

Dr. WITTFOGEL. The thing was doubtful, because I had had so many clashes with Mr. Jaffe that the invitation which was made a long time ago wasn't repeated. Finally, Mrs. Jaffe repeated it because of my mother. Once I said when Jaffe visited me in this country place of his, "Phil, if you think Soviet Russia is so wonderful, why don't you go there yourself and see what the thing looks like? It might make some impression on you." It made him so angry he bypassed a red light and got a ticket.

Afterward, it was in the fall when the clashes got sharper and sharper, I said to him, "Why did you invite us to your summer house"—he wasn't there, he was in town—"if that is the way you feel about it?" But I stayed at his house.

Mr. MORRIS. At that time did you know that Jaffe was a friend of Browder and a friend of Willy Muenzenberg?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. He told me he was not an organized Communist.

Mr. MORRIS. Jaffe told you?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Jaffe told me, but he told me all his activities, the way he described them, were activities of a Communist and pro-Communist kind, and he told me that Browder was his good friend. He said, really his good friend. Field only told me he saw Browder from time to time, but Jaffe made it quite clear he was a good friend of Browder's.

Mr. MORRIS. What did he say about Willy Muenzenberg?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. He was very interested in Muenzenberg who was, as I said, a genius of an organizer. Even as you read Nehru's biography—I think Nehru even now thinks the First Congress of the League Against Imperialism was not a Communist-controlled thing. This was really a tribute to Mr. Muenzenberg. He certainly could put up a good show.

Mr. MORRIS. How did he work for the Communist International?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Muenzenberg was a big shot in the German Communist Party. He was for many years a member of the Reichstag. There was nothing hidden or conspiratorial about him. He was the father of innumerable outlying front organizations. They were not fronts in the sense of those here, because it was very obvious in most cases, except maybe for some strangers, that these things were run by the Communists.

Now, Jaffe talked with me a great deal. He wanted to know all about it, because he had a great admiration for Muenzenberg, and he thought that was the kind of thing he would like to imitate in America.

Mr. MORRIS. Do they conceal the fronts here much more than they did in Germany at that time?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. They do the work, but they are concealed; is that the idea?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Yes. Of course, I cannot talk about the time after I left Europe, but in the early days they were big mass parties, and the majority of the people just did not hide their affiliation. It was a completely different political picture.

Mr. MORRIS. Now, Dr. Wittfogel, where did you stay later on in the summer of 1938? That was early in 1938?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. That is right. Then I went to Provincetown.

Mr. MORRIS. Where did you stay there?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. I stayed in the house together with a gentleman who was a graduate student at Columbia. His name was Moses Finkelstein.

Mr. MORRIS. Did Moses Finkelstein in the summer of 1938 run a summer camp or a summer study session?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Not that summer. He later became a very active organizer of some academic front organizations, of which you know, and which had many prominent persons of the campus and I think of some other campuses in them. He was a very skillful man that way. He had sometimes, it seems, study groups assembled in his house.

Mr. MORRIS. Was he a Communist?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. Did he tell you he was a Communist?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Sure.

Mr. MORRIS. Was this study group that he ran a Communist study group?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Well, it was a discussion among a group of friends, of people who belonged to his political creed. There was no problem about that.

Mr. MORRIS. Now would you tell us who some of the members were of that particular study group which you have just characterized?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. It was a very small group. There were just a very few people that I met there. One person I met afterward was Mr. Rosinger.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you identify Mr. Rosinger, Dr. Wittfogel?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Beg pardon?

Mr. MORRIS. Will you identify Mr. Rosinger? Is he Mr. Laurence Rosinger?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Laurence Rosinger.

Mr. MORRIS. I would like to ask Mr. Mandel if he will identify Rosinger, tell what his connections were with the Institute of Pacific Relations as well as positions with the Government.

Mr. MANDEL. Laurence K. Rosinger was a writer for the Institute of Pacific Relations. According to a release dated May 20, 1950, released by the State Department and published by the Tydings committee on pages 1826 to 1831, Laurence Rosinger is listed among those who submitted a memorandum to the State Department in connection with a round table conference at the Department on October 6, 7, and 8, and also participated in the conference.

Mr. SOURWINE. What year?

Mr. MANDEL. That was May 20, 1950, the date of the release. The year of the conference is not given.

Mr. MORRIS. It is October 1949. Do you not find that date in there somewhere?

Mr. MANDEL. It probably was 1949 because the release refers to a subsequent year.

Senator FERGUSON. I think we can check the record of the Appropriations Committee. I think that is the meeting.

Mr. MANDEL. In the same release it refers to a round table discussion on October 6, 7, and 8, 1949, arranged by the Office of Public Affairs.

Mr. MORRIS. In other words, that record shows Mr. Laurence Rosinger was acting as adviser to the Secretary of State on far eastern policy?

Mr. MANDEL. Correct.

Mr. MORRIS. Dr. Wittfogel, can you tell us more about Laurence Rosinger's experience at that time? You testified about Moses Finkelstein's Communist study group and Rosinger was a member of that. Can you tell us anything further?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. I don't remember whether it was a permanent group. I was invited a very few times. I met Rosinger there, and he was treated as a Communist and spoken of as a Communist by Finkelstein; and afterward I met Rosinger a number of times and up to my formal break he was a very friendly man. Afterward he behaved, I mean I would say with a smoothness which I think is more becoming to an eel than to a human being, smiling all the time, but keeping away from me as if I were a poisonous affair.

Senator FERGUSON. What happened to you after you broke as far as the Communists that you had been associating with were concerned?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. We just cut each other on the street and didn't talk to each other. Some would manage this uneasy friendly smile, while they desired to get away as fast as possible.

Senator FERGUSON. Is that what happened with Rosinger?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Yes. Maybe he hoped I would have the same kind of poor memory which seems to be a political disease in certain groups and forget what happened. Anyhow I think he tried to avoid me as much as possible.

Mr. MORRIS. Now did you know he had been called down by the Secretary of State to be an adviser on Far Eastern policy in 1949, Dr. Wittfogel.

Dr. WITTFOGEL. You mean whether he wrote a memorandum and whether he was in that discussion?

Mr. MORRIS. Yes. Mr. Mandel has read that he submitted a memorandum and actually participated in the 3-day conference.

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Yes, I heard that.

Mr. MORRIS. Did you know about that at the time?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. I knew about it because I, too, wrote a memorandum.

Mr. MORRIS. What did you stress in that memorandum, Dr. Wittfogel?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. In my memorandum I criticized the weaknesses of our attitude toward China and said we have paid a price for not fully understanding what we are doing. As a matter of fact, I warned not to have the same ideological advisers on other parts of Asia which we had had on China. Looking at Rosinger's and others' beginning to write on India now, I had the feeling that the ideological demolition squad which has done such a good job on China is now doing it in India. I therefore said that we should be much more aware of their tricks and try to work out devices which will enable us to protect ourselves against further disaster in other parts of Asia.

Senator FERGUSON. Do you have copies of that?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Yes, one. It is my last copy.

Mr. MORRIS. Senator Ferguson would like to see it now.

Senator FERGUSON. What happened with the State Department after you told them about this demolition squad?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. There were more things. I warned them against things you find rampant all over the white book and which I found at least in the mind of one high-ranking gentleman in the State Department with whom I once had an opportunity to discuss Chinese affairs, the idea that the Chinese Communists may be different from other Communists.

Mr. MORRIS. Who is this high-ranking gentleman?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. John Davies.

Mr. MORRIS. John P. Davies?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. John P. Davies. You find extreme positions taken in Lattimore's memorandum about the necessity of giving as much as we can and leaning over backward. Otherwise we might—this is a formula which you find again and again—drive the Chinese Communists in the arms of the Russians. In my opinion this is one of the funniest remarks I have ever heard in my life. You don't have to drive them very hard. I think it is insulting the intelligence of this country to make that kind of remark.

Senator FERGUSON. Do you think the Communists of China are of the same type?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. The genuine brand. I have written so in several articles translated also abroad.

Mr. MORRIS. Did you discuss this memorandum with anyone in the State Department?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. I belonged to that small minority that was not invited to the conference.

Mr. MORRIS. You wrote the memorandum, and after you wrote the memorandum you were not asked to the conference?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. First I did not write the memorandum. I wrote to Dr. Jessup whether he really wanted something serious because I thought it was an emergency situation and the thing should be discussed seriously; otherwise I wouldn't write. He said, "Yes, write fully and really say what you have to say."

So I wrote this pamphlet, a rather full analysis of what I consider the basic weaknesses in our concept and procedure and the reasons why we had been deceived, in order not to be deceived again.

Mr. MORRIS. After you wrote this and sent it in, then you were not invited to the round-table discussion; is that right?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. That is right.

Mr. MORRIS. Most of the other people who submitted memoranda were invited to the round-table discussions?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. According to what I read later in the published statements, yes.

Senator JENNER. Did you ever ask Dr. Jessup why you were not invited?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. I haven't seen him since.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Mandel, I wonder if you will put in the record Mr. Laurence Rosinger's latest work in connection with the Institute of Pacific Relations and whatever other pertinent information you have showing his connection with the institute?

Mr. MANDEL. I have in my hand a book published in 1951, issued under the auspices of the American Institute of Pacific Relations. The title is "The State of Asia, a Contemporary Survey by Laurence K. Rosinger and Associates." On the wrapper is the following: Laurence K. Rosinger has covered far eastern events as a member of the research staff of the American Institute of Pacific Relations and Foreign Policy Association."

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have that book introduced in the record together with the excerpts from the flyleaf which Mr. Mandel has read, not to be printed but inserted in the record by reference.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be put in the files of this committee and will be a reference.

(The document referred to was marked "Exhibit No. 78" and filed for the record.)

Mr. SOURWINE. Dr. Wittfogel, at that point you had discussed in your own way the question of the connection, actual or ideological, between the Chinese Communists and the Russian Communists. I wish you would comment for the benefit of this committee on the recent official suggestions that Mao Tse-tung might be becoming an anti-Stalinist, that a rift might be growing between Stalin and Mao Tse-tung, and there might be some parallel between the direction in which Communist China is going and the direction in which Yugoslavia has gone. Are you familiar with the suggestions to which I refer?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Yes.

Mr. SOURWINE. Would you comment, please?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. It seems to me that we have to look at the Chinese pattern as a general pattern. The Yugoslav pattern is an extreme exception. In Yugoslavia you have, it may be called a geo-military situation where a member of the satellite zone very badly treated, might break away successfully because he sits in a part of the country which even Hitler's army could not take. It is a very strong position for such a possibility.

There is another factor which at that time may have been conducive to what Tito did, and that is the much stronger impression that the Western and American Armies made in Europe than they did on the Chinese mainland. A man like Tito has seen the Western World's industrial and military capacity clearly, and I think he had at that time the feeling, and I think he has still that, in the case of an open military clash that the West has a good chance of winning. So burdened by things which he describes in his correspondence as excessive exploitation by Stalin, he severed his relations.

I think the Chinese picture is entirely different. The movement was established from the beginning on a freer footing. It was much more impressed with Soviet power, both industrial and military, because in that part of the world, against the Japanese, the Soviet Russians made a very good showing. The possibility of developing together with the Russians full control over Europe and Asia I think is an enormous attraction for Mao Tse-tung.

I think it is important when discussing the Tito-Mao relations not to forget one thing that in this country should be particularly well known. England overplayed its hands once against its colonies and dominions. This was against the United States, and it lost this old colony. It never overplayed it since.

To assume that Stalin will be so stupid to repeat the mistakes which he has made in Yugoslavia, to overplay his hand and to destroy all the enormous powers of attraction, is a marginal possibility. So I would say, statistically speaking, that is a completely minor point.

Stalin will do everything not to overstrain relations and from Mao's point of view everything is to be gained by staying with Stalin. He looks forward to the coming of the next world war, and I think Mao thinks he belongs in this camp. He has to be victorious, or go down, with it. I think that is his deep conviction; he has said so.

Mr. SOURWINE. Dr. Wittfogel, Mao Tse-tung is a fairly indoctrinated Stalinist Communist?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Yes, he is.

Mr. SOURWINE. And has been brought up in the party?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. He has been brought up in the party. It seems that the final soaking with Stalinist ideas came in the middle of the war, in 1941 to 1942. He was technically speaking, in spite of minor differences certainly—he had some argument in the twenties—a faithful Communist, and I think he is completely monolithic in his ideas too since the early forties.

Mr. SOURWINE. His emergence as the leader of the Communist Chinese is not a spontaneous thing, is it, Doctor?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. No, it was beautifully organized. He learned it. It is not the ultimate reason why he would stay, because gratitude in politics is very rare, but I think communism, the way it has developed, is a device of gaining dictatorial power and maintaining it, by using social and racial unrest, weaknesses, and disturbances.

The great academy for this has been Moscow, and Mao Tse-tung and his people have profited immensely from it in the past and I think they hope to profit immensely in the future. If the greater part of agrarian Asia would come under Mao Tse-tung's wings—you have to see this really in terms of the Communist economic evaluation of power—it would still be a world of peasants; and the great center of heavy industry, the big armaments center, things which in the eyes of both Mao and Stalin are decisive—would still be the great Eurasian-Russian heartland.

So the Russians can go very far in letting Mao be supreme in his part of the world. Much more, he may take the whole of India under his jurisdiction; and he will still be the number two man. Stalin may have a lot of trouble, but don't forget it, if you read in the papers, Russia is full of trouble. The Communist system has existed with continuous frictions and explosions. The fact that there are numerous frictions does not mean that things cease to hang together. This is a Communist axis with very tight relations.

If you think back to all the things Mussolini did. He double-crossed Hitler. They didn't like each other. They were not closely allied. Mussolini gave hints to the Soviets. Nevertheless when it came to the ultimate test of the war, Mussolini stuck by Hitler, because that was where he institutionally belonged, and he fought with him and went down with him.

Mr. SOURWINE. There are perhaps two questions which tie together. Are you familiar with the fact that at the time when there were many in this country who were urging that we should help the Chinese Communists they used among others two favorite arguments, one that the Chinese Communists were simply agrarians, and the other that the Chinese Communist movement was a parallel to Titoism and a chance to build something in China which would combat Stalin?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. That was the second version of the same thing.

Mr. SOURWINE. You are familiar with that?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Yes.

Mr. SOURWINE. That argument died down after it was more or less contradicted by history?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Right.

Mr. SOURWINE. You are familiar with the fact that that argument has had a resurgence very recently after stimulation from official or semiofficial sources?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. I am aware of that.

Mr. SOURWINE. Do you have any theory which would logically explain the resurgence of that idea?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. There may be several reasons. There may be different people who have this feeling for different reasons. I have looked at Hitler Germany and many of my friends, you know, and whenever there was a crack and whenever there was conflict or shooting we said, "This is the end of the thing."

So there were a number of people who genuinely believed this. I think there was a difference in the size of a basketball or something, and people disagreed on matters of sport, so some people thought: "Here now, really the whole thing is cracking up. Even on the playgrounds, the rift asserts itself." But there may be much worse rifts without consequence. I think there are people who just genuinely are wishful thinkers.

I have several friends who proved scientifically and mathematically that Germany must collapse, that it cannot conduct a war. It has to fall to pieces; and Hitler couldn't conduct the war. I think there are a number of people now who think wishfully that the enormous Communist axis will crack because conditions are strained. I am sure they are strained, and I am sure the Soviet Russians are not very popular in China. That may be why the Soviet names have been taken off the slogans. But that is no reason to assume that the whole thing may fall to pieces, it has survived much more serious crises. That is an extreme possibility, but I don't think it follows necessarily.

Senator FERGUSON. Does not communism adjust itself to some of these stresses and strains?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Exactly, to many of them, with an enormous vitality. The history of the Comintern is the history of explosions, of conflicts. But it shows an amazing healing capacity, you know, assuring the survival of the general pattern.

Senator FERGUSON. One central figure and one common denominator?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. Gentlemen, I think at this point we had better recess until 2 o'clock. Doctor, you will return at 2 o'clock.

(Whereupon, at 12:30 p. m., the hearing was recessed until 2 p. m. of the same day.)

AFTERNOON SESSION

Senator SMITH (presiding). The committee will come to order.

Mr. Morris, you may proceed with the examination of the witness.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, at the termination of the last session, chronologically, we had gotten as far as Dr. Wittfogel relating his experiences at a certain Communist study group in the summer of 1938. We had mentioned that the school was run by Moses Finklestein and that one of the people at the study group was Lawrence Rosinger who, in the course of conversation with Dr. Wittfogel, indicated he was a Communist.

Who were some of the other students at this study group?

TESTIMONY OF KARL AUGUST WITTFOGEL, NEW YORK, N. Y.—Resumed

Dr. WITTFOGEL. There was a talented and pleasant young man who was studying in the Japanese Department at Columbia. His name is Herbert Norman.

Mr. MORRIS. Was he a member of this study group?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. To your knowledge, did he know it was a Communist study group?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Yes, it was obvious.

Mr. MORRIS. To you?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. I think it was obvious, in general.

Mr. MORRIS. Was it obvious therefore that he was a Communist?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Mandel, I wonder if you would introduce into the record, first of all, a letter that would indicate Herbert Norman's association with the Institute of Pacific Relations?

Mr. MANDEL. I have here a letter taken from the files of the Institute of Pacific Relations, dated May 30, 1940, from Edward C. Carter to Owen Lattimore. It reads as follows:

Herbert Norman was in the office about a fortnight ago on the even of his sailing for Tokyo as language officer in the Canadian Legation. He is very eager to continue active contact with the institute and in the field of Japanese political history. He would like to do some writing on the key figures of the Meiji period.

I am sending a copy of this letter to Holland as it may be that he will see ways of using Norman on writing that might not be quite within the scope of Pacific Affairs.

I think that Norman may be able to do some writing for Pacific Affairs on contemporary matters, providing he writes under a nom de plume.

I imagine that by now you have read his inquiry book, Japan's Emergence as a Modern State. This is probably the most fundamental study that has yet appeared in the inquiry series. I am hoping that all of us may find some way of continuing Norman as a contributor to the IPR publication program in one form or another.

Sincerely yours,

EDWARD C. CARTER.

Mr. MORRIS. That date is approximately 2 years after the episode testified to by Dr. Wittfogel, is it not?

Mr. MANDEL. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. Is there any further material on that series of letters that is pertinent to this?

Mr. MANDEL. There is another letter, apparently a memorandum headed "ECC from WLH." E. C.C. is apparently Edward C. Carter, and W. L. H. is apparently W. L. Holland, and it is dated September 5, 1940. It is on a typed letterhead of the Giannini Foundation, University of California, Berkeley, Calif. I will just read an excerpt from that letter.

Phil is leaving tonight and is taking with him Landon's book on the Chinese in Siam and the major part of Yasuo's Industral Japan. Among the other manuscripts to be sent to him very shortly will be Laura Thompson's book on Guam for the American Council, Wentworth's on Filipino living standards in Hawaii, the new catalog, and Wittfogel's monograph on oriental society. I am hoping to have the two big books by Mills and Keesing published commercially in this country. Phil will be in Japan from about September 18 to October 6, and can be reached care of the Japanese IPR. Any very secret messages might be sent him care of Herbert Norman at the Canadian Legation. Phil will cable us after he arrives about whether the Japanese want him to remain for an extra week or two to help them with their publications, and will also indicate his probable date of arrival in Shanghai. His temporary address in Shanghai, until we hear that he has actually arrived, will be care of the American Express Co.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to offer that in evidence and have it marked as the next consecutive exhibit.

I would like to ask Dr. Wittfogel, however, if he would care to comment on the statement:

Phil will be in Japan from about September 18 to October 6 and can be reached care of the Japanese IPR. Any very secret messages might be sent him care of Herbert Norman at the Canadian Legation.

Dr. WITTFOGEL. I do not think I can.

Mr. MORRIS. You know 2 years previously Herbert Norman was a Communist?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I might say there is nothing in this letter that would indicate on its face who Phil was at this time. We have to check to see who that is.

Senator SMITH. They are received.

(The documents referred to were marked "Exhibit No. 72" and are as follows:)

EXHIBIT No. 72

129 EAST FIFTY-SECOND STREET,
New York, N. Y., May 30, 1940.

OWEN LATTIMORE, ESQ.,

DEAR OWEN: Herbert Norman was in the office about a fortnight ago on the eve of his sailing for Tokyo as language officer in the Canadian Legation. He is very eager to continue active contact with the institute and in the field of Japanese political history. He would like to do some writing on the key figures of the Meiji period.

I am sending a copy of this letter to Holland as it may be that he will see ways of using Norman on writing that might not be quite within the scope of Pacific Affairs.

I think that Norman may be able to do some writing for Pacific Affairs on contemporary matters, providing he writes under a non-de-plume.

I imagine that by now you have read his inquiry book, Japan's Emergence as a Modern State. This is probably the most fundamental study that has yet appeared in the inquiry series. I am hoping that all of us may find some way of continuing Norman as a contributor to the IPR publication program in one form or another.

Sincerely yours,

EDWARD C. CARTER.

GIANNINI FOUNDATION, UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA,
Berkeley, Calif., September 5, 1940.

E. C. C. from W. L. H.:

By air express I am sending you Bloch's Manchukuo manuscript, over which Phil and I have sweated and cursed mightily. We have been so irritated by it at times that it is hard to give a balanced opinion of it, but after duly leaning over backward I think I can safely say that with a little more work and with some very necessary checking of the tables by someone like Kate or Jack working together with Bloch, it can be made into a valuable report.

I enclose a letter to Bloch for you to pass on to him after you have looked over the manuscript or got Kate and Jack to look at it. You will note that my suggestions involve some additional work for Bloch, probably 3 or 4 weeks, and you will have to decide after talking to him whether this could be arranged and at what expense.

Some of the weaknesses in the report derive from the inevitable inadequacies and inconsistencies in the source materials, and no doubt some of the gaps might be filled by a person like Matsuo who has presumably had more recent first-hand acquaintance with developments in Manchukuo. Other weaknesses, however, may be attributed directly to Bloch's apparent carelessness in the handling of some of the statistics and to his very irritating habit of elaborating on some minor incidental aspect of a problem instead of first giving the broad outline in simple, straightforward language. This is particularly noticeable in the chapters on railways and economic planning. A certain number of these intellectual diversions are pardonable, if only because they serve to show up some of the absurdities and inconsistencies in the materials released by the Japanese themselves, but they should not be included at the expense of more elementary information which the general reader will want.

I suppose a good deal of the manuscript will have to be retyped, but there may be some chapters, e. g., on mining and manufacturing, in which our pencilled corrections can be transferred to another carbon copy or written more legibly in ink on the present copy.

I shall leave it to you and Kate to decide whether the manuscript should be submitted to the advisers after the present corrections have been made or only after Bloch has done the additional work I have suggested in my letter to him. There are, of course, some advantages in submitting it now in that Bloch will be able to take account of the advisers' comments in the final revision, but I am afraid that both Dennery and Condliffe would object to the inadequacies of the chapters on foreign trade, railways, and economic planning; and Angus might object to the somewhat critical tone of the whole study. I suspect that Condliffe will be critical of the report anyway, since you will remember that he had some reservations about the wisdom of assigning the study to Bloch or to anyone who had not had recent first-hand experience in Manchuria, and close cooperation from the Japanese. On the whole, therefore, I should personally recommend waiting until Bloch has had a few weeks to amplify and rearrange the study.

I have had a telegram from Yasuo saying that he has been unable to complete the additional sections of his book on industrial Japan, owing to the pressure of heavy business, but that he is trying to finish it in 3 weeks and is writing me. I assume this is in response to your intercession. The additional sections are to deal with Manchukuo, and I would suggest that you ask Yasuo for an extra carbon copy which Bloch can use in connection with his revisions.

I enclose a suggested revision of the editorial note for Chi.

Although I shall have a good deal of additional work to do on Pat Glover's manuscript, on Keesing's book on The South Seas in the Modern World, and on Mills' book on Hong Konk and Malaya, I wonder if there is not another inquiry manuscript which you could send me in the near future, e. g. Tamagna's? Shouldn't you also send another frantic appeal to Colegrove, asking what in the world is delaying his report on the Japanese military?

If it would relieve the load on the New York staff, I should be glad to look after the proofreading of some of the forthcoming inquiry reports, e. g. Fahs, Dietrich, and Taylor. This might involve my employing Mrs. Ward for more than the present 3 days a week.

Phil is leaving tonight and is taking with him Landon's book on the Chinese in Siam and the major part of Yasuo's Industrial Japan. Among the other manuscripts to be sent to him very shortly will be Laura Thompson's book on Guam for the American Council, Wentworth's on Filipino living standards in Hawaii, the new catalog, and Wittfogel's monograph on oriental society. I am hoping to have the two big books by Mills and Keesing published commercially in this country. Phil will be in Japan from about September 18 to October 6, and can be reached care of the Japanese IPR. Any very secret messages might be sent him care of Herbert Norman at the Canadian Legation. Phil will cable us after he arrives about whether the Japanese want him to remain for an extra week or two to help them with their publications, and will also indicate his probable date of arrival in Shanghai. His temporary address in Shanghai, until we hear that he has actually arrived, will be care of the American Express Co.

Mr. MORRIS. Who else was in this study group?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. That is all I remember.

Mr. MORRIS. Was Daniel Thorner in the group?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. No. I met Mr. Thorner through the head of the group. Mr. Finklestein treated him as a man of his political confidence.

Mr. MORRIS. Thorner himself did not participate.

Dr. WITTFOGEL. He did not. Mr. Finklestein said, "You might give a lecture on China in the history student club; there is our friend Thorner, and I will arrange it with him." Which he did; and I spoke there.

Mr. MORRIS. You did speak there?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. This is during the period when you were still within the Communist periphery?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. That is right. I saw Thorner afterwards. He came to me occasionally. He showed a great interest in Marx's writing on India. He was studying India. He took me once over to the basement of the Columbia Library to show me Marx's articles on India.

In these writings, Marx acted like a Socialist-Fascist and Imperialist. That is, these articles are now particularly abhorred in Moscow. I throw that in to show how complicated the ideological developments are. At that time, I am sure, Thorner wasn't aware of it. He thought this was good, pure, doctrine. We talked it over. I would say his behavior was that of a man who moved along that line. Our talk was not specific.

But there is a little episode I might add. This was during the time of the pact and before Italy entered into the war.

Mr. Thorner came back from India via Italy and France, and I met him on the street. If I had any doubt that he was a Communist, it was removed then. I had been long enough in the movement to know. The card is a question of bookkeeping, and whoever has been near this business knows there are many ways of being connected with this gigantic political machine. The second highest man in the German Communist Party until 1924 is said to have never paid any fee in the early days, Mr. Thalheimer.

Mr. MORRIS. Would you spell that?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. T-h-a-l-h-e-i-m-e-r.

Mr. MORRIS. Your testimony is he never had a card?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. He never paid any dues. This was the episode: Mr. Thorner told me about his experiences. He was very warm about Fascist Italy. This was a fine country, very good. Compared to this things were stinko in France, which was then under the stress of war.

Mr. MORRIS. You mean Italy was a fine country?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Yes. According to the Communist Party line, the main enemies then were England and France, and fascism wasn't quite so bad. After he told me this, I wouldn't say I kicked him off the boardway, but I told him something that you cannot say in Sunday school. For me, I had no desire to see him again. If that is the way he felt about fascism and about the defense of the western world, I had no desire to see him again. This is the end of my experience.

I heard later that he is now in the only institute in America dealing with India, he and his wife, in Philadelphia. I know some other "unpartial" men, like Chen Han-seng have also worked at this institute.

Mr. MORRIS. You say Chen Han-seng was with the institute?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. As far as I remember. Yes, in Philadelphia.

Mr. MORRIS. You say further Thorner was closely associated with Moses Finklestein?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you develop that a bit?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. That is all I know.

Mr. MORRIS. You say closely associated. Politically?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. He was a political friend, I would say.

Mr. MORRIS. Do you know what Moses Finklestein is doing now?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. I think he is teaching history at Rutgers College in New Jersey.

Mr. MORRIS. Under that name, or has he changed his name?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. I think he assumed the name of Moses Finley.

Mr. MORRIS. Did you get your Rockefeller grant?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Yes; I got it early in 1939.

Mr. MORRIS. That was prior to the Hitler-Stalin pact?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. You did get your grant from the Rockefeller Foundation?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. That is right.

Mr. MORRIS. Would you describe to us your reaction to the Hitler-Stalin pact, particularly discussing that portion of your reaction which had to do with these people in the Institute of Pacific Relations whom we have been discussing.

Dr. WITTFOGEL. My general reaction was if the only thing I gave them still credit for, to fight Hitler, if they are washed up even there, then really everything has gone down the kitchen sink of history. That was the general thing. In the institute not much happened. Mr. Field, who by the way, all the time behaved like a gentleman toward me, he lost interest in the institute. He got restless. He wanted to do something else. Finally, he went into this peace mobilization work. I thought he had gone completely crazy. I saw very little of him.

I would like to say as far as the Institute of Pacific Relations handled the technical part of my work, they behaved without reproach. Later on, it came to the publication. This was a big book. Assuming there were some people who did not like the anti-Stalin attitude of social science in this work, I don't think those people were aware of it. It was a nice big book. It looked very scholarly. It was a feather in the institute's cap; I think from the point of view of the book I have nothing to complain.

Mr. MORRIS. When was that published?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. It was finished by the middel of the '40's. It was published very slowly because of the difficulties of printing, in 1949.

Mr. MORRIS. I think we are running a little ahead of ourselves by adverting to it now.

Did you have a controversy or conversation with Joseph Barnes during the Hitler-Stalin pact?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. It was either at the end of the pact or shortly after. I had heard that Barnes had kind of weakened. Some people said "Even Barnes can't stand this any longer and even he seems to be somewhat shaken."

I rang him up several times. I found him not very eager to see me. I was insistent, and we had a conversation. Just by accident, Owen Lattimore was in town. We had a conversation, the three of us. It was one of those attempts, I thought, "Here, you might pull Barnes out of what he has been in. He has been in it, but maybe he has seen the light." I pulled in vain.

I tried to disentangle him, to uproot him as far as I could. I told him many things about my own experience. I have had some experiences which made me very sure that the Comintern engineered the fight between the German Communists and the Social Democrats to confuse the anti-Fascist front, and to bring Hitler to power, not because they were political perverts but because they wanted a big war in the west. They thought this was the way to achieve it. They would have preferred a military conservative government. They took Hitler. He was the lesser evil.

Mr. MORRIS. I wonder if you would develop that? I think it would be pertinent if you would develop that argument that you just alluded to.

Dr. WITTFOGEL. If I may say, and I would like to put this on the record for history and not just for our hearing, this will be a very big issue for years to come, and it will be one thing which the Communists and Mr. Stalin will never live down, if it is fully developed.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you develop it so we will understand the basis of the problem?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. In 1931 to '33, the German Communists were told that the "main enemy" to fight was not fascism and Hitler but it was the Social Democrats. Later they changed the formula from a main enemy to the "main support" of capitalism.

Mr. MORRIS. Do you know that from your own knowledge?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Sure. I was in the midst of it. I have seen the most devastating development. And the people knew what they were doing.

In the summer of '32 I was in Moscow. I will not forget. A man who has become part of modern American folklore—Mr. Gerhart Eisler—stood there. He was a man who goes around claiming he was sent out by the German party, which he never was. And that he was a great fighter against fascism. Actually he took exactly the line against the "Social Fascists" the others took. There was, my old friend, Madjar. He was a Hungarian originally, who wrote the best book at that time about agrarian China in the Soviet Union, and he was full of deviations. Madjar stood in front of the Comintern building. There stood Gerhart Eisler next to him.

Madjar said 20,000 of the best labor leaders in Germany will have to be killed. I said, "What do you mean?"

He said that Hitler has to come to power. His whole face was distorted. There were other people who talked about it the same way. This was the great line of the Comintern, to bring Hitler to power, not because they loved him; they did not. They thought that through him they would get the big thing going.

Mr. MORRIS. When you say, "get the big thing going," what do you mean?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. The big war, which the Soviets would support, the thing which they got going in '39.

So when I heard my friend, Madjar, say this, Mr. Eisler, the great fighter against fascism, stood there, and nodded strongly. So Madjar said, "Come, let's discuss it tonight. Come along, Gerhart." Gerhart didn't turn up. He was a cautious man. That is why he lives so long.

There were many other incidents which made it very clear to anybody, you don't need personal experience. Only sit down for an afternoon and read the Comintern literature from 1931 to 1933. If you look at it under this angle, you will see that one of the great monstrous crimes were committed. I myself thought at first the Russian Communists were just dumb. Gradually, I realized myself that this was a very big strategy to get one of the great wars of modern times going. This took some time, but it succeeded in 1939.

I told Barnes about it. Of course, there was no reason why he should have known all these things, but what interested me was that his reaction was to take up the defense of Mr. Stalin's policy and the Comintern without going into the facts. If he had an open mind, he should have said, "Let's really weigh the facts."

But he pretented to be a man who knew all. I said, "You know a lot about Russia which I don't know, but I happen to know this very well. Let's go over the documentation."

I saw here a man who was fanatical. He stuck by his allegiance to the Comintern which he defended in an abstruse manner. He didn't care about the facts. I got the feeling the man is just a fanatic. That was the end of my contact with Barnes.

Later, when I saw Lattimore and I said, "Is Barnes such a fellow traveler as he was previously?" That was linked up with this episode.

Mr. MORRIS. Do you remember having a clash with Michael Greenberg in the fall of 1941, Dr. Wittfogel.

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you describe that, if that is the correct time?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. This was at a time when Mr. Lattimore had been appointed special envoy or adviser to Chiang Kai-shek.

The Pacific Affairs had to be run by somebody else. I see that technically it was Mr. Carter, but as for the second man it was Mr. Greenberg. As far as I could see, he became the actual editor.

Mr. MORRIS. Do you know who was instrumental in having Michael Greenberg take over the running of Pacific Affairs?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. No; I know nothing about this.

Mr. MORRIS. But at that time you knew Mr. Greenberg was a Communist?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. I had seen him in America before. First, when I saw him he didn't know about my own development. He tried to continue talking in the way in which we had talked in Cambridge about a couple of years ago.

Mr. MORRIS. In 1934?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. That is right. I made it clear I was sorry he didn't develop.

Mr. MORRIS. Away from communism?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. The way I had. So I saw little or nothing of him. When he became the editor or managing editor of the magazine, I had two book reviews written for it that summer. They were thrown together by him in a funny way. I knew they wouldn't like certain points in my reviews. Greenberg certainly wouldn't like them, from his point of view.

Mr. MORRIS. What was his point of view?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. The argument had something to do with the interpretation of Chinese society.

Mr. MORRIS. You knew he wouldn't agree, for the simple reason you had known in 1934 he was a Communist and from all appearances he was still a Communist?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. This was against the Communist doctrine.

Mr. MORRIS. What you had written?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Sure. Anyhow, he published the stuff and threw it together with things which had nothing to do with each other, history of philosophy and some modern stuff. As he edited it, it looked silly, in my opinion.

Then when we had a talk about another book which should be reviewed, I said why don't you let me review the book?

He said, "You know too much about the subject."

I said, "Michael, I think when you come with this argument we are through. When you make this kind of a pretext, I fear we shall not cooperate. I mean, seeing the way you conduct this business, I think that I will never write a line for Pacific Affairs again," and I did not.

Mr. MORRIS. That was in the fall of 1941?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. Did you have any association with Pacific Affairs from that time on?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. No.

Mr. MORRIS. How about Amerasia?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. I have written one article in the first year; none since.

Mr. MORRIS. I would like to introduce into the record, Mr. Chairman, two names that have come in this last portion of the testimony in an excerpt from the Library of Congress.

Mr. Mandel, will you identify that and read the significant names?

Mr. MANDEL. The Legislative Reference Service of the Library of Congress was asked to make for us a study of the research fellows and students in the Walter Hines Page School headed by Mr. Owen Lattimore. They sent this study which is being inserted into the record for 1940 to 1951.

Among those listed as research associates, fellows, or students in seminars, are these two names which appear in our present investigation. One is Dr. Chen Han-seng and the other is Mr. Daniel Thorner. This is dated August 6, 1951.

Mr. MORRIS. I would like to introduce that in evidence and have it marked.

Senator SMITH. It will be inserted in the record.

LEGISLATIVE REFERENCE SERVICE

Washington 25, D. C.

RESEARCH FELLOWS AND STUDENTS IN THE WALTER HINES PAGE SCHOOL, 1940–51

(Compiled by Helen Miller, Government Section, August 6, 1951)

The following list was compiled from the Johns Hopkins University circular and president's reports for the years 1940–51.

The Walter Hines Page School of International Relations is primarily for research into far-eastern affairs. Its personnel consists principally of faculty members and students who have received their doctoral degrees. According to the 1950–51 university circular, "fellows in the Page School are appointed primarily to enable them to undertake independent research work." Consequently the names appearing here were listed as research associates, fellows, or students in seminars. The Legislative Reference Service has written to the Johns Hopkins University for a definition of these terms and a more complete list of students at the school since 1940. Until we have further information from them this list is the best we can submit.

Dr. David F. Aberle.
Dr. William M. Austin.
Miss Ruth F. Bean.
Mr. Schuyler Cammann.
Mr. Chih-yi Chang.
Dr. John De Francis.
Mr. Clive E. Glover.
Mr. John Gombojab Hangin.
Dr. Chen Han-seng.
The Dilowa Hutukhtu.
Mr. Nobutaka Ike.
Mr. Catesby Jones.
Mr. George Mct. Kahin.
Dr. Karl H. Menges.
Dr. Francis Henry Michael.
Mr. Peter Urgunggi Onon.
Dr. Karl J. Pelzer.
Mr. Martin R. Ring.
Mr. Richard Schraml.
Mr. Daniel Thorner.
Mr. Ho Tze-Ch'Uan.
Mr. H. H. Vreeland, III.
Dr. Leo Waibel.
Mr. Thomas G. Wiener.

Mr. MORRIS. Do you recall a dispute you had with Owen Lattimore in the fall of 1944 on the subject of Korea?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you relate that to us?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Our relations had become less and less intense and also less and less cordial. We had more political arguments, which I may bypass for the time being.

I had a long talk with him in 1940, which I think led to nothing. There was some argument in 1942 when I said something like this: "You talk about Russia and about communism without being fully experienced. These are very tricky things. You ought to know your watch when you talk about it." We use the formula for a watch maker. We had an argument on that.

In 1944, when he came back from the trip with Vice President Wallace, I saw him. First we had a cheerful encounted about Mr. Joe Barnes, which made him very angry; then we went to some other matters.

Mr. MORRIS. Angry at you or at Barnes?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. It made Lattimore very angry.

Mr. MORRIS. At you or at Barnes?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. He was angry at me.

It is shown in his letter to me. The fact that I referred to Barnes as a fellow traveler, he thought was very insulting. I shall come back to the correspondence. I said, "You know Joe Barnes talked there about things about which he had obviously no great experience." Lattimore himself took up the argument on Germany. It was very easy to see that he did it with the same light cargo on his shoulders; namely, he didn't know anything about it either. Whereupon I told him so rather bluntly, as we used to do.

He finally said, "O. K. You think I know little about Europe. Maybe I don't, so let's talk about that part of the world where you admit I know something about, namely, the Far East." So we talked about Korea.

Mr. MORRIS. What was the date of this conversation?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. It was October 1944, I think. We talked about possible solutions in the Far East. He said for Korea it would be the best solution, a good conservative solution, if the Soviet Union would take the country over, which upset me very much. I blew up properly and thought this was not exactly the way a representative of the American Government should talk about its interest.

Mr. MORRIS. You say he is a representative of the American Government. What do you mean?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. He was still a official of the American Government. He was still connected with OWI. He was no longer the Deputy Director, but still a member of that Government organization.

Mr. MORRIS. He had just come back——

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Maybe he was too snooty to deal with the State Department. He talked with President Roosevelt and he went around with a Vice President of the United States. These are no small men, it seems to me. He had the right to feel kind of important. I thought this was an extraordinary statement coming from a man of these connections and these responsibilities.

So our conversation ended kind of sadly. He knew I did not take many of his other ideas very seriously, but I thought that in the field of Mongolian, Inter-Asiatic and Chinese relations he had great experience, almost unique experience, I would say. Thus I still maintained the plan to have him supply the introduction to our first volume here which deals essentially with these relations.

We went on with correspondence after that.

Mr. MORRIS. Do you remember having a discussion with him on the disposition of the Mikado?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. This came up at the end of this whole affair. As I said, we tried to patch up our relations from both sides.

Mr. MORRIS. This is after the 1944 conversation?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. In 1944 to 1945. He even sent me his Solution in Asia. I wrote him a nice letter about the book, and said what I wanted for the project. To me he was still a leading expert in this field. I would like to say this here: The fact that Lattimore lacked formal academic training does not impress me.

Mr. MORRIS. Does not impress you adversely?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. As very relevant. I would say if Johns Hopkins gave him a big position, it honors Johns Hopkins.

Lattimore might have trouble today in the Soviet Union, where they are now ridiculously pedant about academic titles and positions, but in a democratic country like ours persons with an unusual contribution may be given unusual opportunities, also in the universities. In my opinion this is something to be proud of, but the generosity should be properly appreciated by him who benefits by it. In Lattimore's case, here was a man who was a real authority in a limited field. This was before he tried to build himself up as a global expert. Here was a man who had been given great trust and shown great generosity—I think that is a conclusion we might draw—but he would have to justify it and not abuse it.

Mr. MORRIS. Do you think he abused that trust?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Yes. But if you will permit me to go on with our story——

Mr. MORRIS. By all means.

Dr. WITTFOGEL. So there was this problem of the introduction. I personally was very unhappy. In my letter of 1945 I was in a great conflict. I did nothing about his introduction. This has been done before in the bureaucratic world. I just let it wait. We went on printing the general introduction. I thought of a way of getting out of his contribution. This finally offered itself by Lattimore asking me, at the end of 1946, whether he couldn't write the introduction. He wrote in such a way that I in my reply could answer, "I think we gave you enough credit. Let's call it a day." Whereupon he said, "No, I would like very much to write the introduction."

He had seen a good deal of the manuscript. It is the work of a group of fine scholars. It is not only my personal work. I may therefore say, it represents good scholarship.

So, a correspondence developed which finally brought in big political matters.

Do you want somebody else to read it?

Mr. MORRIS. No, this is your file. I would like you to make reference to it. These are the copies that we have made up.

Will you identify those as copies of your own letters?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Yes, I do. Let me go back to the letters before these.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to introduce these records that we are referring to in the record. They are going to be made a part of the record.

Senator SMITH. They will be inserted.

(The documents referred to were marked "Exhibits Nos. 74, 75, and 76," and are as follows:)

EXHIBIT No. 74

FEBRUARY 18, 1947.

DEAR OWEN: Your letter of January 29 is very flattering to me, but it places you in a somewhat peculiar light—if I accept your statement of your attitudes.

You know that I have never sought any important political position. In fact, I have refused to consider positions of this kind even when they have been suggested, for, although I as a citizen have taken a deep interest in the commonweal, I do not feel myself fitted for political leadership. You, on the contrary, have held political positions of great responsibility—positions in which your judgment and advice affected vital features of this country's foreign policy. Nevertheless you state that my political opinions are "much stronger" than yours. Do you really think that I, the simple citizen, take political opinions more seriously, than you; the man who occupied important political posts? Do you really mean to say that you voiced important political opinions without holding them strongly?

When you, in conversation with Esther and me after your return from the U. S. S. R. suggested that Korea might advantageously be taken over by the "conservative" forces of Soviet Russia, you certainly expressed a startlingly significant political idea. Did you or did you not mean what you said? When, during the war, you urged the removal of the Mikado, you certainly expressed a politically significant idea, and one which, had it been accepted, would probably have cost hundreds of thousands of American lives. Did you hold these views when you uttered them? Did I, when expressing others, contradict your real opinions or opinions which you really did not hold? (In your letter you remark that I have tried to convert you from opinions "which I do not hold").

You say that I express my political opinions more vehemently than you do. There are probably differences in temperament which manifest themselves as differences in expression. But it seems to me that for a number of years we exchanged many ideas, political and otherwise, without getting into any heated argument. After your trip with Wallace, your tone changed. If I hurt you by my vehemence, I am sorry. Even strongly felt conviction should not be so expressed. There may have been a good reason why I reacted violently to your attitude—and I think there was; but whatever the reason, I certainly do not defend the passion of my expression.

But please examine the substance of your argument in your last letter. If it is difficult to understand what your political opinions are, how can I be sure about your scientific views? There are systems of political ideas, just as there are systems of scientific ideas. To make sense they have to operate—and, can be apprehended, checked, and argued in an orderly fashion. For some time, I have felt that your system of values, scientific as well as political, is not an integrated one. In the past you have made fine scholarly contributions, and I shall never hesitate to acknowledge them; but, in view of your lack of certainty regarding your present ideas, collaboration between us had better wait until they have recrystallized. I am looking forward to the day when I can again talk with you about opinions which you do not only seem to hold, but which you really hold.

Sincerely.

DR. KARL AUGUST WITTFOGEL,
Chinese History Project, Columbia University,
New York City.

DEAR KARL AUGUST: Your letter of February 18 bears out, I am afraid, the opinion which I expressed in my last letter to you—that your ideas and feelings on political matters are more extreme than mine and more vehemently expressed. As examples of trying to convert me from opinions which I do not hold, I cannot imagine how you could have got the idea that I believe that "Korea might advantageously be taken over by the 'conservative' forces of Soviet Russia." As for the removal of the Mikado, I have never argued that America should remove him; my position has always been that American policy should not be committed to support of the Mikado, particularly if there should arise a strong Japanese demand for his removal.

In view of these misunderstandings it is obvious that when we meet we shall get on best if we confine the conversation to those subjects in which I can exercise my respect for your enormous and in some ways unrivaled knowledge.

Sincerely,

OWEN LATTIMORE.

EXHIBIT NO. 76

MARCH 19, 1947.

MY DEAR OWEN: Your letter of February 20 showed me again how far apart we are, not only in our recollection of the spoken word, but in our interpretation of the printed fact.

Regarding the matter of Korea, it will always remain your memory against mine and Esther's and those few friends to whom we repeated, in our dismay, your statement made some minutes previously in the cafeteria of the Social Security Building.

Likewise, our conversation at dinner, just before your Columbia lecture on Japan, regarding your new man, Carter's improper handling of archaeological material of the Southwest (this from archeologists) and my own criticism that he had been equally remiss in dealing with the historical data. Such a blatant scientific deficiency bothered you very little—your answer, semantically not literally, ran something like this: "Oh, I myself have been criticized for bending the facts." Certainly an astonishing response, and a very irresponsible one, from a person of your scientific achievement and academic position. But perhaps you don't remember this incident either—and again it is a question of your memory and mine, your spoken word and mine.

Your statement on the Mikado is something else again. Here you are on record in your book, Solution in Asia, page 189. Here you write:

"If the Japanese themselves decide to do without an Emperor, well and good. If not, we should show that militarism has been so catastrophically defeated that we, the victors, do not need to use the Emperor. He and all males eligible for the throne by Japanese rules of succession and adoption should be interned, preferably in China but under the supervision of a United Nations commission, to emphasize united responsibility. His estates, and estates belonging to members of Zaibatsu families and important militarists, should be made over to an agrarian reform program, conspicuously without his sanction and by order of the United Nations. Eventually, after his death and after a new civil service and a new management of finance and industry have taken hold, the remaining members of the imperial line can be allowed to go where they like. New vested interests will by that time be able to prevent the restoration of a monarchy."

Did you remember this when you wrote me in your last letter, "As for the removal of the Mikado, I have never argued that America should remove him; * * *"?

The question between us is really a simple one. Can we be of scientific value to each other while your opinions are held so lightly, denied so readily, and interpreted so arbitrarily?

Sincerely.

Dr. WITTFOGEL. I mentioned in the preceding letters the difference in our political attitudes. He said, "Your political opinions are much stronger than mine, much more vehemently expressed." Whereupon, I answered.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you describe that letter? That is a letter you have written to Lattimore?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. To Lattimore. He said, "Let's make up our difference. We have a political difference. Maybe we can still go on in our scientific field."

Mr. MORRIS. What is the date of this letter?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. This is February 18, 1947.

Mr. MORRIS. You are writing to Lattimore?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Answering his charge that I hold my opinions so strongly. My letter reads:

Your letter of January 29 is very flattering to me, but it places you in a somewhat peculiar light—if I accept your statement of your attitudes.

You know that I have never sought any important political position. In fact, I have refused to consider positions of this kind even when they have been suggested, for, although I as a citizen have taken a keen interest in the commonweal, I do not feel myself fitted for political leadership. To which I answered, and this is the last letter and the end of my relations as a human being with self-respect to Owen Lattimore:

The question between us is really a simple one. Can we be of scientific value to each other while your opinions are held so lightly, denied so readily, and interpreted so arbitrarily?

He denied not only what he said before two witnesses about Korea, but he denied even what he had printed in his own book. I felt this was a brazen attitude and a complete lack of responsibility.

I decided never to touch that man again. I saw him, however, shortly after that at a conference at Princeton. He addressed me and said: "You were probably pleased that you caught me with the one about the Mikado." I said that I was ashamed rather than delighted, and I was embarrassed by the shabby way in which he made this concluding remark; which, by the way, was heard—I think—also by Professor Taylor. I was deeply ashamed. It was something that was very undignified. It was something which I do not think I care to experience either in personal or political relations.

I think this was a brazen way of handling key political matters, matters of great importance, and it should give pause for thought to all those who consider the Lattimore cult a part of their citizenship activities.

Mr. MORRIS. Doctor, have you found in Owen Lattimore's writings any terminology that would demonstrate his intrinsic devotion to Communist interpretation?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Generally speaking, he has avoided the jargon. I have seen that letter of——

Senator FERGUSON. Do you care to comment on that whole letter?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. I think I have not much to add. I think the newspapers have well commented on it.

Senator FERGUSON. What is your comment about it? You were talking about "jargon" and the use of language.

Dr. WITTFOGEL. It would show obviously how somebody tries to proceed along certain political lines without showing himself. There would be a technical term for it. Proceeding in a pro-Communist way without "exposing yourself"; this would be the technical Communist Party term for such an attitude.

Senator FERGUSON. Is that a Communist philosophy or trait?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. I think that is a general line of procedure, of course. If you work as a man who does not come out openly as a Communist—Mr. Foster and Browder would not work that way—but people who officially pretend to be something else, would speak that way. It is a division of labor.

Senator FERGUSON. Is that a strange method?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Yes. You would say it is the method which would be used by those elements of the periphery who are really closely coordinated and integrated into the movement, but who try to promote the advantages of the movement without exposing themselves. As a matter of fact, I remember that once Owen said to me. "You know, Karl August, I never read Marx, because if I don't read the stuff nobody can ever accuse me of using the Marxist jargon when saying anything pro-Soviet."

Senator FERGUSON. Who said that?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Mr. Lattimore. So he avoided even learning the jargon in order not to become too conspicuous. It was somewhere around 1938 or 1939.

Mr. Morris asked me whether there were instances in which Mr. Lattimore had taken up the Communist terminology clearly and openly. In answer to this, I would like to read a few lines. Before

Mr. Lattimore went to Russia with Henry Wallace in March of 1944, he wrote a review article for Pacific Affairs called a Soviet Analysis of Chinese Civilization. In this article he goes over a number of articles written in this symposium which looks at Chinese society and culture obviously from the point of view of several disciplines.

He says here on page 83:

Here, of course, it is to be expected that a Communist writer has paramount Communist theses to maintain.

He enumerates a few, something about Lenin, and then he comes to Stalin. He mentions—

Stalin's definition of foreign imperialism in China as a force which supports, inspires, cultivates, and conserves feudal servivals.

Senator FERGUSON. What year was that?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. March 1944—and the entire bureaucratic-militaristic superstructure.

The term "feudal survival" is absurd. It has become a standard formula as Stalin's description of Chinese society. How a society can consist of survival, I will not go into, but anyhow, this as a key formula of Stalinism.

Owen Lattimore in 1944 recognized it as such and listed it among the "paramount Communist theses" to be maintained by Communist writers.

In another part of this article, he says,

The social data are somewhat obscured by loosely used terms like "semi-feudal" and "feudal survivals."

This was in 1944.

Senator FERGUSON. Was the Communist line in China that they had a feudal government, a feudal system?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. That is right, but by "feudalism" they meant something no human being ever thought of. They didn't think of feudal knights and serfs. They talked just about the tenancy system.

Senator FERGUSON. In other words, when they described tenants, they called that a feudal system. When an experienced man in government speaks of feudalism, he goes back to the lord and the manor and the serfs, and the big estates.

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Yes.

Senator FERGUSON. In other words where the economical, the political, and the military system was under the state. That was feudalism?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. A unified system of these institutions. That is right.

Senator FERGUSON. Does Stalin claim his system of government is new and has no roots?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. No precedent in history, and here comes the catch and the clash with the contention of most real social scientists about countries like China and India. They say that there, with powerful bureaucratic machines, bureaucracy is a ruling class and property plays a secondary part. By concentrating the whole problem on what they call "'feudal" land ownership, the Communists focus the energy of the peasants to the property question, and divert it from a ruling bureaucracy which they have had in the past and which the Communists intend to establish everywhere in the future. The term

"feudal" is a technique to concentrate the energy of the restless masses on the property question and not to see the enormous danger of what Lenin once called a bureaucratic monster state. This is a very handy term. It confuses the situation. It concentrates. It manipulates the energy in a way which is useful for the destruction of the old order without endangering the masters of the new, those who want to benefit from it by setting them up as the masters of the new state apparatus, what I call the new apparatchik society.

The term "feudal" is a wonderful cover term. Lattimore, in 1944 described it as still quite openly as part of the Communist outfit.

Senator FERGUSON. Is "agrarian reform" a similar term now being used?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. The Communists usually talk about agrarian revolution, not reform. What they undertake really is a revolution, not a reform. It would be much better to call this violent change in rural conditions an agrarian revolution, which it really is. I think the use of the term "land reform" was just one of those ways of selling it, of making it look nice.

Mr. MORRIS. The technical terminology would be Communist revolution rather than Communist reform?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Yes.

Lattimore's statement talks about the "feudal survivals" being one of the paramount Communist theses to be maintained by Communist writers, and then a statement that these terms are not good, that they obscure somewhat, completely confuse the social data. That means they are harmful for the social scientist. In this study which was made under Mr. Lattimore's direction by the members of the Walter Hines Page School on Sinkiang on which a preliminary résumé published in the Far Eastern Survey on March 10, 1948——

Mr. MORRIS. That is 4 years later than the previous communication?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. That is right.

We find it says it was directed by Owen Lattimore and included among others: Chen Han-seng, and John De Francis, and Daniel Thorner.

So you find here in the part about economic conditions a description of the situation in which you find reference to the "semifeudal" agrarian relations.

We find later on a description as to the relations between landlords and rich peasants, agricultural laborers and tenants who are "semifeudal." You will not be surprised also to hear that the relations between the two groups of this system, namely, the two types of lands, are the "survival" of feudal lands. So you find your survival of feudalism appears here quite cheerfully.

Mr. MORRIS. That is in Lattimore's writing?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. This is a study which he directed and which was published by his school under him.

Mr. MORRIS. Would you mind reading a pertinent sentence or two that would indicate that for the record?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Some of these are long.

Mr. MORRIS. Just parts of them, then.

Dr. WITTFOGEL. (reading):

Cultivation of this idle land depends on solution of correlated problems (a) irrigation projects, which are dependent on railway construction; (b) deficiencies of livestock and fertilizers and of water supply; (c) the development of a substitute fuel supply—

All these are rather technical points, the way they are treated here, and then (d) semifeudal agrarian relations.

This is the only term which deals with the over-all agrarian situation.

I see the term "semifeudal" in the following context: "Land distribution among various rural groups classified according to economic status." The report then goes on with statistics and says:

The relation between landlords ("ba") and rich peasants, on one hand, and agricultural laborers ("bivantel") and tenants ("dikhan") on the other hand, are semifeudal.

Furthermore—

mention must be made of the institution of "mulk and'wakf". The former is the survival of feudal land granted by the former ruling Khans with attached "chakar" or serfs.

Mr. MORRIS. I think that is enough on that.

Mr. Mandel, in connection with Daniel Thorner, about whom there was just testimony, I would like to introduce into the record, Mr. Chairman, a letter dated June 2, 1942, from Catherine Porter to Edward C. Carter.

I wonder, Mr. Mandel, if you will vouch for the authenticity of that letter and read it into the record?

Mr. MANDEL. This is a photostat of a letter from the files of the Institute of Pacific Relations. It is dated June 2, 1942, and it is entitled "Memo to E. C. C. from C. P.," presumably Catherine Porter and E. C. C. is presumably E. C. Carter. It reads:

My 4 days in Washington last week were fruitful in ideas if nothing else. Several things came up which Bill Lockwood has suggested that I pass on to you.

1. W. Norman Brown (British Empire section of the COI, Library of Congress Annex), whose specialty is India, was full of good intentions and would very much like to see some arrangement made whereby an organization like the IPR would have access to material and personnel in the various Washington departments——

Mr. MORRIS. What is COI?

Mr. MANDEL. That stands for the Coordinator of Information.

He is going to suggest to someone in the Office of Facts and Figures that they consider making the IPR a semi-official channel for releasing certain information to the public. This was his own idea, and coming from him it might carry some weight.

I spent quite a while with Bill Carter in the hope that some way could be found of securing for the IPR such releases as the monitoring department can distribute. Bill felt that the only way that such an agreement could be made would be by an important IPR person making an appeal directly to MacLeish or someone of equal importance. Bill realizes that the IPR would make far better use of the releases than some of the newspapers which evidently do get the benefit of this service. It does seem ridiculous that an office like ours has to depend upon newspaper stuff at second or third hand.

Would you be willing to write to MacLeish presenting the problem which the IPR is facing now that it is cut off from most far eastern news, and ask whether it would be possible for certain information secured through the monitoring service to be released to us for use in the Survey, Pacific Affairs, et cetera?

2. The people who are working on India seemed to show more interest in IPR and its potentialities than anyone else I met in Washington. Eric Bee-

croft (Board of Economic Warfare) talked to me at length about his desire to see the Far Eastern Survey and other institute publications give adequate attention to India. He thinks it important that we add a scholar on India to our staff and raised the question of making such an appointment. Having in mind the possibility of a Rockefeller fellowship for such a person, I asked Beecroft whether he could suggest any candidates. He mentioned (I suppose this should be treated confidentially) Daniel Thorner who is in the COI working under Brown's direction. Brown has an extremely high regard for Thorner, and Beecroft thinks he is one of the most promising young men in the country. He does not know—

It is not clear here, but resuming the quotation—

background beyond the fact that he is a New York man, that he studied at Columbia and he wrote his thesis on the history of Indian railways in relation to the progress of industrialization in India. Beecroft says that Thorner probably knows more about the transport problem in India than any other person in this country.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, that is the Daniel Thorner we have had testimony on here just a short while ago.

Mr. MANDEL. (reading):

It is Beecroft's notice that a fairly attractive offer here would wean Thorner away from his present Government job. (Beecroft is not sure what Thorner's present salary is. He thinks it is probably $2,600 or $3,200. I have discussed this somewhat briefly with Bill Lockwood. He is a little uncertain about the second fellowship for the American Council staff. If this fellowship could be made available, or if you could find it possible to give Thorner a secretariat appointment, it would certainly mean a great deal to the IPR program for the the next year.

3. I was very much interested to find a large number of our friends in Washington bemoaning the fact that the whole IPR was not located in Washington, or at least that a branch office was not in full operation there. Several people mentioned to me the dinner meeting which was called by Graves on May 13 to discuss the whole problem of India and the presentation of information about India in this country. Every person who attended that dinner was delighted that the opportunity had been given him, and said quite honestly that if it had not been for Graves' action, they would probably not have sought the opportunity to discover what other departments of the Government were doing in their field of particular interest. It was pointed out that an active IPR office in Washington could do a great service by calling together frequent meetings of this kind. I wish it were possible for our staffs to have someone in Washington full time. We are certainly missing opportunities of service to ourselves and of usefulness to others.

All in all, it is very heartening for a member of the IPR staff to discover how highly the organization and its publications are regarded everywhere in the Capital City.

Mr. MORRIS. I would like to introduce that in the record.

Senator SMITH. It will be inserted.

EXHIBIT No. 77

JUNE 2, 1942.

Memo to E. C. C. from C. P.

My 4 days in Washington last week were fruitful in ideas if nothing else. Several things came up which Bill Lockwood has suggested that I pass on to you.

1. W. Norman Brown (British Empire section of the COI, Library of Congress Annex), whose specialty is India, was full of good intentions and would very much like to see some arrangement made whereby an organization like the IPR would have access to material and personnel in the various Washington departments. 3. I was very much interested to find a large number of our friends in Washington bemoaning the fact that the whole IPR was not located in Washington, or at least that a banch office was not in full operation there. Several people mentioned to me the dinner meeting which was called by Graves on May 13 to discuss the whole problem of India and the presentation of information about India in this country. Every person who attended that dinner was delighted that the opportunity had been given him, and said quite honestly that if it had not been for Graves' action, they would probably not have sought the opportunity to discover what other departments of the Government were doing in their field of particular interest. All in all, it is very heartening for a member of the IPR staff to discover how highly the organization and its publications are regarded everywhere in the Capital City.

Mr. MORRIS. Now, Dr. Wittfogel, what have you done in the last 10 years to express your opposition to the Communist movement of which you were an organized member and from which you gradually broke away, according to your testimony, finally in 1939? Would you give that information to the committee?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. I shall be glad to. But first I would like to add one more remark to this "semifeudal" and "feudal survival" business. I want to avoid the impression of narrow word catching.

In an active fight against Communist ideological infiltration the thing which should be avoided at all cost is emphasis on symptoms without studying them. There are persons who might use the term "feudal" about agrarian Asia without knowing any better and living in the innocence of paradise. It would be terrible if anybody would do any harm to them and would accuse them of any Communist leanings or indoctrination.

But a man like Lattimore who for years has studied these things—he has discussed them with his friends, they are in his letters to me, and he presents them as communistic criteria in his own life—when such a man turns around and in a weak moment comes forth with such terms that has a political significance.

I think it is very important to see both this specific significance and to avoid any danger of drawing political conclusions from the naive use of the terms without examining the circumstances.

Mr. MORRIS. What have you done personally to express your opposition to the Communist movement?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Since the last 12 years, since the last ties between me and the Communist fringe have been broken——

Mr. MORRIS. And, Mr. Chairman, I would like this record to show that this question searches for information on the general phenomenon of how long it takes a man to break away from the Communist Party and what he can do and how effective such a man is who has broken away from the Communist Party if he has genuinely determined to take a stand in opposition to it. That question bears on evidence relating to that point.

Dr. WITTFOGEL. I do not know whether I will live up to this description, but after a long period of preparation, which I will not go into—I think I will do that later—I had thoroughly worked through the main points that made me break on the political and ideological issues.

First, during the war I concentrated myself primarily on reorganizing the project from an essential translation project to a project of interpretation and translation. The Rockefeller Foundation was extremely generous in letting me make that change. You will find in this interpretation, many of those great ideas of real social science which Mr. Stalin and his ideological henchmen tried to destroy. I concentrated essentially on developing this scientific work in a way which I considered my possibility and my duty.

However, I was not altogether idle politically. I supported personally somebody who in the United States has done more than anybody else during the war in the field of German anticommunism. That was Ruth Fisher, who was very modestly and personally aided by myself at that time—she did a great deal to discredit and shake the Free German Committee which was set up here parallel to the Moscow and Mexican committees of the same type.

I hoped that my advice might be of some use. Obviously the Institute of Pacific Relations had some use for men who eventually worked in the historical field, such as Mr. Norman. I was invited only to one of the IPR conferences. This one took place in the fall of 1941. This was, by the way, the time I had an argument with Greenberg. I knew that the Communists were building up the line, "We must get the Mikado, we must make no compromises concerning the Mikado." This I considered a suicidal policy.

It would cost millions of American lives because, I feared, the Japanese might just die en masse in order to defend what to them seemed very sacred. So I took the line we should not make the Mikado a special issue, and we should understand the particular religious and psychological aspect of the matter.

This was the last contribution I made to any IPR conference. I was never invited after that.

I may now come back to a point I made this morning, and that is that Mr. Carter at the beginning had taken an interest in my Communist past. I heard that the same day he had talked to a Communist friend of mine, Maurice Dobbs, one of the prominent Communists and an organized Communist.

Mr. Carter saw him immediately after he had seen me, Professor Dobbs told me that. Mr. Carter asked him whether Mr. Wittfogel is persona grata with the Soviet Union. Whereupon Maurice Dobbs answered as far as he knew Wittfogel has some academic argument there. This was a reference to my disagreement on the interpretation of Asia, but otherwise, he is persona grata. I have not heard that Mr. Carter has ever tried to find out whether I was persona grata with the American Government.

I said that this Mikado question should not be made an issue. In doing so, I took as my criteria what should be to the benefit of this country and the American GI's who were dying there en masse. But that was the end of my political contribution to IPR conferences.

I spoke and advised many friends in the Government who were interested in my views. I may mention Prof. George E. Taylor, with whom I had many discussions about how the Russians treated America as potential enemies and not as people with whom we would be living in harmony ever after.

After the war I have been criticized for my insistence on the Soviet issue by some of my colleagues, but I hope that today many of them see things differently.

I may have been one of the first persons who raised the question among the Orientalists that we have to adjust ourselves to a world which is not one world. We held the first convention of American Orientalists in the spring of 1946, and the president of our professional organization discussed the lessons of the war.

In my own paper I took the line that the Orientalists have to become realists and to be aware that we are not going to live in one world, but maybe in five, three, and possibly two; and that we might as well prepare for that.

Year by year I have tried to show we cannot work in the modern field of oriental history and study what is going on in modern times without understanding communism in general and without understanding the connection between the various countries and the Soviet Union.

We had a bicentennial meeting in Princeton in 1947, where I tried to bring this out very strongly. Mr. Lattimore was there, and Mr. Chen Han-seng, but neither of them argued with me.

I think it was in 1948 in Philadelphia at a meeting where the majority of the speakers like Rosinger and others neglected the aspect of America's security. What I tried to recommend seemed to appeal strongly to the students. I may say this because it shows that the question of our intellectuals is somewhat more hopeful than our pessimists think. I said when looking at China, we might look at the security of this country, and we should defend China even though the Nationalist Government is a weak government with enormous mistakes and weaknesses. It is still better to defend this Government and to keep it out of the Soviet power system and strengthen the other side. The students understood it without difficulty, but many more mature minds still had a few years to go before understanding the point.

In my talk at the State Department I tried to expose the Tito illusion; "Let us be nice to the little Chinese tiger, and it will not develop into a big tiger but into a pussycat." I argued that this is not the proper type of applied zoology.

At the end of the year, together with some of my friends in Seattle, I wrote a memorandum which was officially sent by the Seattle IPR, to ask IPR in New York to remove Mr. Rosinger from his position as research secretary, or whatever it was. The memorandum was of no avail.

From 1949 to 1951 in articles, reviews, speeches, besides my scientific work proper, I have continued to combine the interest in our field with the full awareness of the present political situation—the very dangerous situation in which the Western World in general and America in particular lives at the moment. The memorandum to the State Department which I wrote in the fall of 1949 was part of these efforts.

In 1950-51 I went on lecturing about the problem of how to recognize the methods of the ideological war as conducted by the U. S. S. R. Our friends the biologists have no difficulty in recognizing the absurdity of the Soviet position. They handled the Lysenko attack very nobly and very clearly without witch hunting and in an efficient manner, because they had studied the material. They were fully masters of the situation, and in a powerful and convincing way settled it. They do not close the door to new ideas, which I think we should never do. Any new terms, any new idea, even if they occur also in the Soviet Union, I am sure, freemen in a free society should discuss freely.

But we should get no counterfeit money in our field. We should learn how to recognize counterfeit. The greatest freedom of ideas provides the opportunity for constructively exerting the greatest vigilance. This has been my attitude throughout these years. This is what I have to say about myself.

Mr. MORRIS. I would like to incorporate by reference the History of Chinese Society and I also would like to introduce at the same time excerpts from a commentary of various scholars on that project. I would like to incorporate that by reference into the record today.

STATEMENTS MADE CONCERNING THE HISTORY OF CHINESE SOCIETY, LIAO

C. Martin Wilbur, Columbia University, American Anthropologist, July–September 1950: "One of the great contributions made in America to far-eastern history * * * "

Esson M. Gale, director, International Center, University of Michigan, letter: " * * * most important contributions on the highest scientific level, to knowledge of a significant era in Chinese and central Asiatic history."

Woodbridge Bingham, University of California, Far Eastern Quarterly, May 1950: "The book under review presents for the first time in any Western language a whole Chinese dynastic period with detailed material drawn directly from the basic sources and arranged in categories so as to explain the functioning of its society."

Homer Dubs, Oxford University, England, letter: "You have indeed opened up an almost new field and done it effectively."

W. F. Albright, Johns Hopkins University, Bulletin of American Schools of Oriental Research, December 1949: " * * * a volume of extraordinary interest and importance for Orientalists in general, far outside the field of Sinology proper. Practically everything of interest to any branch of the social sciences has been classified and interpreted. Nothing comparable is as yet available in near-eastern fields, so the volume before us is a challenge as well as a stimulus."

William E. Lingelbach, American Philosophical Society, Philadelphia; former head of department of history, University of Pennsylvania, letter: "Returning to your history, I am more convinced than ever that it will revolutionize the approach to Chinese history, especially the use of the literary histories. That this will make for a more intelligent understanding of present-day China is, I believe, certain, despite tragic development in recent years * * * I wish our foreign policy in the Far East savored more of the real understanding of the background and its tremendous importance, such as you and your associate, Feng Chia-sheng, reveal."

George P. Murdock, Yale University, letter: "You are doing a job which, in my humble opinion, promises to be more valuable than all the social philosophies written since the beginning of time rolled into one."

Clyde Kluckhohn, Harvard University, letter: "It is clearly something unique in the history of scholarship—the first really firm social-science analysis of a large historical period."

Fred Eggan, University of Chicago, letter: "It should put Chinese studies on a new plateau."

George Sarton, editor, Isis, Harvard University, letter: "You have raised Chinese historiography up to a higher level."

R. H. Tawney, University of London: "Your work should effect a revolution in Chinese scholarship, and have a most beneficial effect not only on that but on historical studies in several different fields."

K. Grønboch, University of Copenhagen, Denmark, Acta Orientalia, XX1, 2, 1951: "The book is invaluable to students both of Chinese history proper and of the nomad empires, and will for many years remain the standard work on its subject."

Bertold Spuler, University of Hamburg, letter: " * * * a monumental achievement which opens up completely new paths for the writing of Chinese history and generally for the fruitful use of oriental sources."

S. Wada, Tokyo University, letter: "The History of Chinese Society, Liao, published under your editorship, is believed to be one of the greatest achievements America ever made on the studies of far-eastern history."

Mr. MORRIS. The next witness will be Dr. George Taylor.

Senator SMITH. Do you solemnly swear the testimony you shall give at this hearing being conducted by a duly constituted subcommittee of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary shall be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, so help you God?

Dr. TAYLOR. I do.

TESTIMONY OF PROF. GEORGE EDWARD TAYLOR, DIRECTOR, FAR EASTERN INSTITUTE OF THE UNIVERSITY OF WASHINGTON, SEATTLE, WASH.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you give your name and and address to the stenographer?

Professor TAYLOR. My name is George Edward Taylor. The address is the University of Washington, Seattle, Wash.

Mr. MORRIS. What is your present position, Dr. Taylor?

Professor TAYLOR. My present position is director of the Far Eastern Institute of the University of Washington.

Mr. MORRIS. How long have you held that position?

Professor TAYLOR. That particular position since 1946, but I have been a professor there since 1939.

Mr. MORRIS. Now, Dr. Taylor, could you tell us what degrees you have achieved by way of education?

Professor TAYLOR. Most of my education was in England where I got the M. A. degree. I was reeducated in America at Johns Hopkins and Harvard Universities. That is the extent of my formal degrees, but not the end, I trust, of my education.

Mr. MORRIS. Now, Dr. Taylor, when did you join the Institute of Pacific Relations?

Professor TAYLOR. I joined the institute in March of 1941.

Mr. MORRIS. At whose invitation?

Professor TAYLOR. That I don't recall, sir.

Mr. MORRIS. You do recall that you joined in 1941, however?

Professor TAYLOR. I checked on that by ringing up the office.

Mr. MORRIS. Dr. Taylor, have you heard complaints while you have been a member of the Institute of Pacific Relations that it is Communist-influenced or Communist-controlled?

Professor TAYLOR. Yes, sir. I have heard many people say that there are Communists in the IPR, and some people have even thought of it as being controlled, and some as not.

Mr. MORRIS. Is there any way that you as a member of the IPR could conclude with any degree of satisfaction that there are Communists in the IPR?

Professor TAYLOR. It is an extremely difficult thing to do, Mr. Morris. I have always operated for a very long time on the general principle that the Communists will infiltrate anything from a Sunday school to the FBI and that when you remember that Lenin's right-hand man was planted there by the Czar, one can believe almost anything. I have therefore taken it as a general principle that the IPR is not likely to be left aside by our friends, who are looking around for a good thing to infiltrate, but the question of deciding how, in what manner, is extremely difficult.

Mr. MORRIS. Now, Dr. Taylor, have you ever been a member of the Communist Party?

Professor TAYLOR. No, sir.

Mr. MORRIS. Is there any way you could have of conclusively determining whether a person was a Communist unless you had been a member of the Communist Party or else he had told you he had been a member of the Communist Party?

Professor TAYLOR. I took the precaution of cultivating the friendship of a fairly large number of ex-Communists, and I found in talking with them I enjoyed their anti-Stalinist conversation, and I found in talking with them I got certain cues and sometimes actually precise information as to who has belonged in a certain area and who does not, but in direct answer to your question, Mr. Morris, one has to look as through a glass, darkly.

You have to build up a frame of references as to what the Soviet Union is after in general, what its relationships are to parties in the rest of the world, how they operate in general and how they operate in particular. Then you have to study your own field. You have to find out—and there are ways of doing this, of course—you have to find out what the general party line is on a given subject at a given time.

Then in the areas you know best you examine a man's writings and by what he leaves out sometimes as well as by what he puts in you decide whether he is dealing with all the facts that he should know if he knows anything about it at all or whether he is angling them in any particular manner.

Obviously with that type of interpretation it is extremely difficult to say exactly where a man would be in the hierarchy, how far away from the sun he would be, but you can, I think, with reasonable assurance over a given length of time decide whether certain people are following a consistent line or whether they are not.

Mr. MORRIS. That is the secondary test really. The first test would be to talk to somebody who was in the Communist Party and let them tell you who was in it; otherwise, you have to use a standard such as yours?

Professor TAYLOR. Or both.

Mr. MORRIS. Or both?

Professor TAYLOR. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. Now did you have any encounters with members of the IPR during the last 10 years by which you applied the standard you just described and therefore have been able to come to a conclusion satisfactory to your own purposes? For instance, did you have a conversation with Frederick V. Field in which you were able to apply such a standard as you described to us?

Professor TAYLOR. There is on the record, Mr. Morris, a written conversation with Mr. Field.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you describe what that is?

Professor TAYLOR. We had a certain dispute in 1942 as to whether a book I had written was any good or not. Mr. Field wrote a somewhat critical review of it, which he is thoroughly entitled to do, in Pacific Affairs, and attacked the book, which was called America in the New Pacific, and attacked it I think mainly on the point that I had described the war we were in as four wars rather than one war.

The general line at the time of course was that this was one war, war against Fascism. I said that there were four wars wrapped up in one.

Mr. MORRIS. When you say general line, what do you mean by that?

Professor TAYLOR. The Communist Party line, and it has been adopted by a good many other people, too.

I argued that the first war was a war between democracies and Fascist Axis. The second war—and this is where we came to grief—was a war between the two competing totalitarian revolutions, that between Germany and Russia. This was not to be mixed up with the first war.

The third war was the struggle between the colonial countries to take advantage of the situation to recover their independence.

The fourth war was the war in which the Fascist and Communist countries were gobbling up the little fellows that they found around them.

The main point of Mr. Field's review was that this way of presenting and analyzing the situation was divisive—the word he used, I believe—was divisive and was making no contribution to the war effort.

The New Masses went so far as to say that the book was worth two divisions to the enemy. I thought they were short-changing me a little, but that was their figure.

I thought that Mr. Field who, though he had been personally very delightful to me, had made his position sufficiently clear, however, by this time without the assistance of any written conflict on my book. So I had to assume that he was certainly acting like a member of the party, and I differed with some of my friends in the institute as to the influence that he would have on the institute.

They felt—and these are two different views—that his views on the Soviet Union had no influence whatsoever upon his work in the institute. I frankly found it difficult and I have still found it difficult to accept that view. That is one example.

Mr. MORRIS. Did you have a similar experience with Michael Greenberg?

Professor TAYLOR. Mr. Greenberg, I was tipped off by Professor Wittfogel here as to his previous party affiliations and therefore was looking for trouble, but is was not very difficult to find. I think a blind man could have found Mr. Greenberg's views very, very quickly. He did not take too much trouble to conceal them.

I would say without any hesitation whatsoever that within a very short time one came to the conclusion that he was following very closely the general party line.

Mr. MORRIS. Was that at the time he was acting editor of Pacific Affairs?

Professor TAYLOR. Yes. On the other hand, he did publish my reply to Frederick Field in the next issue of Pacific Affairs.

Mr. MORRIS. Is there anything more about Michael Greenberg which you could put in the record at this time?

Professor TAYLOR. I was a little surprised to see him turn up in Washington, quite frankly.

Senator FERGUSON. Where did he turn up in Washington?

Professor TAYLOR. He turned up in what was called, I believe, the Board of Economic Warfare. Then he turned up in Lauchlin Currie's office for a period of time. That was the last I saw of him.

Senator FERGUSON. That was in the White House?

Professor TAYLOR. The office was in the Old State Department Building.

Senator FERGUSON. It was connected with the Executive Department?

Professor TAYLOR. Technically.

Mr. MORRIS. You were surprised because of the blatancy of his ideas that he should assume such a high position in the Government?

Professor TAYLOR. I was surprised, yes.

Mr. MORRIS. Did you have an opportunity to observe Laurence Rosinger, who is editor of the latest publication of the Institute of Pacific Relations?

Professor TAYLOR. Professor Wittfogel has already testified that as a trustee of the IPR, which I have been since 1946, and I still am, that as a trustee I sent in to the proper officials a memorandum written by three people, who try to be scholars, which is an analysis of Mr. Rosinger's books. This was done within channels in a purely constitutional manner, and our general argument was that Mr. Rosinger was not an objective scholar. We felt that we had demonstrated this in the memorandum, but Mr. Clayton Lane, to whom it was sent and those with whom he consulted, decided that we were wrong.

The decision has been accepted, but I certainly have not changed my view. In fact, the last publication of the IPR in which Mr. Rosinger had two or three chapters further confirms my view of Mr. Rosinger's lack of objectivity in handling such problems as contemporary China and the Communist movement in contemporary China.

Senator FERGUSON. Along what line do you claim he deviates from the normal channel?

Professor TAYLOR. I would say that in general he is far—I will put it this way, that he gives no sign of understanding the real nature of China's communism or Soviet imperialism in Asia. I find it difficult to believe that he has not had the documents available to him that have been available to the rest of us, and even in this last book there is nothing to indicate the quality and character of the Communist movement in China.

The man who reviewed the book in the New York Times states the thing much better than I can, off the cuff, anyway, in this review he points out how Mr. Rosinger's analysis of the Communist regime is:

> Based on published plans, regulations, constitutions, proclamations, Communist statistics and percentage figures, and is comparable to an attempt to describe the Government of the Soviet Union on the basis of the 1936 constitution. The violent anti-United States propaganda, militarism, Soviet imperialism, and penetration, and the compulsory apparatus to which Mr. Rosinger gives little attention were all apparent even in the honeymoon period to which he limits himself.

That is a perfect example of what you are talking about—the problem of nailing a fellow down when you see that he walks like a duck and talks like a duck and has wings like a duck.

Mr. MORRIS. Dr. Taylor, will you tell us about the project behind that publication? Was there a grant behind that, do you know?

Professor TAYLOR. I don't happen to know. I have the impression that Mr. Rosinger himself was supported by a Rockefeller grant. It is probably on the cover somewhere.

Senator FERGUSON. The name of that book is the State of Asia?

Professor TAYLOR. The State of Asia.

I agree with the reviewer that the book on the whole is an extremely good book. It has a lot of excellent stuff in it. He ends up by saying:

> Mr. Rosinger's chapters, however, must not be allowed to detract from the high standards set by the other writers.

I would add one more criticism to what he says, and that is I really don't see how we can write about Asia today without including the Soviet Union as an Asiatic country. If not the Soviet Union as such, then it seems to me the nature of Soviet imperialism and the connection between the Soviet Union and all the other Communist movements in Asia should certainly come in for slightly more vigorous treatment than it meets at the hands of Mr. Rosinger.

Senator FERGUSON. That book is sponsored by the Institute of Pacific Relations?

Professor TAYLOR. Yes, sir; this is sponsored by the IPR. There was a Rockefeller Foundation grant.

Mr. MORRIS. Is the amount given there, Dr. Taylor?

Professor TAYLOR. No.

I just want to point out that the IPR also published or joined in the publication of my own book in 1942, which was so bitterly criticized by Mr. Field.

Mr. MORRIS. Now, Mr. Taylor, you have testified that you have been a member of the board of trustees in the Institute of Pacific Relations since 1946. In view of your conclusions about the institute and the fact that according to your standards it has been infiltrated, why have you held on so long?

Professor TAYLOR. For several reasons, sir. I think this book is an excellent example. I would say that the proportion of nonobjective work in here is about the same sort of proportion I have always thought there was in the institute as a whole.

In other words, I do not think the battle is lost because it is the sort of battle that never ends. This is going on forever.

Senator FERGUSON. In other words, Doctor, if you pulled out men who think as you do, then there would only be the one side?

Professor TAYLOR. Well, the Communists would take over. What they don't take over they destroy.

Senator FERGUSON. You had a chapter in Washington, did you not, of the IPR?

Professor TAYLOR. I think during the war years there was a chapter, yes.

Senator FERGUSON. Is it now a chapter?

Professor TAYLOR. Offhand I don't know, sir. I don't believe there is one here now.

Senator FERGUSON. I mean in your State of Washington.

Professor TAYLOR. In the State of Washington?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes.

Professor TAYLOR. Yes, sir, we had a very vigorous branch in Seattle, in the State of Washington, which we merged into a World Affairs Council about 6 months ago.

Senator FERGUSON. Why did that chapter in the State of Washington leave the Institute of Pacific Relations?

Professor TAYLOR. I think there were several reasons. I think there was a general tendency all over the country toward these World Affairs Councils of cities the size of Seattle and even bigger.

Another reason, I think, is that the group in Seattle has been at loggerheads to some extent with the main office in New York. Some of that was due to the difficulties that always arise in large organizations. Some of it is due to political differences, the sort of thing we are talking about now, the general feeling that there was far too much nonobjective scholarship getting into IPR publications.

Senator FERGUSON. Did the Communist line have anything to do with it?

Professor TAYLOR. That is what I meant to say then, sir. And I suppose there were financial reasons, the difficulty of maintaining a group together in Seattle with sufficient money to make it worth while. Then the pressure from other people to join the World Affairs Council.

Mr. MORRIS. Did you have any experience at all with Lauchlin Currie during the war?

Professor TAYLOR. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORRIS. That bears on this point?

Professor TAYLOR. Yes, sir. I saw Lauchlin Currie several times. I was trying to remember just when. I imagine it must have been in 1943. I don't recall I had met him before. He had asked me to go over to his office every Wednesday morning, which I did.

Mr. MORRIS. You were then working with the Office of War Information?

Professor TAYLOR. The Office of War Information in Washington. I found out what he wished to talk about was what the OWI was doing in China. He helped me get some film strip for China, I recall, by writing a note on White House stationery, and he was generally helpful.

Then he organized some meetings on China. I have the impression that he had a sort of special assignment to look after China on behalf of the President. He called together people who were in various departments of the Government, the man who was functionally connected with China, and there were somewhat desultory discussions in his office in the Old State Department Building. They occurred I imagine about every 2 or 3 weeks, and then at the end rather suddenly I was requested to write up the discussion on which I had taken no notes. I did this to the best of my ability.

Mr. MORRIS. Was the head of the China section of the State Department John Carter Vincent?

Professor TAYLOR. Yes. I remember he was there once at the meetings. I think his deputy was there at one time.

Mr. MORRIS. Who was his deputy?

Professor TAYLOR. I am sorry, it escapes me at the moment. Then there was somebody from the War Department. They used to send a different man every time—the various departments of the Government.

At the end of the memorandum I wrote a special paragraph of my own in which I recommended that as the chances of Kuomintang-Communist cooperation was negligible, we should provide Chiang Kai-shek with sufficient arms and ammunition to shoot up the Communists even during the war.

Senator FERGUSON. When was that?

Professor TAYLOR. That was about the fall of 1943, I believe. It was a slightly unusual view even for me, I think, but I verified it last night by ringing up somebody who remembered it. My relations with Mr. Currie ended about then.

Senator FERGUSON. Do you think that had anything to do with the ending of your relations with Mr. Currie?

Professor TAYLOR. I don't know, sir. I don't know what was in his mind. He might have thought I was too dumb; he might not have had the time. I cannot say under oath what the timetable was, but it was around about that time I turned up the next Wednesday morning, and his secretary said, "Awfully sorry, he had another appointment," and I got the hint.

Mr. MORRIS. Prior to that time he showed a great interest in you; did he not?

Professor TAYLOR. Yes.

Senator FERGUSON. You had had considerable experience in the Far East, you had been writing on the Far East and so forth, is that not right, and you had charge of that section at that time?

Professor TAYLOR. In the Washington office, yes, I was in charge of the China Section in the Planning Division of the Washington office.

Senator FERGUSON. Did he ever consult with you after that?

Professor TAYLOR. I never saw him again.

Senator FERGUSON. That was the last you saw of him?

Professor TAYLOR. As far as I know.

Senator FERGUSON. You had been with him up to that time every week?

Professor TAYLOR. Weekly, Wednesday morning at 10 o'clock.

Senator FERGUSON. Doctor, we want to thank you for appearing here. Is there anything you want to add by way of explanation?

Professor TAYLOR. No, sir. I would like to say that I think the Institute of Pacific Relations is an organization that has done a very great deal for the far-eastern field and one which I personally hope—some of my friends do not agree with me—I personally hope will survive and be useful again.

Senator FERGUSON. You do feel, though, that where the Communist influence enters an organization, particularly one as important in foreign relations as the Institute of Pacific Relations, it could become a danger to our Nation?

Professor TAYLOR. Yes, sir; but I believe we are in danger everywhere. The American Government is going to be infiltrated just as much as the IPR, the labor unions, and all the rest, and we have to fight the battle wherever we meet it.

Senator FERGUSON. That is why you say it must be eliminated from such organizations?

Professor TAYLOR. I couldn't agree with you more, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Thank you very much.

Mr. MORRIS. I wonder if you would read into the record before you go your analysis of Rosinger's writings. I think you have alluded to it. I wonder if you would leave it here and we can incorporate it by reference as part of the record.

Senator FERGUSON. It will be received as part of the record.

EXHIBIT NO. 80

LAWRENCE K. ROSINGER

China's Wartime Politics, 1937–44. Princeton University Press, 1944 (quoted as Rosinger, 1944).

China's Crisis, Alfred A. Knopf, New York, 1945 (quoted as Rosinger, 1945).

Restless India, Headline Series, No. 55, Foreign Policy Association, 1946 (quoted as Rosinger, 1946).

The three above-listed writings of Rosinger are characterized, as are practically all his writings and speeches, by the accumulation of a great deal of detail and the careful avoidance of value judgments and a cliché terminology. In the discussion of the role of the Communists in China and of their Russian background, there are endeavors to present both sides of a possible argument. However, the objectivity is apparent rather than real. The books of 1944 and 1945 both show him in a number of critical instances either disregarding the obvious connection with the U. S. S. R. or directly denying such connection when factual evidence to the contrary exists and must have been known to him.

I

According to Rosinger, "The first major steps toward internal unity were taken on August 1 and 31, 1935, when the Chinese Communist Party issued two appeals for national resistance to Japan" (Rosinger, 1945, p. 17). The Communist movement is described as essentially domestic in its aspect and motivation. No attempt is made to explain the coincidence of the Chinese Communist turn toward a united front with the corresponding change in the policy of the Communist International in the summer of the same year, 1935. In view of Rosinger's thesis that the Chinese Communists, in spite of their sympathy toward the Russian outlook and purpose, were "for more than a decade and a half" (obviously from 1927 to 1942) "essentially on their own" (p. 94), it would have been highly significant to show whether the strong change in the line of the Chinese Communist Party in 1935 had anything to do with the policy of the Communist International. The reader has a legitimate claim to be informed that an argument exactly like the one promoted by the Chinese Communist Party in August was made at the Seventh World Congress of the Communist International in Moscow in the same summer, 1935.

N. B.—It would also be worthy of Rosinger's attention to see the coincidence of an earlier Communist step toward a united front with the Nanking Government in 1933 and Russia's growing concern in 1932 and 1933 about the threat of a Japanese attack against the Soviet Union. Mao Tze-tung considered the first Chinese offer for a united front sufficiently important to mention it in a speech in 1938. Rosinger's reference to the move of the Chinese Communists "for a united front" in 1933 (Rosinger, 1944, p. 11) neither explains clearly the character of the Communist move nor does it in any way discuss its connection with what Stalin on January 19, 1933, called the "complications in the Far East"—complications which from the Soviet point of view were considered so serious that, according to Stalin's own statement, significant changes in the military sphere of the new second 5-year plan were made.

II

Rosinger describes the "moderate, democratic domestic program that the Chinese Communists adopted in 1935–37" as a program to which they adhered "despite all changes in the foreign relations of the Soviet Union" (Rosinger, 1945, p. 95). In the context surrounding this thesis, Rosinger tries to prove the essentially Chinese-conditioned character of the Chinese Communist policy. Since Rosinger clearly states the importance of this issue, it is a pity that he considered it unnecessary to quote Mao Tze-tung's own statement on the "great concessions" which the Chinese Communists made during this period and particularly in 1937. "Those political concessions were made for the sake of the establishment of the united front * * * for the formation of the united front against the Japanese imperialists, these concessions were excellent and correct" (Mao, 1938).

The connection between the Communist effort to involve the Nanking government in a war with Japan and the effect of diverting the pressure from the Soviet Union was too obvious to permit silencing over. The Russian interest in supporting the Chinese war against Japan in order to ward off a Japanese attack against herself was clearly seen by Harriet Moore, who in the January 1940 issue of Amerasia wrote, "There is a fighting China between the Soviet Union and Japan, and the Soviet Union can thus ward off a Japanese attack by continuing her support of China." Mrs. Moore wrote for the same magazine, Amerasia, of which Rosinger has been a permanent contributor, and it seems most unlikely that he has not seen her analysis. Instead of making unsubstantiated claims concerning the internal change of the Chinese Communist Party, Rosinger should have made the reader familiar with Mao's insistence that this change was conditioned by considerations of the war against Japan and not by any abstract domestic reasons. Whether or not the change in the internal Chinese party line had anything to do with the attitude of the Comintern, Mao in 1938 takes pains to assert agreement between his party and the Comintern and with the defense situation of the Soviet Union, this is such a vital problem and Mrs. Moore's comment of 1940 is so suggestive, that Rosinger's attempt to becloud this vital issue is a highly deplorable feature of his book.

III

Rosinger's praise for Russia's material assistance to the Chinese Government during the first years of the war is highly unrealistic because it does not take into consideration the practical advantages derived by Russia from such an action. It was obviously much cheaper for the Soviet Union to "ward off a Japanese attack by continuing her support of China" than to fight such a war herself.

IV

Rosinger's treatment of the increased friction between the Chinese Communists and the Nanking government and the refusal of the Communists to participate in the session of the People's Political Council in March 1941 (Rosinger, 1944, p. 39) sounds completely incidental, and by implication it is suggested that the change was caused by certain Kuomintang circles losing their interest in remaining allied with the Communists. There is no doubt as to the existence of such a trend within the Kuomintang, but it remains a fundamental weakness of Rosinger's study that it completely disregards the vital changes in the relations between the Soviet Union and Japan which took place exactly at the end of 1940 and early in 1941.

Negotiations between the U. S. S. R. and Japan for the conclusion of a neutrality pact began in July 1940, Matsuoka was in Moscow in March and April 1941, and the pact was concluded on April 13. Rosinger forgets to mention this background when describing the increased estrangement between the Chinese Communists and the Nanking government during this period which culminated in the refusal of the Chinese Communists to attend the People's Political Council in March 1941.

Very little is said by Rosinger about the Russo-Japanese Pact of April 1941 and this treatment may be justified by the fact that neither of the two signatories were Chinese, but it is highly regrettable that Rosinger did not reproduce—or discuss at least in substance—the declaration made by the Chinese Communist Party on the occasion of this pact. It is well known that the pact implied the mutual recognition of Russia's position in Outer Mongolia and of Manchukuo, the Japanese puppet state, that had been recognized so far only by members of the Axis. Mao Tse-tung's earlier expectation, expressed in 1936 in his interview with Edgar Snow, that Outer Mongolia would be part of a Chinese Federation, is silently dropped. While the Chinese Central Government was deeply concerned about what, it feared, might be Russia's indirect recognition of Manchukuo, the Chinese Communists did not find any flaw in the Russian procedure which they on the contrary tried to justify. The Communist declaration stated: "By this treaty the U. S. S. R. has not disappointed and never will disappoint China." The full text of the Chinese Communist statement was reproduced in Amerasia, the magazine to which Rosinger contributed regularly, but his book on China's Wartime Politics does not consider it necessary to discuss the fact and the extraordinary political attitude of the Chinese Communist Party to it.

V

All these features go to show that Rosinger in his two books on China tried to minimize and in part to hide the relations between the policy of the Chinese Communists and the needs of U. S. S. R. power politics. Rosinger's over-all study of recent China (Rosinger, 1945) tries, like his other writings, to bypass critical points without committing himself in one way or the other, but in his larger documentary study of 1944 he indicates on a number of occasions his affinity to the Russian interpretation of Chinese society and history. Rosinger is without doubt fully familiar with the Russian line to avoid the application of the concepts of oriental despotism to Chinese society and to use a "feudal" interpretation instead. But he throws in remarks about Confucius and Mencius as supporters of a "feudal social order," which perfectly fit the Rusisan pattern. His description of those elements particularly interested in the maintenance of the existing Chinese Government places the "rural landlords" before the gentry and officials (Rosinger, 1944; cf. Rosinger, 1945, p. 5 ff.), fully in conformity with the Russian attempt to create the impression that China's ruling class was (and is) predominantly constituted of a landlord class not dissimilar to the western and Russian type. His illustrations for the actual conditions in a Chinese village are taken from utterances of the Moscow-trained son of the Generalissimo, Chiang Ching-kuo, who speaks of "the overpowering dominance of feudal forces of the landed local political bosses and wicked gentry" (Rosinger, 1945, p. 6). Faced with these passages, Rosinger could always answer that in the case of Confucius and Mencius he was only referring to the earlier part of Chinese institutional history and that in the second instance he only quoted somebody else's opinion. This is absolutely correct, but it is characteristic that in the second case he used a Moscow-trained guide and that in both cases he avoided explaining the haphazardly used Soviet type of ideology. Rosinger is fully familiar with the counterthesis, as it was, among others, presented by his friend, Chi Chiao-ting. His avoidance of taking a clear-cut stand in the controversy, as well as his indirect acceptance of the Soviet Russian side of the argument, is indicative both of his glib method of presentation and of his actual stand in the matter.

VI

Rosinger's study of restless India shows the same peculiarities of a carefully shielded adjustment to the Soviet type of analysis. The adherent of the Stalin-shaped ideology has to avoid drawing attention to the managerial-hydraulic functions of Asiatic government and the resulting development of an all-powerful and all-oppressive type of state, oriental despotism. In his India book Rosinger refers to irrigation in such a way as not to give the impression that the direction of public waterworks has been an essential factor of India's traditional society. Irrigation is mentioned as something that occured in prehistoric times (p. 38) and as an element of village economy (p. 43), but not in connection with the structure of government and society. On page 47 the great irrigation projects in two territories are mentioned in connection with recent attempts at modification; that is, not as features of India's traditional society but in the setting of British colonial policy. On page 49 a clear-cut classification of the traditional Indian system of land tenure and taxation is avoided. It is only said that in the areas ruled by native princes "conditions are similar to those existing in Europe under feudalism"; and in explanation of this thesis it is said that "the peasants have to rent virtually every economic right" from the princes and that "there is widespread forced labor." It is characteristic that the connection of this forced labor—obviously state-directed forced labor—is left undefined and furthermore that the only classification reference in the whole argument is to feudalism and to a feudalism similar to a European one. The treatment of India, like that of Chinese society, followed in a veiled manner the basic concepts outlined by the Sixth World Congress of the Communist International in 1928.

Senator FERGUSON. Dr. Wittfogel, did you have anything else you wanted to offer the committee?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. I think you have been very patient.

Senator FERGUSON. Of course, the committee appreciates the appearance of a man before it who has been a Communist and, as it were, bares his soul as a witness. The committee owes thanks to the people who are willing to come in here and testify on the record as they really see things. We appreciate it.

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Thank you very much.

Senator FERGUSON. The committee will recess until Thursday at 10 o'clock.

(Whereupon, at 4 p. m., the hearing was recessed until Thursday, August 9, 1951, at 10 a. m.)

INDEX TO PART I

NOTE.—The Senate Internal Security Subcommittee attaches no significance to the mere fact of the appearance of the name of an individual or an organization in this index.

THURSDAY, AUGUST 9, 1951

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE TO INVESTIGATE THE ADMINISTRATION OF THE INTERNAL SECURITY ACT AND OTHER INTERNAL SECURITY LAWS, OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
Washington, D. C.

The subcommittee met at 10 a. m., pursuant to recess, Hon. Pat McCarran (chairman) presiding.

Present: Senators McCarran, Smith, Ferguson, and Watkins.

Also present: J. G. Sourwine, committee counsel; Robert Morris, subcommittee counsel; Benjamin Mandel, director of research.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will come to order.

The committee has before it this morning General Willoughby. The Chair wishes to say to the general that his fine service in the armed services of the United States and in the Intelligence Department of the Army especially is well known to his countrymen, but never did he render a more worthy service, nor one more needed for the welfare and protection of this country, than to make known to this committee and to the people anything that savors of internal danger to this Government and to the American way of life.

The Chair wishes to congratulate the general for his presence here, and we feel certain that beneficial results will flow from his expression of his knowledge of the subject.

The general will be sworn.

You do solemnly swear that the testimony you are about to give before the subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary of the United States Senate will be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, so help you God?

General WILLOUGHBY. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. You may proceed, Mr. Morris.

TESTIMONY OF CHARLES A. WILLOUGHBY, MAJOR GENERAL, CHIEF OF INTELLIGENCE, FAR EAST COMMAND AND UNITED NATIONS COMMAND

Mr. MORRIS. General Willoughby, will you give your full name and your present military status to the committee?

General WILLOUGHBY. Charles A. Willoughby, major general, on duty as Chief of Intelligence of the Far East Command and the United Nations Command at this present time. I am under retirement procedures for disability and length of service.

Mr. MORRIS. General Willoughby, when do you expect to be separated from the service?

General WILLOUGHBY. Presumably on or about September 1.

Mr. MORRIS. General, what was your last military assignment?

General WILLOUGHBY. I have been General MacArthur's director of military intelligence on his immediate staff since the fall of 1939 without interruption.

Mr. MORRIS. Were you in the Philippines with the general at the time of the Japanese attack?

General WILLOUGHBY. Yes; I was on duty in the same capacity with General MacArthur.

Mr. MORRIS. Did you make the retreat from Bataan to Australia?

General WILLOUGHBY. Yes; I was one of the small group of staff officers selected to accompany him.

Mr. MORRIS. Did you make the subsequent invasion trek back through New Guinea on to the southwest Pacific and back into Japan?

General WILLOUGHBY. Yes; I served throughout this period now known as the Campaign of the Southwest Pacific Area.

Mr. MORRIS. General Willoughby, what position did you hold with the occupation forces in Tokyo?

General WILLOUGHBY. The same as during the campaign, that is, chief of military intelligence with the understanding that the expanded staff of General MacArthur assumed occupation or civil, primarily civil, duties under SCAP, the Supreme Commander of the Allied Powers.

Mr. MORRIS. Now, General Willoughby, how did your duties divide functionally while you held that position?

General WILLOUGHBY. In general terms the division of functions would continue the normal military surveillance but would assume another aspect dealing with the internal security of Japan. A rough distinction would be between military and civil intelligence, and we use that term frequently—that is, the term "civil intelligence."

Senator FERGUSON. In other words, here in the United States the duties of the FBI are the internal security and not necessarily the Army?

General WILLOUGHBY. Yes.

Senator FERGUSON. But over in Japan the Army took on both the functions as if they were active in the capacity of an FBI; is that about what happened?

General WILLOUGHBY. Yes, sir; I concur with your definition.

I would say that under civil intelligence we had developed agencies similar to the FBI in America, known in Japan as the Counterintelligence Service.

Mr. MORRIS. Now, General, while you were occupying that position which you just described, did you come into the custody of the Richard Sorge espionage documents?

General WILLOUGHBY. I did.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you tell us the circumstances of your coming into the possession of these documents?

General WILLOUGHBY. Under the general provisions of the Potsdam declaration we released a number of so-called political prisoners. In that group we discovered shortly that there were the remnants of an international espionage ring who were then serving varied sentences. The foreign nationals who profited by this political amnesty became especially interesting.

One case was that of Max Klausen, who turned out to be the radio operator of this ring. When this man disappeared via the Soviet Embassy, we realized that we were confronted with an espionage case of great significance.

In examining the court records pertaining to this trial—and I may say that it was a trial by civil court unconnected with the Japanese Army or Navy—we encountered a number of American Communists, second-generation Nisei with long residence in California.

Obviously this link with America made it mandatory that we make a thorough examination of this entire operation.

Mr. MORRIS. Now, General, were all the exhibits and all the evidence concerning this espionage ring found in court records or were they to be found some place else?

General WILLOUGHBY. They were initially based on a translation of the court records supported by interrogation by us, postwar, of the judges, the investigating officers, the Attorney General, and other Japanese officials charged with this case.

In addition, we made independent postwar interrogations of the members, that is, the remaining members of this espionage ring, to verify the fact that their statements voluntarily and without pressure by the occupation would coincide with the statements previously rendered to the Japanese authorities.

One notable statement to which I invite your attention is that of Teitchi Kawai, a still living eyewitness to all the activities of the principals in this case, especially Ozaki Hotsumi, Smedley, and Stein.

Senator FERGUSON. Was Smedley an American?

General WILLOUGHBY. Smedley was an American citizen.

Senator FERGUSON. Who was Stein?

General WILLOUGHBY. Stein was a British citizen, acquired citizenship in Hong Kong in 1941, an itinerant journalist of some reputation in oriental affairs who is thoroughly implicated in this case. If the fact is not known to you, he was arrested by the French secret police this spring, the Surrete Nationale, on the advice of the French Embassy. The charges were espionage, and he was deported.

Mr. MORRIS. Did you learn this through official channels?

General WILLOUGHBY. Yes. Like all police agencies, we are in intimate liaison with international police bureaus and there is a continuous mutual exchange of information.

Mr. MORRIS. You say, General, that Guenther Stein was arrested for espionage in France in 1950?

General WILLOUGHBY. Yes, sir. The significance that I personally attach to it is that when the initial report was released in February of 1949, Guenther Stein disappeared and has not been heard of since that period except in connection with his arrest by the Paris police.

Senator FERGUSON. Was Guenther Stein in prison in Japan?

General WILLOUGHBY. No; he was not present at the time the espionage ring came to the notice of the Japanese police; otherwise, he would have been arrested. I will deal with his implication a little later on.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, may I at this point point out that the reason we are stressing Mr. Stein as this particular time, if we are stressing him, is that we had testimony from Edward C. Carter, who was the head of the Institute of Pacific Relations, that Guenther

Stein was the Chungking correspondent for the Institute of Pacific Relations in China, and that in addition he was the British delegate to the Hot Springs conference of the Institute of Pacific Relations which was held in 1945.

There are other activities of Guenther Stein which Mr. Mandel will later in in this session introduce in the record, but the significance of our dwelling on this particular name is that Guenther Stein was one of the IPR personnel whom General Willoughby encountered in his scrutiny of the Richard Sorge case.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the same individual referred to by Mr. Carter?

Mr. MORRIS. That is the same individual, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well.

Mr. MORRIS. General Willoughby, what reason do you have to believe that these Richard Sorge espionage records are authentic?

General WILLOUGHBY. As an investigating officer of some experience, I was of course convinced of their authenticity from the start, accepting the court records as evidence. However, in view of the inferential repudiation of my initial report as of February 1949, the Headquarters in Tokyo decided to go over the entire mass of documents and employing outstanding American, British, and Japanese lawyers then on duty at Headquarters in Tokyo.

I would like to briefly quote, Mr. Chairman, and make reference to the action, opinions, and reports of these lawyers, known as consecutive exhibit No. 12.

Senator FERGUSON. General, you made a report to the Army in 1939 on this espionage case, did you not?

General WILLOUGHBY. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. It received some publicity in America, did it not?

General WILLOUGHBY. So I understand.

Senator FERGUSON. Do you know whether or not that was ever recalled, or what happened to that report?

General WILLOUGHBY. If I interpret your question correctly, Senator, the report was filed by us, meaning the Headquarters in Tokyo, as a normal intelligence or internal security report of which there were many in the period. They decided to publish, to release it because it compared most favorably with the then notorious Canadian espionage case. We made, of course, no objection. Reports, which we file in Washington, are available to them at their discretion.

Senator FERGUSON. At least you figured that the release of this report would not affect adversely our security, either internally or in our foreign relations?

General WILLOUGHBY. I have rather a feeling that it would contribute toward the internal security by unmasking certain techniques, procedures, habits of the clandestine fraternity with which you are dealing.

Senator FERGUSON. So that it was then released; is that correct?

General WILLOUGHBY. It was released.

Senator FERGUSON. Was it ever withdrawn?

General WILLOUGHBY. Not by us.

Senator FERGUSON. By anybody?

General WILLOUGHBY. Actually there was what I would term an indirect repudiation based solely on Agnes Smedley's protestation at the time, including a threat of libel.

Senator FERGUSON. Agnes Smedley was an American citizen? I asked you that before.

General WILLOUGHBY. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. And she was mentioned in the report?

General WILLOUGHBY. Heavily implicated.

Senator FERGUSON. Had you any reasons or to this day have you any reasons to believe that anything that was said about or in connection with Agnes Smedley in that report to the Army was not a fact?

General WILLOUGHBY. I take the same position today that I took in 1949 or at the time the report was prepared. Whatever was stated then is a fact which I am prepared to testify to, and I am about, in the quotation of this legal investigation, to give you the professional juridical views.

Senator FERGUSON. I anticipated that, but I wanted to clear the record first so that it would be clear that this was a report that was issued by your office and sent to Washington, it was released, it was then withdrawn under a so-called or, as you had learned, a threat of libel suit because of one person mentioned in it.

General WILLOUGHBY. Correct.

Senator FERGUSON. And then I wanted to see whether the fact was that there was any change in your attitude as to the truthfulness or accuracy of that report, and I find that there is not.

General WILLOUGHBY. I concur with your statement, sir, in its entirety.

The CHAIRMAN. May I ask one question there? You say they withdrew it. Whom do you mean by "they"?

General WILLOUGHBY. The War Department public relations officer, in my recollection, as well as officials of the Secretary of War's office, then under Mr. Royall, indicated that this report should never have been published. I am at the moment not familiar with the exact phraseology but, roughly speaking, that was the statement and the intent.

The result was that no action was taken on this report. Smedley never sued for libel, though her legal representative, Mr. Rogge, threatened to do that; and the case died, you might say, because of lack of further attention.

Senator FERGUSON. Of course, the publicity that could be given to that was limited because of threats of libel. Now you do not feel, do you, or do you feel as a general in the Intelligence Division that anything that you are going to say here in relation to Smedley in this report can in any way affect adversely our internal or external security?

General WILLOUGHBY. In the sense of adversely you mean the publication of data?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes.

General WILLOUGHBY. Indeed not. On the contrary, anything that I say this morning—and I am in complete sympathy with the purposes of this committee—will tend to clarify, to support, to add contributory evidence to the very courses that are now under your scrutiny and investigation.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, may I point out since we have mentioned the name of Agnes Smedley that we have introduced evidence of her activity with the Institute of Pacific Relations and for that reason we are dwelling on that fact.

The CHAIRMAN. This is the same Agnes Smedley referred to by witnesses who have testified here before this committee previously?

Mr. MORRIS. Yes. I might point out that Mrs. Paul Massing has testified that she knew that Agnes Smedley was a member of the Communist Party and a member of the Soviet espionage ring of her knowledge.

Senator FERGUSON. Therefore I think it is pertinent to this particular inquiry. It is not like taking an outside name.

Mr. MORRIS. General, you were about to read from the documents of the Sorge case.

General WILLOUGHBY. In line with your thought, senator, as to the quality of this evidence and in view of this, shall we say inferential repudiation, as I stated, we employed the best legal American talent then available in Tokyo to go over this entire mass of evidence running into perhaps more than a million words and thousands of photostatic exhibits, and this is the deliberate statement, opinion, and conclusion of these high-ranking American lawyers in important legal positions:

LEGAL OPINIONS OF DOCUMENTARY AUTHENTICATIONS IN THE SORGE CASE

We, the undersigned, fully realizing that certain processes and procedures are necessary for the authentication or verification of documentary evidence before they may be introduced in courts of record of the United States or be used as a basis for evidence, have examined the methods and procedures used for the authentication and verification of the documents listed in the following six pages—

meaning the raw material of the Sorge case—and after having duly considered the testimony of witnesses and having examined their written statements and interrogations together with their seals and signatures appended thereto, have arrived at the conclusion that the authentication and verification of the documents, including the statements from witnesses, are in accordance with existing law and procedures.

We therefore certify that it is our opinion that the authentication and verification of each of the several documents mentioned is legally sufficient to give legal standing to their full use within the scope of the rules of civil procedures for the courts of the United States or foreign courts adhering to Anglo-American jurisprudence.

It is our further opinion that:

(a) The authentications herein referred to are good, sufficient, and legal identifications to the documents to which they relate.

(b) That such records and documents are sufficiently authenticated to permit their full use before any court of record subject to the limitations imposed by the prevailing rules of evidence, and, finally, that the procedures and methods employed in the authentication of the documents herein referred to are those that are normally used in the preparation of documents to be used for the same identical purposes for which these documents are or may hereafter be intended.

Now the signatures to that document are: J. Woodall Greene, member of the Maryland bar; J. S. Carusi, member of the Connecticut bar; Franklin E. N. Warren, member of the Oklahoma bar and member of the New Mexico bar; and finally, E. V. A. de Becker and Rokuro Yusami, a firm of international Tokyo lawyers who are members of the Middle Temple of London and members of the Inner Temple of London.

Senator FERGUSON. What is the date of that, General?

General WILLOUGHBY. I will have to check that date, but it is roughly in the spring of 1949.

Senator FERGUSON. Was it after the withdrawal of the Smedley report?

General WILLOUGHBY. Yes.

Senator FERGUSON. Then was there any reaffirmation or publication of the Sorge-Smedley report, or whatever we call it?

General WILLOUGHBY. Not since that date.

Senator FERGUSON. Not since that date, notwithstanding that these civilian lawyers gave this opinion after a thorough examination of all of the evidence that went into the making of that report?

General WILLOUGHBY. Correct.

Having presented to you, Mr. Chairman, this reputable American legal opinion, I would like to continue and state the conclusions which these very men arrived at because they are pertinent to the entire juridical quality of this case. I am now speaking of the same men and, for your clarification, they were members of the legal sections of the Far East Command in the Civil Affairs Department. They practiced their profession then, their technical knowledge in legal channels continuously.

I am now reading the end part of their conclusions, which is again a numbered exhibit. By amicable arrangement with Mr. Morris, counsel, these cross-references are entirely known to him and available. When I speak of exhibits 12 and 20 he knows exactly where they are and can lay his hands on them. This is what these able and impartial lawyers have to say:

Based upon our examination of the documents listed immediately heretofore, it is the opinion of the undersigned that these evidences establish proof that Richard Sorge and his associates were espionage agents for the Russian Army and that Agnes Smedley and Guenther Stein are Communists in mind, spirit, and practice, and that they were actively and knowingly connected with the Sorge spy ring in China and Japan; and we are further of the opinion that the strong chain of evidence fully and conclusively supports the intelligence report entitled "The Sorge Spy Ring," dated December 15, 1947, a case study of international espionage in the Far East, and that such evidence amply justifies its submission to the Director of Intelligence, Department of the Army, by the G–2 of the Far East Command.

Mr. MORRIS. Now, General, do you have anything there on the element of coercion, the freedom from coercion?

General WILLOUGHBY. I am glad you asked this question, Mr. Morris. I do.

As part of this smear campaign, to use this slightly objectionable term, in the wake of my initial publication of this report, Smedley—although I am reluctant to bring up the name of a dead woman because she is merely a type and there are hundreds of others—at that time it was immediately charged that this was an illegal court procedure. They suggested that the Japanese Army in its known cruelty was involved and that whatever testimony was obtained was under pressure, under duress, under torture.

This element, which, of course, is one of defense, was so important that we made unusual efforts, that is, the legal group which I have just listed, to determine that that element was lacking. So, we obtained the affidavit through personal interrogation by the American lawyers of the attorney general of Japan, Mr. Yoshikawa Mitsusada.

It may be of interest to the chairman to know that this attorney general is now in the States. He is on an investigative or educational journey sponsored by both the American and Japanese Governments, and is in Washington. It is my understanding that he will be interrogated by another congressional committee.

Senator FERGUSON. Of course, he had first-hand knowledge of this Sorge case?

General WILLOUGHBY. Quite.

Senator FERGUSON. Because he was connected with it?

General WILLOUGHBY. Directly connected with it.

May I refer—merely a concession to age and faltering memory—to selected quick references? All of them are familiar to your counsel. These are my personal comments or briefs superimposed over perhaps 50 to 100 typewritten pages, abbreviated in order to assist not only this committee and their research staff but also the Washington authorities.

This affidavit—

is an affidavit by a Japanese Government official who was an attorney in the Tokyo district criminal court and interrogated Sorge in preliminary hearings in October 1941. The significance of this affidavit lies in the fact that Yoshikawa employed no irregular means of duress, third degree, or torture as the Smedley innuendo in her press statement at the time implied with a view of discrediting from the outset the quality of these important eyewitness statements, reports, and interrogation. The court was a normal constituted civil court. There was no pressure by the Army or Navy. The document in case was retained by Mr. Yoshikawa, as it was a corrected or edited copy of certain portions of the basic Sorge statement, and thus escaped destruction by burning as many documents were in our area of bombardments that destroyed important Japanese official buildings.

The further significance of the affidavit in substantiating the general court record is a clear picture this statement gives of the international character of Sorge's espionage ring in Tokyo and Shanghai, its military, strategic, political, and social objectives, its evident connection with the Moscow center, the Comintern, and the Soviet Army intelligence bureau.

For our purpose, if I understand Mr. Morris correctly, the emphasis is not so much on contents in addition to other evidence but the fact that no duress, no irregular means of coercion, no third degree, or torture, were applied in obtaining these statements or confessions.

Mr. MORRIS. General Willoughby, I wonder if you will tell us in general the make-up and the purpose of the Richard Sorge Soviet spy ring. Who, for instance, was Richard Sorge?

General WILLOUGHBY. While this has been fairly well covered by the press at one time or another——

Senator FERGUSON. I really think, Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of the record it should be placed in the record.

General WILLOUGHBY. Though we are merely scratching the surface, I will give my own version of this case.

Richard Sorge was a Soviet professional spy working under instruction of the fourth section—that is intelligence—of the Soviet army. He went to China in 1930 under cover as a legitimate journalist. As an aside or footnote, you will find that all of these agents somehow use an otherwise honorable profession, that of journalism, as their cover. You will find Stein being arrested in Paris as the correspondent of the Hindustani News.

You find Smedley operating as a correspondent for the Frankfurter Zeitung. You find Sorge appearing as the correspondent of the Frankfurter Zeitung. He operated both in Shanghai and Tokyo. He obtained the collaboration of Miss Agnes Smedley, who, in turn, introduced him to several coworkers of various nationalities—American, German, Chinese, and Japanese.

Senator FERGUSON. When did he start this and when did he go there? Is that date given?

General WILLOUGHBY. That date is contained accurately in the exhibit.

Senator FERGUSON. About what year?

General WILLOUGHBY. Between 1930 and 1940. He operated in Shanghai in 1930, moved to Tokyo in 1936, remained there until 1941, until his arrest and the subsequent development of this case.

Senator FERGUSON. Was Smedley used principally in China rather than Japan?

General WILLOUGHBY. Yes. She was used principally in China, and so was Guenther Stein. For that reason testimony concerning those two is primarily with activities on the China mainland. There is, however, as I will develop further, an important link, in fact the link with the Japanese operations. That is in the person of Ozaki, a very interesting individual whom Smedley procured as a recruit and introduced to Sorge in China. So there is your link between the China mainland and the Japanese background.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, may I point out at this time that Mr. Ozaki was in 1936 the Japanese council delegate to the IPR conference at Yosemite?

General WILLOUGHBY. Yes. That makes Ozaki doubly interesting to this committee specializing in the quality of the membership of the Institute of Pacific Relations. Ozaki is a type member in good standing of the Institute of Pacific Relations in his days.

Senator FERGUSON. Not to change the subject, but did you run into the Institute of Pacific Relations when you were going over this case?

General WILLOUGHBY. Merely in the recognition that some of the protagonists here were members.

Senator FERGUSON. And were doing work in that organization?

General WILLOUGHBY. Quite.

Senator FERGUSON. That is how it came into the picture?

General WILLOUGHBY. Yes.

Senator FERGUSON. Of course, that is how this all comes into this hearing, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. That is right.

General WILLOUGHBY. I understand your specialization, entirely meritorious, and I am merely contributing collateral axillary verification.

In order to once more emphasize the character of Sorge's organization—apparatus is the pseudo or Russian term for it—I would like to quote from his diary, duly authenticated reference in the hands of the counsel. This is Sorge speaking:

> As head of the Japan spy ring, I was directly affiliated with the central committee of the U. S. S. R. Communist Party. I was also under the fourth bureau (intelligence) of the Red army with respect to the technical aspects of my work and a few subject matter problems.
> As I see it—

this is Sorge speaking—

> my espionage group should be considered a special arm of the central committee of the U. S. S. R. Communist Party. That was its essential characteristic.

Another distinguishing feature was its technical and organization connection with the fourth bureau (intelligence) of the Red army. The espionage group which I operated in Japan, all of its members have frankly confessed that they were working to advance the cause of communism and not for money or personal gain.

Mr. MORRIS. General, approximately how many members were there in that ring?

General WILLOUGHBY. Fifteen to twenty. While the personnel of this ring varied from time to time, this skillful bank of spies—agents, if you wish—worked for nine productive years before their discovery. The famous Canadian spy case was one of the best examples of this type of espionage. I believe, however, that the Sorge efforts in Tokyo compare most favorably with this famous case.

Senator FERGUSON. How many nationalities were in this ring? Sorge was a German?

General WILLOUGHBY. Yes.

Senator FERGUSON. Guenther Stein was British?

General WILLOUGHBY. British citizen of German origin.

Senator FERGUSON. Smedley was an American?

General WILLOUGHBY. Was an American.

Senator FERGUSON. Any Canadians?

General WILLOUGHBY. None in the record.

Senator FERGUSON. Then you have the Japanese and the Chinese?

General WILLOUGHBY. And a class that is important in California is the Nisei or ex-California residents who were employed, recruited in this service. There were additional American citizens or applying for citizenship then resident in California in a certain strata of Japanese local population. So that is an additional element of membership.

Senator FERGUSON. They were not in any way, as far as counsel has been able to find out, connected with the IPR?

General WILLOUGHBY. No.

Senator FERGUSON. These California Japanese?

General WILLOUGHBY. No; they are not connected with the IPR, but there are some in conformance to your interest on which I believe Mr. Morris has made a fixation there.

Mr. MORRIS. General, will you in the forthcoming testimony confine your testimony to those four people, at least as much as possible, whom we have mentioned as people who are involved in the Institute of Pacific Relations? Now will you speak very briefly about Hotsumi Ozaki? In the first place, will you tell us, General, what his position in the Soviet spy ring was?

General WILLOUGHBY. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. In this connection, Mr. Chairman, I would like to introduce in the record an excerpt from the handbook of the sixth conference of the Institute of Pacific Relations, which was held at Yosemite National Park in California, August 15 to 29, 1936. There listed among the members and group secretaries of the conference are, Japan, Hotsumi Ozaki, research member, Asahi Institute of the Far East, Tokyo Asahi Shimbun; and, secretaries, IPR, Kinkazu Saionji. They were both listed in the Handbook of the Sixth Conference of the Institute of Pacific Relations.

I would like that introduced in the record as such.

The CHAIRMAN. How was the handbook secured? How do you identify the handbook?

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Mandel, will you identify the handbook?

Mr. MANDEL. This is a photostat of the handbook referred to there from the files of the Institute of Pacific Relations.

The CHAIRMAN. All right, it may be inserted in the record.

(The document referred to was marked "Exhibit No. 81" and is as follows:)

EXHIBIT No. 81

[From Handbook For the Sixth Conference of the Institute of Pacific Relations, Yosemite National Park, Calif., August 15 to 29, 1936]

MEMBERS AND GROUP SECRETARIES OF THE CONFERENCE

Japan:

Hotsumi Ozaki, research member, Asahi Institute of the Far East, Tokyo Asahi Shimbun (p. 49).

Secretaries: IPR: Kinkazu Saionji (p. 50).

General WILLOUGHBY. Do you desire a comment on Ozaki?

Mr. MORRIS. Yes, General, if you please.

General WILLOUGHBY. Next to Sorge, Ozaki Hotsumi was by far the most important member of this ring. His death on the gallows with Sorge is somber testimony of his relative importance.

In April 1937 Ozaki became a member of the China section utilized by Prince Konoye, several times Prime Minister of Japan, which placed Ozaki in immediate contact with a most important Japanese governmental circle. This was accentuated when one of his associates in the China section became chief secretary of the first Konoye Cabinet in June 1937.

When the Japanese invaded China in 1937, the Foreign Office—that is the Japanese State Department—set up a special investigative agency to handle north China affairs and Ozaki was designated as a Tokyo liaison representative.

We thus have the picture of Ozaki, secret Communist, Soviet spy, intimate associate of Sorge, to hold first an official position as an adviser to the Japanese Cabinet from 1938 to the fall of the Government, as being attached to the entourage of a Prime Minister; in other words, unusual opportunities to obtain highly top-flight information.

Mr. MORRIS. You know, General, from your own military experience that a man who was chief secretary to a Cabinet is in a very strategic position to obtain information?

General WILLOUGHBY. Of course.

Even more important than his official position, Mr. Chairman, was his friendship with old friends of college days who became very prominent at that time, namely, Ushiba and Tomohaiko Kashi, who were private secretaries to Prince Konoye.

Mr. MORRIS. I would like, Mr. Chairman, the record to show that Ushiba was predecessor of Saionji as secretary to the Japanese council of the Institute of Pacific Relations.

General WILLOUGHBY. In these two men were centered the so-called "breakfast group," an informal discussion society of the bright young men around Prince Konoye. When dinners became inconvenient, these men met at breakfast, hence the name "breakfast groups." That is an informal gathering of the important individuals closely affiliated with the Prime Minister and with the Foreign Office.

The American equivalent would be, if a selected group of State Department advisers were in an informal gathering, having access to usually top-level information. That was the group actually in existence, and we will see presently what they did with their opportunities.

Mr. MORRIS. You say, General, Ozaki was a full-fledged member of this spy ring?

General WILLOUGHBY. That I will demonstrate, or rather it is part of the attestation of the American lawyers long after we had already arrived at that conclusion. He is, next to Sorge, the most important member of this espionage organization.

Senator FERGUSON. General, from your facts are you of the opinion that the Institute of Pacific Relations, that is the Japanese branch, was in effect being used as a spy ring for Russian Communists and the Russian Red army because of the tie-in with the Foreign Minister's office and the others?

General WILLOUGHBY. I think that conclusion can be arrived at because of the membership, the intimacy, the association of those individuals, especially Ozaki, who had an official position and was the representative of the IPR in the Yosemite meeting. That relationship, of course, continued throughout his activity.

Senator FERGUSON. So it gave them a field to work in, the foreign relations of Japan and the foreign relations of America, through the American branch and the international branch of the IPR?

General WILLOUGHBY. I would say that I agree with your conclusions.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Mandel, will you introduce into the record at this time and present to the committee at this time a letter from Mr. Edward C. Carter to Mr. Frederick Vanderbilt Field relating to the two Japanese that General Willoughby has just named, Ushiba and Saionji? Ushiba was secretary of the Japanese council of the IPR, who was succeeded by Saionji as secretary of the Japanese council of the IPR.

Mr. Mandel, I wonder if you would authenticate that document and read the pertinent sections in the record.

Mr. MANDEL. I read a document from the files of the Institute of Pacific Relations, dated June 29, 1938, marked "private and confidential," addressed to Frederick V. Field from Edward C. Carter. The following is an excerpt from the letter:

DEAR FRED: As you know, we began early last autumn trying to get a man of the rank of Ushiba, Matsukata, or Saionji to join the international secretariat. None of these was available, but in January as you know Yasuo was nominated and has proved a very valuable member of the staff. As our work developed, we found that we needed to clear up a great many outstanding questions between the secretariat and the Japanese council, so on May 5 I cabled Dr. Yamakawa as follows:

Mr. MORRIS. I think that is enough. We would like to introduce the entire letter in the record.

The CHAIRMAN. It may be introduced in the record.

(The document referred to was marked "Exhibit No. 82" and is as follows:)

EXHIBIT No. 82

129 EAST FIFTY-SECOND STREET,
New York, June 29, 1938.

Private and confidential.

FREDERICK V. FIELD, Esq.,
1795 California Street, San Francisco, Calif.

DEAR FRED: As you know, we began early last autumn trying to get a man of the rank of Ushiba, Matsukata, or Saionji to join the international secretariat. None of these was available but in January as you know Yasuo was nominated and has proved a very valuable member of the staff. As our work developed, we found that we needed to clear up a great many outstanding questions between the secretariat and the Japanese council, so on May 5, I cabled Dr. Yamakawa as follows:

"Please cable could Saionji come New York for 1 or 2 months this summer to discuss questions arising from Dafoe's letter of February 9. We will pay all expenses."

On May 8, he replied as follows: "Will do best to comply with your request."

Now I have received a cable from Viscount Ishii, reading as follows:

"Japanese council regrets unable agree research project envisaged by international secretariat. In view of importance of problem for institute, Takayanagi sailing on July 15 to discuss matter with you. Circumstances prevent Saionji from leaving."

I have replied to Viscount Ishii as follows:

"Takayanagi most welcome. Hope he can remain at least throughout August and September. Am confident that on studying our plan of work here, he will discover that secretariat project can serve the interests both of Japan and Japanese council."

Ishii cabled Dafoe in a similar vein and Dafoe has asked me to indicate that he cannot see Takayanagi in Winnipeg, owing to the dislocation of his work by the Royal Commission, but suggesting that I urge Takayanagi to come straight through to New York preparatory to going to Lee for the week of August 10 which Dafoe is planning to spend at Lee. That is the only week he can manage to clear for the IPR between now and the end of the year.

I do not think it is in the interest of the IPR, either from the Japanese or the Pacific council point of view to publicize Ishii's cablegram. As I have stated in my reply, I feel that if Takayanagi can come and work with us for several weeks and have the unhurried week at Sunset Farm with Dafoe and others, a great deal of progress can be made.

Of course, we do not know as yet what the Japanese objections are. It may be that they want the secretariat to go ahead but with the record showing that the Japanese council voted against the project. It may be that they want the whole basis of the project altered so that the documentation of the inquiry will be similar to that of an IPR conference, namely, that it will consist in the main of national council contributions. It may be that the reports they have received of the attitude toward the conflict expressed in writing and speech by members of the secretariat makes them feel that the secretariat is incapable of directing an objective study of this sort. It may be that they feel that we made some technical mistakes in procedure in the way the project has been set up.

All of these are at this stage merely surmises on my part. The help that I want from you can be given if you will answer the following questions: (1) Do you think our procedure is sound to urge Takayanagi to come straight through to New York for consultations here just before going to Lee for the round-table conference with Dafoe? (2) If you wish a visit from Takayanagi at Pacific center, would you agree that he might render a greater service if he visited you on his way back to Japan in the autumn, rather than stopping over for a few days on his arrival on the Chichibu Maru on July 29? (3) Have you any advice as to whether I should go to San Francisco so as to be on the wharf with you to welcome him and bring him across the continent, or would you be willing to meet his steamer and put him on the first train east?

Takayanagi will doubtless want to have a talk with Alsberg some time while he is in the United States. Enclosed is a letter that I am sending to Alsberg today which is self-explanatory. I am wondering whether it would not be better for Takayanagi to have his talk with Alsberg after he has cleared matters with Dafoe, inasmuch as Dafoe, in his circular letter of February 9 to the members of the Pacific council, assumed responsibility for recommending that the secretariat go ahead with the project.

By September, Takayanagi would be in a very much better position to profit fully from Alsberg's sage advice than he might be immediately on landing.

Sincerely yours,

EDWARD C. CARTER.

General WILLOUGHBY. These data that are being furnished on the American IPR are as interesting to me as probably my comments are to you. This is an entirely new field. I regret only that I did not have that information in 1947, 1948, or 1949.

Senator FERGUSON. Of course, this committee just received these files within 6 months; these were the private files of the IPR.

The CHAIRMAN. These files were taken under subpena duces tecum and brought from New York here.

General WILLOUGHBY. I must congratulate this committee on its fast and decisive action.

Speaking of Ozaki, in summing up his relation to the Konoye Cabinet, the intimacy with Saionji, whom we will examine under a magnifying glass presently, I would say it is obvious that Ozaki's special position gave him unsurpassed opportunities to learn the exact nature and progress of all principal diplomatic or military projects of the Japanese Government.

Does that clarify the position?

Mr. MORRIS. Yes. Would you say he was probably the outstanding assistant to Sorge in the espionage ring, General?

General WILLOUGHBY. That has been repeatedly asserted, and he was so recognized in the interrogations and in the official appraisal of the Japanese judges and the opinion of the American legal investigators.

Mr. MORRIS. Now, General, the next name I think we will come to will be that of Saionji. As we have stated before, General, Mr. Saionji was the secretary of the Japanese Council of the Institute of Pacific Relations for a period of time. I wonder if you will tell us what his connection with the espionage ring was.

General WILLOUGHBY. Yes indeed.

Saionji is a very interesting figure because of his background and the curious sidelight on Japanese social and governmental character.

To begin with, Saionji was the adopted grandson of the late famous Genro, Prince Saionji. To understand his position, the Genro are of the elder statesmen of Japan who served under the Meija restoration which launched Japan as a world power. These elder statesmen consequently enjoyed an exceptional degree of veneration by the Japanese population, and some of this prestige naturally accrued to their family, and especially this man Saionji.

Saionji was a full-fledged member of the Sorge espionage ring in addition to his other qualifications that we developed. He was arrested by the Japanese police and was found guilty of passing secret information to Ozaki, an associate of the breakfast club. Saionji was given a sentence of 3 years with a stay of execution, undoubtedly a concession to the importance of his family connections.

Mr. MORRIS. General Willoughby, is there any evidence that Ozaki and Saionji were closely associated with each other?

General WILLOUGHBY. They were intimate, and the association ranged over many years.

Mr. MORRIS. What was Saionji's position with the Japanese Government?

General WILLOUGHBY. He was a consultant of the Foreign Ministry, that is the Japanese State Department, and the Cabinet and belonged to the bright young men forming the "breakfast club," the bright young men around Prince Konoye.

Senator FERGUSON. So they had them in Japan?

General WILLOUGHBY. I concur.

Mr. MORRIS. General, what role did Agnes Smedley play in the Sorge spy ring?

General WILLOUGHBY. That has been covered generally, but here again I will give you an abbreviated pointed formation.

Smedley's association with the China spy ring of Richard Sorge dates back to 1930. Smedley introduced Sorge to Hotsumi Ozaki, that same Ozaki was his right-hand man, then a special correspondent for the Asahi Shimbun, but here again is the predilection of these individuals to seek cover in an otherwise honorable profession, to wit, correspondents of important newspapers.

Smedley was also instrumental in securing the services of Teikichi Kawai, who is still living and whose affidavit furnished freely to the American occupation authorities is one of the most important exhibits in this entire series available to the counsel. In fact, may I suggest, Mr. Morris, that you quote from exhibit 28, from the question series 100 onward, what our friend Kawai had to say.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Mandel, will you extract from the records the interrogation of Mr. Kawai just referred to by General Willoughby and read those portions commencing on about question 98?

The CHAIRMAN. To what records do you refer and how were the records made?

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, this record was a record that was in the possession of General Willoughby, which is a pertinent exhibit taken from the official files in Tokyo.

Is that right, General?

General WILLOUGHBY. Yes. Duplicates are in the War Department, the same type of records which I described when I quoted the opinion of the American legal group.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well.

Senator FERGUSON. By the way, this opinion of the legal group went to the War Department and became part of the official files?

General WILLOUGHBY. It did.

Mr. MANDEL. This is taken from the interrogation of Kawai Teikichi, dated March 31, 1948, and April 1, 1949:

Question 98. When did serious discussions start about your second assignment?

A. I was asked if I would be able to go back to Manchuria the same night I submitted my report in Smedley's apartment.

Question 99. When were definite plans made for you to return?

A. I think we talked about that when we were walking through the park

Question 100. Describe that a little more fully.

A. At the first meeting in Smedley's apartment I was asked whether I would be able to go back or not at which time I answered that I would be able to go. When we left that night we decided to meet again the next morning at Smedley's apartment. Sorge came late after everyone else had assembled, and it was decided at that time I would go to Mukden. After the meeting at Smedley's apartment the four of us, Ozaki, Smedley, Sorge, and I, went by automobile to the park. We made definite plans for me to go back to Mukden at that park.

Question 251. Can you tell what Smedley's influence and position were in Chinese espionage? Was she a person of high rank in the activity?

A. Yes, I did get that impression.

Question 252. In your conversations and contacts with Smedley did you get the idea that she had direct contact with Moscow or with Russia?

A. I got the impression that she had some liaison with the Comintern.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Mandel, you are reading from the testimony of Mr. Kawai, a member of the espionage group, which testimony was taken in 1949; is that correct?

Mr. MANDEL. Yes, sir.

General WILLOUGHBY. May I add to this, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir.

General WILLOUGHBY. This interrogation was made by Mr. Woodall Greene, one of the group of American lawyers. This is a voluntary statement of a member of this ring. He happened to be a Communist belonging to the Japanese Communist Party and that party was so apprehensive at that time about his testimony that I was obliged to furnish this man police protection because of threats directed against him.

Senator WATKINS. Did I understand, General, that you said he is still living?

General WILLOUGHBY. Yes, he is available as a personal witness. In order to save the committee expense, in view of their known limited allocation of funds for this purpose, a completely notarized affidavit is available, and it is this affidavit that Mr. Mandel has now quoted from.

Senator WATKINS. He was a member of the spy ring?

General WILLOUGHBY. He was a member of the spy ring, yes.

Senator WATKINS. How did he escape punishment?

General WILLOUGHBY. He was punished. We released him in this grandiose gesture following the Potsdam Declaration in 1945. He was in jail and was released as a potential amnesty gesture, which released all the members of this spy ring.

Senator FERGUSON. Of course, there were some executed?

General WILLOUGHBY. Only two.

Senator FERGUSON. Two had been executed?

General WILLOUGHBY. All the rest were imprisoned and released.

Senator FERGUSON. Under the Potsdam agreement?

General WILLOUGHBY. Correct.

Senator WATKINS. Was he not tried by the Japanese at the time Sorge and the others were tried?

General WILLOUGHBY. He was tried. He was a member of Sorge's ring, arrested, and in due process of law was tried and convicted with all the others. When we stepped into the picture in 1945 we made a sort of grand gesture, primarily designed to protect political prisoners, that is without definition, because in the fall of 1945 we were busy disarming the Japanese Army and occupying Japan, ranging from roughly Seattle to San Diego, Calif., with four divisions.

So, this sort of thing was interesting but by no means pressing, and we released perhaps people we should have not released.

Senator WATKINS. What was the sentence given him by the Japanese courts?

General WILLOUGHBY. Is the sentence of Kawai listed there? My memory being what it is, it would be like asking Edgar Hoover the details of case No. 1560. I had a policy-making position.

Senator FERGUSON. You do know he was released in 1945 under the Potsdam agreement?

General WILLOUGHBY. Yes. I think I can answer your question in just a moment. Ten years, and the release date of this gentry incidentally was in October 1945.

Mr. MORRIS. He did prove to be of assistance to the military authorities in Japan; did he not?

General WILLOUGHBY. Yes. We realized that if we could get in this group of prisoners someone of sufficient authority in his position to give us the story—us, the American occupation forces—it would be a valuable confirmation of the documentary evidence, and we proceeded then to interrogate all of them, and we found this man Kawai.

Since my interest was primarily in Stein and Smedley at the time, I concentrated on those two. We found his testimony to be conclusive of the character of which Mr. Mandel has just given you a sample. He was, therefore, of great assistance to us. He is now available on call. This affidavit is available. Given time we might produce the affidavits of all of them.

The CHAIRMAN. However, you had corroborating evidence besides his voluntary statement?

General WILLOUGHBY. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. How about Ohashi?

General WILLOUGHBY. Ohashi was in the same category, a relatively minor individual whom we also interrogated. Both knew and worked with Smedley is the gist of their contribution.

Senator WATKINS. What surprises me about it is that he escaped execution if he was a spy and working in the spy ring.

General WILLOUGHBY. That is a very interesting comment. It is also to some extent characteristic of the civil quality of this court. They did not treat all of them in a summary fashion. They made a fine distinction on relative importance. Sorge was No. 1, Ozaki was No. 2, the rest in a descending scale of relative guilt, shall we say. However, their sentences ranged, for example, Koshiro 15, Taguchi 13, Akiyama 10, Kawai 10, Hotzumi 8—down to 2 years.

Mr. MORRIS. Repeat again the sentence imposed on Saionji.

General WILLOUGHBY. Saionji, according to this record, was found guilty of passing secret information to an unauthorized person—namely, Ozaki—was given a sentence of 3 years with a stay of execution, a suspended sentence. Talk of the time is that being the grandson of the Genro, who has the same emotional standing with Japan as the signers of the Declaration of Independence with us, got him off the hook.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Mandel, I wonder if you will read from the testimony of Ohashi, just referred to by General Willoughby, in connection with the supporting evidence on Agnes Smedley.

Mr. MANDEL. This is the testimony of Ohashi Haideo, May 2, 1949.

The CHAIRMAN. I take it you are reading from the same document, Mr. Mandel?

Mr. MANDEL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. From which you presented the excerpt before?

Mr. MANDEL. Yes, sir; who is listed here as chief, Ikegmi Police Station:

Question 5. In your voluntary statement of April 16, 1949, you said that Sorge mentioned Agnes Smedley. Will you tell us what he said about her?

A. Sorge was in China before he came to Japan. He organized an espionage ring in Shanghai, and Smedley was one of the members of the ring. Sorge was introduced by Smedley to Ozaki, who later became one of the leading members of the ring in Japan. Sorge met Smedley for the first time in Shanghai, but Smedley was not a member of this group in Japan. In 1934 Smedley stopped for a day in Japan. She went to the Asahi Shimbun, where she met Ozaki, who tried to contact Sorge but was unable to do so. Smedley left the same day.

Question 6. Did Sorge tell the nature of Smedley's duties in connection with his ring in China?

A. Sorge did not go into details about the actiivties of any of the members of the ring in Shanghai. I merely interrogated him concerning the names of the members of his ring and did not go into details concerning their activities. I was interested only in information covering the Japanese phase.

Question 7. In your statement of April 16, 1949, you said that Sorge praised Smedley's work in Shanghai. Is that true?

A. Sorge did say she was a very intelligent woman, that she had been with the Eighth Route Army and knew quite a bit about that organization, and also that her information was very good.

I will skip now to question 9, on Sorge's mention of Smedley and her activities in connection with his spy ring in China:

Question 9. Did you infer that she was an important member of the ring?

A. Yes; I did get that impression. As far as the members of the Shanghai ring were concerned, with the exception of Paul and Smedley he only listed their names. He often mentioned Paul and Smedley, which gave me the impression that she was an important member of the Shanghai group.

Question 14. You said that Sorge considered Stein one of the top members in his ring, also that Sorge informed you that Stein's house in——

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, may I suggest that Mr. Mandel defer the rest of that until we come to the Stein testimony?

The CHAIRMAN. Very well. You may proceed.

Mr. MORRIS. General, was Guenther Stein a member of Richard Sorge Soviet espionage ring?

General WILLOUGHBY. He was. Guenther Stein, special correspondent for a London newspaper, was a regular member of the Sorge spy ring. A notebook confiscated from Sorge lists six members together with their aliases, and Stein was listed among the six. An intercepted radio message to Moscow referred to his code name. In this connection, we are in possession of course of the entire series of radio code messages dispatched to Moscow by Sorge in this period, and many of the operators involved in it are mentioned not only by activity but by code references.

There is testimony by Max Klausen—Max Klausen was his radio operator at the time—that this wireless operator erected a transmission set in Stein's residence to forward reports to Russia. Stein not only was living on the premises but at the time gave his consent.

I think, Mr. Morris, that exhibit 23 has a direct quotation from this testimony, the establishment of a radio transmitter communicating with Khabarovsk, a Siberia station, is damaging activity.

Mr. MORRIS. That is right, General. I would like Mr. Mandel to read from the police investigation of Max Klausen, which was made on the 25th of October in 1945. I would like Mr. Mandel to read page 9 on this Consecutive Exhibit No. 23, closure No. 1–A. This is from the interrogation of Max Klausen, whom General Willoughby has identified as one of the leading members of the Sorge espionage ring.

The CHAIRMAN. You are reading from what again?

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Mandel will be reading from Consecutive Exhibit No. 23, which was in the custody of General Willoughby in this connection.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

Mr. MANDEL (reading):

GUENTHER STEIN

One night in December 1935, while I was still at the Sano Hotel, Sorge called me to his home and introduced me to Guenther Stein. Stein and I discussed radio, and he drew a map to show me where he lived. I visited him several days later at his home in Motomura-cho Minatoku, examined the house to see whether it was suitable for installation of radio equipment and decided with his consent to use two of his upstairs rooms. As previously indicated, I installed the equipment and began testing around the middle of February. I transmitted around 30 messages from Stein's home. I stopped using it in 1937—I do not recall the date—when he left for England via Siberia. Stein once confided to me that while in Moscow, a special correspondent of the Berliner Tageblatt, before coming to Japan, he had been a Communist sympathizer. I did not know the nature of his previous activities in Japan, but I am sure that in addition to the above he went to Shanghai as a courier. There is no doubt that he was a member of our group.

Senator FERGUSON. General, you might just clear that up.

Of course, the man who was speaking was a member of the espionage organization.

Mr. MORRIS. Max Klausen.

Senator FERGUSON. They are the group of men mentioned.

General WILLOUGHBY. The organization.

Mr. MORRIS. General, would you prefer that Mr. Mandel read a continuation of the Ohashi testimony, or is your testimony now coming up more appropriate?

General WILLOUGHBY. On the subject of Stein?

Mr. MORRIS. Guenther Stein.

General WILLOUGHBY. If I may make a suggestion——

Mr. MORRIS. By all means.

General WILLOUGHBY (continuing). I am at your disposal, being a Government employee, soon to be on half pay.

You can continue on this theme, and you will merely reiterate that that he set up the radio station in his house, furnishing the cover of a fairly respectable position at the time, while the Japanese Secret Service was running around in nervous apprehension as to where the code messages to Russia were coming from. They didn't think of Stein, of course.

There is your story.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you read, then, the next two questions in the Ohashi testimony, Mr. Mandel?

Mr. MANDEL (reading):

Quesion 14. You said that Sorge considered Stein one of the top members in his ring, also that Sorge informed you that Stein's home in Motomura-Cho Minato-Ku Tokyo-To was used by Max Klausen for the transmission of messages to Russia. The testimony of Sorge and Klausen contains that information also. Did Sorge give you any additional information about Stein?

A. Not that I recall.

Question 15. You referred to a notebook which was confiscated from Sorge and in which were listed the top members of his ring, including Richard Sorge.

Branko de Voukelitch, Max Klausen, Stein, Ozaki, and Miyagi. Did you see that notebook?

A. Yes; I did see that book.

Question 16. Did you actually see the name Guenther Stein in Sorge's handwriting in this notebook which listed the top six members of his ring?

A. I do not remember clearly whether Guenther Stein was listed as such, or not, but his pseudonym was listed.

Question 17. Were all the names listed as aliases in the book?

A. In that book some members were listed by their real names, some by their aliases, some by more than one alias, but I do not remember clearly whether Stein's name or his alias was listed, but to anyone knowing these individuals by both their real names and by their aliases as I did, it meant the same thing.

Mr. MORRIS. General, will you tell us something about the influential position that Guenther Stein was able to assume in Tokyo?

General WILLOUGHBY. He had a wide range of contacts, naturally, in the press fraternity. He also had some entree in the British Embassy, being a British subject.

Generally speaking—and this is based on inquiries from people who have known him—they rated him as an individual with access to important international information.

Mr. MORRIS. I wonder, General, if you think it would be appropriate if Mr. Mandel would read further from the confession of Richard Sorge on the important position that Guenther Stein was able to achieve in Tokyo at the time.

I offer you this volume, General, and ask you if you will identify the excerpt he is about to read.

General WILLOUGHBY. Yes.

For your information, Mr. Chairman, this is a sample of actually over 150,000 pages, translated from Japanese text court records. This is the story as written by Sorge himself, not in the nature of a confession, because he was interrogated in a series of Attorney General's interrogations, but he wrote a sort of diary.

He was under the impression that, in view of the importance that he held in the Soviet hierarchy that he might be released at the last moment.

Waiting 3 or 4 years, his resistance perhaps weakened and he began to jot down in an informal diary type his thought sand feelings, his record. That is a part of this record.

Mr. MORRIS. When was he executed, General?

General WILLOUGHBY. Executed in 1944, I believe.

Mr. MORRIS. And arrested in 1941?

General WILLOUGHBY. 1941; yes, sir.

An interesting sidelight in the international field, if I am not imposing too much on your time, is that the Japanese Government was then on a neutrality basis with Russia, as you know, until 5 minutes to midnight. They came in in August of 1945, after we had accomplished the Pacific War. The Japanese were very anxious, of course, not to upset this neutrality balance, and in one of the commentaries on this case, the Attorney General warns his individuals, his subordinates, to be sure that the conduct of the trial, the interrogation, and so forth, would be of such a humanitarian plane that the Soviet Embassy, if they should become interested in the end, could take no offense or register objection.

So this is as close to a voluntary statement by Sorge, this diary, which we entitled in our translation as Sorges' own story, typewritten, typed by himself at a leisurely pace.

He even made editorial and stylistic corrections.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Mandel, I wonder if you would read from the document so described by General Willoughby.

Mr. MANDEL. Referring to Stein:

> He was a sympathizer but never an actual member of my group. Actually, however, he did give us positive cooperation.
>
> Stein was closely associated with Ambassador Dirksen, whom he had known since Moscow, and who looked upon him as an intelligent and important person. More significant for our work was the connection with the British Ambassador which he enjoyed by virtue of the fact that he represented a British newspaper. He was especially close to the famous Sir Sansom in the British Embassy. From the British Embassy he was able to obtain information chiefly on general diplomatic policy. At times he had opportunities to talk to the then British Ambassador and British naval attaché.
> As Stein was also on very intimate terms with all the foreign newspapermen, especially the British and American reporters, he sometimes wanted interesting individual facts from them. Lastly, he had close connection with Domei and hence like Voukelitch was able to scent out the general political undercurrent and atmosphere there. He was also very valuable as a source of information in that he had studied the Japanese economic situation very conscientiously and had written complete books about it. His economic studies clarified many facts hitherto little understood. His chief fields of study were Japans' foreign trade and financial problems.

Senator FERGUSON. May I just inquire whether, in connection with Stein, you ever heard the name Herbert Norman?

General WILLOUGHBY. That name does not appear in what we have now classified as the Sorge record.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, at this point, I think it might be appropriate if I point out that we had Dr. Karl Wittfogel, who is a distinguished professor of Columbia University. He is head of the Chinese language project of Columbia University. We had him on the stand here on Tuesday. He identified as a member of a Communist study group and as a member of the Communist Party Herbert Norman.

Herbert Norman is today, Mr. Chairman, Chief of the American Far Eastern Division of the Department of External Affairs of Canada. That is a place of great importance.

I was wondering, General Willoughby, if you knew Herbert Norman at all when you were in Tokyo.

General WILLOUGHBY. Yes, I knew Herbert Norman. He was the Canadian Minister in Tokyo in the period 1946 to 1950.

Mr. MORRIS. He was then only the Canadian Minister to Tokyo?

General WILLOUGHBY. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORRIS. He has since assumed this high position.

General WILLOUGHBY. The Canadian Minister.

Technically, all diplomatic representatives maintain their diplomatic classification, ambassador, minister, chargé d'affaires. They were attached to SCAP.

In other words, he was the chief of the Canadian diplomatic mission attached to SCAP.

Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, I think at this place in the record we might make reference to the testimony of Wittfogel on page 318.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well.

Senator FERGUSON. It will bring out who Herbert Norman was back in 1938 and his connection with the Pacific Affairs and the IPR.

I think the letter on pages 319 or 320, No. 72, from Edward C. Carter to Owen Lattimore, under the name of "Dear Owen," is significant in the light of Wittfogel's testimony, and if it is referred to in the record here it could be of importance to this testimony.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to read from the letter No. 72, in the record, on page 319 or 320, from Carter to Owen Lattimore. It begins: "Dear Owen"—and that has been identified as Owen Lattimore.

Here is the paragraph that I think ought to be put in here:

I think that Norman may be able to do some writing for Pacific Affairs on contemporary matters providing he writes under a nom de plume.

Mr. SOURWINE. Is that the letter, Senator, which referred to the using of Mr. Norman as a conduit for transmission of information?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes. And that he used a fictitious name rather than his own name because he would be connected with the Canadian Embassy.

The reason I thought of that General, was that when you brought Stein as being connected with the Canadian Embassy in a way——

General WILLOUGHBY. British Embassy.

Senator FERGUSON. I think you also said Canadian. Did you not?

General WILLOUGHBY. What was the quotation?

Senator FERGUSON. Did you not say both Canadian and British when you read that about Stein, Mr. Mandel?

Mr. MANDEL. British.

Senator FERGUSON. Yes. It covered both. That is why I thought the Norman testimony was significant.

General WILLOUGHBY. Of course, I was not aware and I am intensely interested in this Wittfogel testimony on that particular name. But, of course, I am in no position to——

Senator FERGUSON. That is the reason why I want to know whether or not he came into the record.

General WILLOUGHBY. He did not come into this record we are now dealing with, and of course my personal acquaintanceship in Tokyo was that of a SCAP official with a foreign diplomatic representative, and I am reluctant to dwell on this.

Senator FERGUSON. I would not want you to do so. I want the testimony emphatic that if it was as it is now, that he was not mentioned at all.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, would you want me to read into the record today the testimony of Dr. Wittfogel, or do you think it is clear enough?

The CHAIRMAN. I think it would clarify it if you read an excerpt from it, so as to tie it in with Wittfogel's testimony.

Mr. MORRIS. I am now reading from the testimony of Karl August Wittfogel, of last Tuesday. This is page 318. The question put to Dr. Wittfogel was:

Who were some of the other students at this student group?

This is a Communist student group that met on Cape Cod in the summer of 1938.

Dr. WITTFOGEL. There was a talented and pleasant young man who was studying in the Japanese department at Columbia. His name is Herbert Norman.

Mr. MORRIS. Was he a member of this study group?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. To your knowledge, did he know that it was a Communist study group?

Dr. WITTFOGEL. Yes. It was obvious.
Mr. MORRIS. To you.
Dr. WITTFOGEL. I think it was obvious in general.
Mr. MORRIS. Was it obvious, therefore, that he was a Communist?
Dr. WITTFOGEL. Yes.
Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Mandel, I wonder if you would introduce in the record first of all a letter that would indicate Herbert Norman's associations with the Institute of Pacific Relations.
Mr. MANDEL. I have here a record taken from the files of the Institute of Pacific Relations dated May 30, 1940, from Edward C. Carter to Owen Lattimore. It reads as follows:
"Herbert Norman was in the office about a fortnight ago on the eve of his sailing for Tokyo, with language officer in the Canadian Legation. He is very eager to continue active contact with the institute and in the field of Japanese political history. He would like to do some writing on the key figures of the Meiji period. I am sending a copy of this letter to Holland as it may be that he will see ways of using Norman on writing that might not be quite within the scope of Pacific Affairs."

The CHAIRMAN. Right there, Mr. Morris, can we get the tie-in between the Norman referred to by Senator Ferguson in interrogating the witness and the Norman referred to by Wittfogel? Are they one and the same?
Mr. MORRIS. Yes. Dr. Wittfogel described Herbert Norman as a Canadian.
Senator FERGUSON. He was going to the Embassy at the time.
The CHAIRMAN. I understand. The witness identifies him as the consul.
General WILLOUGHBY. As the Canadian chief of the diplomatic mission in Tokyo approximately 1946 to 1950.
The CHAIRMAN. I just want to see if they are one and the same person.
Mr. MORRIS. Senator, I think the next letter bears on that point.
Mr. SOURWINE. Mr. Morris, is the letter you just read dated much earlier than 1946?
Mr. MORRIS. It was 1940.
I am reading from another letter dated September 5, 1940, which was introduced into the record of last Tuesday on page 601.
Mr. Mandel, there is another letter, apparently a memorandum, headed "E. C. C. from W. L. H.," apparently from Mr. Carter to Mr. Holland, dated September 5, 1940.
It is on a typed letterhead of the Gianini Foundation, University of California, Berkeley, Calif.:

Phil is leaving tonight and is taking Landon's book on the Chinese in Siam and the major part of Yasuto's Industrial Japan. Among the other manuscripts to be sent to him very shortly will be Laura Thompson's book on Guam for the American Council, Wentworth's Philippine Living Standards in Hawaii, the new catalog, and Wittfogel's monograph on oriental society. I am hoping to have the two big books by Mills and Kesting published commercially in this country. Phil will be in Japan from about September 18 to October 6 and can be reached in care of the Japanese IPR.

This is the significant sentence, Mr. Chairman:

Any very secret messages might be sent in care of Herbert Norman at the Canadian Legation. Phil will cable us after he arrives about whether the Japanese want him to remain for an extra week or two to help them with their publications.

So in 1940 Herbert Norman was associated with the Canadian Legation.
The CHAIRMAN. Very well.

What is the question now?

General WILLOUGHBY. I might make a remark. As a police officer, this is a most interesting statement by Dr. Wittfogel on that subject.

The CHAIRMAN. All right, Mr. Morris.

Mr. MORRIS. The Chair understands that at this present time Herbert Norman is Chief of the American Far Eastern Division of the Department of External Affairs of the Canadian Government.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to introduce into the record an extract showing the number of articles that Guenther Stein has written for the Institute of Pacific Affairs.

Mr. Mandel, will you describe that compilation that appears on that page before we introduce it into the record?

The CHAIRMAN. What is the source of the information?

Mr. MORRIS. It is a compilation by Mr. Mandel. I am asking him to testify, Mr. Chairman, as to what that represents.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the source of his information?

Mr. MANDEL. These are articles from Pacific Affairs, the official organ of the Institute of Pacific Relations, and also another one of its publications, called Far Eastern Survey, and lists the writings of Guenther Stein.

Just by way of sample, let me read a few titles: "Japanese State Finance," in the December 1937 issue of Pacific Affairs.

In the Far Eastern Survey we have "What's Free China," June 29, 1942, and so on, giving a list of approximately 15 titles.

Also, Mr. Stein was coauthor of a study of American trade with Pacific countries, which was slated for fall publication in 1947 by the Institute of Pacific Relations.

Mr. MORRIS. We offer that document as the next exhibit.

(The document referred to was marked "Exhibit No. 83" and is as follows:)

Study of American Trade with Pacific Countries by Guenther Stein.

Shirley Jenkins and an advisory committee of businessmen versed in problems of far eastern trade. Publication date—fall, 1947.

Senator FERGUSON. Do we find anywhere that Stein ever wrote under a fictitious name, an alias?

Mr. MANDEL. I have no record of that.

Senator FERGUSON. Norman was supposed to, was he not? Is not there evidence in the hearing, a letter?

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, in introducing this compilation of Mr. Mandel's, I would like to have the record show that there were 21 contributions through the years by Mr. Guenther Stein to the Institute of Pacific Relations in one of its subdivisions.

The CHAIRMAN. I want to tie this in properly.

Mr. Mandel, in your listing here, from what source did you get the information?

Mr. MANDEL. From the Index to Pacific Affairs and Far Eastern Survey, as published by the Institute of Pacific Relations.

The CHAIRMAN. You found it where?

Mr. MANDEL. In the actual index that they publish.

Mr. SOURWINE. Do you mean you looked at the magazines yourself, Mr. Mandel?

Mr. MANDEL. At the index.

Mr. MORRIS. And you made up this compilation having the official records in front of you?

Mr. MANDEL. Yes.

General WILLOUGHBY. Can I contribute something?

Mr. MORRIS. Very well, General.

General WILLOUGHBY. This is a purely impromptu, off-the-cuff contribution, but as you are establishing, I take it, the literary quality of Mr. Stein, this is what we thought about that field.

Lately I have read a most illuminating study by Mrs. Irene Kuhn on the subject of, to me a revealing subject, of how Communist-slanted books bought, sold, reviewed, peddled, propagandized, log-rolled or log-jammed, as the case may be.

I am quoting from this article.

After an absence of 13 years from the United States, I am, of course, avid for information that would give me the modern landscape.

Mrs. Kuhn's article, which had its fifth reprint in the American Legion, deals with the technique of propagating, peddling, and supporting Communist-tainted books.

Guenther Stein's reports by their titles, I would say, look rather innocuous. But this is what one of our investigators has to say about him:

> Late in 1944 he was one of a group of six who visited Yenan.

Yenan is a hot-land of Chinese Communists, the cradle of Chou Teh and other gentlemen with whom we are now engaged in North Korea.

> He was one of the two correspondents whose accounts of Communist China were published as books. His Challenge of Red China (McGraw-Hill, 1945) has the outward appearance of thoughtful reporting. His book has had a great deal of effect in perpetuating the legend that Chinese Communists aren't Communists and are not in any way connected with the Soviet Union—a legend started and kept alive so much earlier by Agnes Smedley. Like Agnes Smedley, Guenther Stein was an established Soviet agent, and one can be certain that neither of them was publishing the truth about Chinese Communists.

Senator FERGUSON. Again, that is a memorandum from one of your staff; is it?

General WILLOUGHBY. Yes, and filed with the War Department, and is part of the original report of 1947, 1948, and 1949.

Senator FERGUSON. That is the one that was later suppressed after it was released.

General WILLOUGHBY. It was later, shall we say, released and then given the "cold shoulder."

Mr. MORRIS. And you think, Senator, it is significant that when Herbert Norman did write for Pacific Affairs, Carter and Lattimore wanted him to write under a nom de plume?

Senator FERGUSON. That is right. I think that ought to appear in the record, owing to Wittfogel's testimony.

Senator WATKINS. Would that not be because he was a member of the Canadian Foreign Service and could not write, without getting into trouble, under his own name?

Mr. MORRIS. It may well be.

I would like to introduce into the record at this time, Mr. Chairman, a memorandum dated June 24, 1942, from Mr. "W. W. L."—presumably Mr. Lockwood—to "E. C. C. and W. L. H."—presumably Mr. Carter and Mr. Holland. This reads:

A further comment on circulating Guenther Stein's stuff in Washington: When I mentioned it to John Fairbank he expressed a great interest in seeing it and summoned together his China staff—

Now, at that time Mr. Fairbank was associated with the OWI—who all voiced a similar interest. John also suggested that his office might be asked to trade certain information in return. I am leaving the matter for you to handle, however.

I would like to introduce this into the record, Mr. Chairman, as evidence of the fact that the Office of War Information at that time was expressing a great deal of interest in seeing Guenther Stein's—as Mr. Lockwood says—"stuff" in Washington.

The CHAIRMAN. Just a minute.

Will you identiy that, please?

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Mandel, will you identify that as an authentic document?

The CHAIRMAN. Where did you get it? Where did it come from? What is its authenticity?

Mr. MANDEL. I identify this memorandum dated June 24, 1942, from "W. W. L. to E. C. C." marked also "W. L. H." as taken from the files of the Institute of Pacific Relations.

(The document referred to was marked "Exhibit No. 84" and is as follows:)

EXHIBIT No. 84

JUNE 24, 1942.

W. W. L. to E. C. C., W. L. H.

A further comment on circulating Guenther Stein's stuff in Washington: When I mentioned it to John Fairbank, he expressed a great interest in seeing it and summoned together his China staff, who all voiced a similar interest. John also suggested that his office might be asked to trade certain information in return. I am leaving the matter for you to handle, however.

The CHAIRMAN. You may proceed, Mr. Morris.

Mr. MORRIS. General Willoughby, I wonder if you would tell us what this espionage ring was able to accomplish by way of transmitting secret information to the Soviet Government and aiding the Soviet foreign policy?

General WILLOUGHBY. There is an enormous amount of information of records on that subject, Mr. Morris. I will touch upon the high lights for this committee.

For example, under interrogation from memory alone, in the initial stages, Sorge dispatched more than 50 reports, Klausen another 50. The decoded radio messages added much greater detail.

The CHAIRMAN. Radio messages from whom to whom?

General WILLOUGHBY. From Sorge via Klausen to his Russian superiors. The relays were either via Harbin or direct to Khabarovsk.

However, the year 1941 was naturally the crucial year for all of us, and I think you will get an impression of the quality and importance of those reports if I limit myself roughly to that year, 1939–40, with emphasis on 1941.

For example, the relation of Russia with the Central Powers, with Germany, was of an immense interest in that year. Sorge, having a position as press attaché of the German Embassy, on the one hand, and having a direct access to Prince Konoye—that is, the Japanese Premier—and/or their State Department, through Ozaki, was in a position of not only obtaining the details of the German negotiations, which he relayed promptly to his Russian masters, but he was able to get the reaction or actions of the Foreign Office and do likewise.

Now, that information, if the Allies had known it—had had advance notice of this in that critical year 1941—might have changed the course of history.

For example, the quality of this man's reports is an example: An appraisal of the Japanese output of munitions, which, from a military viewpoint is, of course, terribly important to all those who were then contemplating or considering Japan as a potential enemy.

He made periodical reports beginning with February of 1940 throughout 1940 and 1941.

In August 1941 he reported an item which the American Navy was intensely interested in, had they known it; namely, the record of petroleum storage and stockage available to the Japanese military forces.

His report was that there was in storage in Japan sufficient petroleum for 2 years' use by the Navy, half a year by the Army, and half a year by the nation at large. That became a prime military objective for use in the course of the war.

On the 20th of May, through his connections, of course, with the German military attaché in the Embassy, of which he was a member——

Mr. MORRIS. Will you describe, General Willoughby, exactly what his relationship was?

General WILLOUGHBY. He was the officially designated press relations officer of the German Embassy in Tokyo.

The CHAIRMAN. You are referring to whom now?

General WILLOUGHBY. Sorge.

Mr. MORRIS. Who was the German Ambassador at that time?

General WILLOUGHBY. General Ott, whom he had known in China and by a process of friendship probably got this assignment.

Mr. MORRIS. General Willoughby, did Richard Sorge hold a military rank in the Soviet Army?

General WILLOUGHBY. He was, as he stated, "a subordinate to the Fourth Bureau," which is the intelligence section of the Soviet Army, and had the assimilated rank of colonel.

In other words, you find a Russian intelligence officer being the press attaché, with diplomatic immunity, at the German Embassy, at a time when the relationship of these two nations was one of crucial international balance.

Mr. MORRIS. And this time you are now describing is May 1941? That is just 1 month prior to the Hitler invasion of the Soviet Union?

General WILLOUGHBY. Yes.

The type of Sorge's reports was due, of course, probably not to inherent talent, but to the advantages of his unusual position.

On the 20th of May 1941, he flashed a warning—meaning to Russia—that the Reichswehr would concentrate from 170 to 190 divisions on the Soviet border, and on the 28th of June would attack along the entire frontier; the main effort, however, would be made in the direction of Moscow.

This attack did occur on the 22d of June.

Senator FERGUSON. Of course, General, that brings me back to many of the things that happened at the Pearl Harbor hearings. We were slightly interested in knowing whether Japan was going to attack America, Russia, or Britain in her colony.

General WILLOUGHBY. Right.

Senator FERGUSON. And if we had Americans like Smedley in this spy ring, they may have been able to acquire, through various rings, for instance, here in Washington—we have learned about papers being taken from the State Department—that Japan was getting some information through this same spy ring to her as to what our intentions were.

Is that not possible?

General WILLOUGHBY. Your point is well taken, Senator, and I think I can give you a connecting link here.

The potential of Japan to attack Russia via Siberia or to attack south, which would involve the Philippines—that is, United States and the British—was of equal interest to Russia, but it was also of equal interest to us. And the deduction which is permissible, if Smedley was in a position of intimacy with this bird Sorge, is that she might have obtained that information, too, had she been on the right side of the fence.

But regardless of that, sir, actually that became Sorge's main mission. He was ordered to concentrate on what Japan was going to do, because without that knowledge the Russians would not withdraw from the Siberian mainland the divisions they maintained.

Once having assurance that Japan would go south—that is, an attack which would involve the United States—they were then free to denude their Siberian border and put their troops into the defense of the frontier then in existence.

Actually, they came in time to save the situation in the German advance—well, their farthest advance in that period: Smolensk, Stalingrad.

So it might be said that, predicated on the information furnished by this superbly competent agent, the Russian situation on the west front depended as a life and death question. He gave them the answer.

This is very interesting—always with a background of your own and pre-Pearl Harbor inquiries, which I remember very well, indeed.

Sorge maintained a concentrated watch on United States-Japanese negotiations during the summer and fall of 1941. His information was full and accurate; naturally so, since Ozaki was so close to Prince Konoye, the keyman in these negotiations.

During early October, Sorge reported on this mobilization, that it was completed in mid-September and that men from 25 to 35 years had been called up—mobilization of an expansion in forces as a prelude to war.

By the 15th of October, Sorge transmitted his final sober conclusions that the Japanese had decided to move south, and that there now was no serious danger of an attack through Manchuria in the direction of Siberia. He felt that his mission was completed.

He drafted a dispatch, suggesting his recall to the Soviet Union. His radio operator Klausen argued that his request was premature, and the message was never sent. Three days later Sorge and Klausen were under arrest.

Mr. MORRIS. It is significant, General, that they were arrested just a few days after their mission was accomplished; is it not?

General WILLOUGHBY. The throw of the dice—the fortunes of war.

Mr. MORRIS. General, we have had testimony before this committee that high officials of the Institute of Pacific Relations, some of whom have been identified as members of the Communist Party, exerted great efforts in November 1941 to prevent a 90-day truce being worked out between Japan and the United States.

This committee has that testimony both in executive and open session, namely, that high officials of the Institute of Pacific Relations, some of whom have been identified as members of the Communist Party, made great efforts to prevent a 90-day truce being worked out between the United States and Japan.

I wonder if you would care to comment on that and possibly correlate any information or evidence that you have with that testimony.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Smith, the calendar is to be called on the floor. The chairman of this committee has many bills on that calendar. Will you kindly take the chair and carry on for me?

General, I am sorry to have to leave. I will be back to see you again.

Senator SMITH. Will you proceed, Mr. Morris?

Mr. MORRIS. Does the general understand the question?

General WILLOUGHBY. Would you mind repeating it?

Senator FERGUSON. Before you proceed with that, if I might refer back, I would like to introduce a memorandum from the Pearl Harbor hearings, joint hearings, page 1160, held in 1945. The memorandum is dated Chungking, November 25, 1941.

Mr. MORRIS. That can be marked the next exhibit number.

(The document referred to was marked "Exhibit No. 85" and is as follows:)

EXHIBIT No. 85[1]

[Exhibit taken from hearings on Pearl Harbor attack, 1945, p. 1160]

CHUNGKING, November 25, 1941.

LAUCHLIN CURRIE: After discussing with the generalissimo the Chinese Ambassador's conference with the Secretary of State, I feel you should urgently advise the President of the generalissimo's very strong reaction. I have never seen him really agitated before. Loosening of economic pressure or unfreezing would dangerously increase Japan's military advantage in China. A relaxation of American pressure while Japan has its forces in China would dismay the Chinese. Any modus vivendi now arrived at with China would be disastrous to Chinese belief in America and analogous to the closing of the Burma Road, which permanently destroyed British prestige. Japan and Chinese defeatists would instantly exploit the resulting disillusionment and urge oriental solidarity against occidental treachery. It is doubtful whether either past assistance or increasing aid could compensate for the feeling of being deserted at this hour. The generalissimo has deep confidence in the President's fidelity to his consistent policy but I must warn you that even the generalissimo questions his ability to hold the situation together if the Chinese national trust in America is undermined by reports of Japan's escaping military defeat by diplomatic victory.

[1] Previously used as exhibit No. 24.

LATTIMORE.

Mr. MORRIS. To get back to the question, General:

We have introduced into the record documents and testimony to the effect that high officials of the Institute of Pacific Relations, some of whom have been identified before this committee in executive and open session as members of the Communist Party, or connected with the Communist Party, were making efforts in November 1941, to prevent the United States and Japan from effecting a 90-day truce at the time, at the request of the military leaders of the country, namely, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

A 90-day truce was sought in order to prevent any outbreak of hostilities. We had evidence, as I say, introduced, General, that IPR officials, top officials in the IPR, were trying to prevent that truce from being effected.

I wonder if any evidence or information that you acquired while you were in Tokyo would have any bearing on the testimony that we have already taken before this committee on that score, General Willoughby.

General WILLOUGHBY. I would say that this is a very complicated question, since it deals with activities in the United States when I was absent in the Philippines at that time, since 1938.

And, of course, I must delegate activity to other officers and cannot specifically point to anything that is in the nature of concrete evidence.

With this limiting background and based purely on recollection, and guided solely by a desire, of course, to assist this committee in its hard-working enterprise, I will say that, as a student of history and of Japan, that I have the impression that Prince Konoye was desperately serious in effecting a last-minute understanding with the United States and that there was, in the opinion of many Japanese of substance and probity, there was a fear that certain elements, unidentified in the States, were opposed to such an understanding.

That is probably an unsatisfactory answer, but it is the best I can do.

Mr. MORRIS. Thank you very much, General.

Senator Ferguson has made reference to a dispatch sent by Owen Lattimore, who at that time was personal adviser to Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek, to Lauchlin Currie, who was then executive assistant to the White House, in which Lattimore urged that the modus vivendi be rejected. The date of that is November 25, 1941.

Further, General, we had testimony here from Mr. Carter that he was called down to Washington by Harry Dexter White, who was then Under Secretary of the Treasury, asking Mr. Carter to use his influence to prevent any—as he described it—sell-out of China at that time.

At that time they were showing a concern for China, when this took that form.

General WILLOUGHBY. Amazing, amazing.

Mr. MORRIS. This has already been introduced into the record.

Now, in connection with Guenther Stein, I would like to point out, General, that you have been testifying through your records that Guenther Stein was doing espionage work for the Soviet fourth bureau, fourth army.

General WILLOUGHBY. There is his association, with Sorge as one of his associates. If we established that he was a trusted and important associate of Sorge—and that, I think, is established—I will take out the words, "I think"; we've got it all, cross-reference of Klausen, his wife, Kawai, et cetera.

So if we classify him as a bona fide member of this ring, then, of course, the reference of reporting to the fourth army is to be understood in that light.

He didn't report directly. He reported to Sorge, and it was Sorge who relayed the information.

I think it is a fine distinction which I may be exaggerating, but I am making it.

Mr. MORRIS. General, I would like to point out that he has written 21 articles for the Institute of Pacific Relations and two more letters, which Mr. Mandel will authenticate and read into the record on Guenther Stein, as well as the letter from Mr. Lockwood to Mr. Carter and Mr. Holland that the Office of War Information and the Institute of Pacific Relations was circulating—to use their own words—"Guenther Stein's stuff in Washington."

I see here in this letter we have already introduced Lockwood says:

When I mentioned it to John Fairbank—who was then head of the China section of OWI—

he expressed a great interest in seeing it and summoned together his China staff, who all voiced a similar interest.

In other words, the Office of War Information was actively promulgating Guenther Stein's material. So it apparently served another function at that time, did it not, General?

General WILLOUGHBY. I would agree with you; yes.

Senator FERGUSON. Of course, the evidence clearly shows that he was an agent of the Comintern, so that he at all times, whether they be two or one, the Red army and communism in Russia, he was serving both those according to the documented record. Is that not right?

General WILLOUGHBY. He was; in his capacity as an indispensable and important member of the Sorge organization, whose complete purposes were for these two agencies that you mentioned, the army, on the one hand, the Comintern, on the other.

I haven't the slightest hesitancy personally, if you wish to ascertain that, that Stein is as guilty as Smedley or any of the others listed.

Senator FERGUSON. And you have no doubt, have you, from these records, that Stein was a Communist?

General WILLOUGHBY. None; none whatever.

Senator FERGUSON. Smedley was a Communist?

General WILLOUGHBY. I have no doubt about that, personally.

And I notice there is a reference, which Mr. Morris has, that Sorge recommended her to the clearinghouse in Moscow, who pass on the bona fides of these agents, and he needed the supporting certification of another card-bearing member and he got it from somebody.

Anyway, that is a very unusual step to have taken, and I base my feelings about her on this.

Senator FERGUSON. So you have not any doubt that she was one, have you?

General WILLOUGHBY. I have no doubt.

Mr. MORRIS. About Guenther Stein's present activity, General, do you know from official authority that he was arrested for espionage in France in 1950?

General WILLOUGHBY. Yes. Of course, Mr. Morris, when you begin to sum up or draw conclusions, my opinion, or, rather, my thought process is probably not any better than yours, but when I know of an individual with that record disappearing at the time a report was published—he disappeared within 24 hours after the War Department released the 1949 version—and then remains incognito at large and then picked up by the French police in the spring on an espionage charge, he is one of the boys who continued to be in the same business.

Conversely, talking about Smedley, with due deference to her demise, you find her being pictured by a columnist at the time, and notably Mr. Harold Ickes, as an upright American woman, of unimpeachable reputation, veracity, and political coloring, and then find her willing her ashes to Chou Teh, the commander in chief of the Chinese Communist Army, with whom we are now engaged in Korea, and having her ashes placed in a special shrine in Peking, under actual governmental ceremony of extreme value in the heartland of Asiatic communism.

You don't have to be either a police officer or investigative genius to draw your almost inescapable conclusion on these two characters.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Mandel, I wonder if you would read into the record two letters which bear on Guenther Stein's position and activity in the Institute of Pacific Relations?

Mr. MANDEL. I read one letter from the fiiles of the Institute of Pacific Relations, dated July 6, 1942, addressed to Mr. Richard R. Sanger, Economic Intelligence Division, Board of Economic Warfare, Washington, D. C., from W. L. Holland:

> In reply to your letter of June 29 to Mr. Lockwood, of the American council, I am glad to send you under separate cover our latest radio letter from Guenther Stein in Chungking.
>
> Some of this material will probably be used in a forthcoming issue of the Far Eastern Survey, but you may be interested to have it in the meantime.
>
> As far as possible we shall try to send you these reports from Stein as soon as they come in.
>
> Sincerely yours.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to introduce this into evidence as further evidence of Guenther Stein's activity through the Institute of Pacific Relations.

(The document referred to was marked "Exhibit No. 86" and is as follows:)

EXHIBIT No. 86

NEW YORK CITY, July 6, 1943.

Re: OW–S–FES.
Mr. RICHARD H. SANGER,
Economic Intelligence Division, Board of Economic Welfare,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SANGER: In reply to your letter of June 29 to Mr. Lockwood, of the American Council, I am glad to send you under separate cover our latest radio letter from Guenther Stein in Chungking.

Some of this material will probably be used in a forthcoming issue of the Far Eastern Survey, but you may be interested to have it in the meantime.

As far as possible, we shall try to send you these reports from Stein as soon as they come in.

Sincerely yours,

W. L. HOLLAND.

Mr. MANDEL. I have another letter here, addressed to W. MacMahon Ball, of the Austral-Asiatic Bulletin, at 177 Collins Street, Melbourne, Australia, dated February 3, 1939, from Owen Lattimore. I read one sentence:

Guenther Stein, who is by long odds the best economic journalist in the Far East, writes an article on the inherent weakness of Japan.

Mr. MORRIS. This is now from Mr. Lattimore, is it, Mr. Mandel?

Mr. MANDEL. This is still from Mr. Lattimore's letter:

If an authority of the standing of Stein makes a case as strong as this in an article on the weakness of Japan, should the instinctive response be "what is on the Japanese side?" Should it not be "If this is true, how does it affect Australian interests?"

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to introduce into evidence as the next exhibit the letter just read from by Mr. Mandel.

(The document referred to was marked "Exhibit No. 87," and is as follows:)

EXHIBIT No. 87

300 GILMAN HALL, JOHNS HOPKINS UNIVERSITY,
Baltimore, Md., February 6, 1939.

Dr. W. MACMAHON BALL,
Austral-Asiatic Bulletin,
Melbourne, C. 2, Australia.

DEAR BALL: To my unspeakable chagrin I have missed a cog. I made a mental note that your boat sailed on February 9, and was going to catch you by air mail. Today I had the article ready for mailing and on turning up my written note found that you had sailed on February 1. I am terribly ashamed of this as I like to make a point of hitting my assignments on the nose.

Anyhow I am sending the article herewith by air mail to Los Angeles, hoping it will catch a fast mail from there. If it arrives too late, has to be held over an issue, and thereby gets out of date, throw it in the wastebasket and blame me.

I am sending a carbon copy to E. C. Carter, who may overhaul the original with a fast letter to you asking you not to publish. I am making a general practice of submitting everything I write to Carter so that he can reprove me whenever I say anything unbecoming a propagandist and a gentleman.

Following up our conversation at lunch, I have read the December-January issue of the Bulletin, the latest to arrive here. This issue contains an example of what I shall rudely call exaggerated neutrality. Guenther Stein, who is by long odds the best economic journalist in the Far East, writes an article on the inherent weakness of Japan. One of your editors hastened to soften the shock and to avoid any impression that the Bulletin is anti-Japanese by writing an article in which he seeks to prove that there is a lot to be said on the other side. The impression thus created is that the war in the Far East is no business of Australians. Australians can look at it from a safe distance and say "Well, well, how interesting. A lot to be said on both sides, evidently."

Is this true? If an authority of the standing of Stein makes a case as strong as this in an article on the weakness of Japan, should the instinctive response be "What is to be said on the Japanese side?" Should it not be "If this is true, how does it affect Australian interests?" For the fact of the matter is that you in Australia and we in America have the same kind of interest in the outcome of this war. We are not distant and disinterested spectators. A victory for Japan would mean one kind of world, in which we should be vitally interested. A victory for China would mean another kind of world, in which we should also be vitally interested. I am distressed at the lack of realization of this in both America and Australia. We keep balancing "what can be said for China" with "what can be said for Japan" dodging the really important questions, which are "Where do we come in, or where do we get out?"

As far as the Bulletin is concerned, all of this is none of my business. Consider, therefore, that the seat of my pants presents a broad target, and deliver me a long-distance kick in the middle thereof at your leisure.

I hope we'll be meeting again.

Very sincerely,

OWEN LATTIMORE.

Mr. MORRIS. General Willoughby, I understand that there is a slight conflict here in the date of Guenther Stein's arrest in Paris. Apparently the testimony conflicts. You said last spring, and again I think you said in 1950.

General WILLOUGHBY. Of course, I am not a walking file case, naturally, having this type of information at my fingertips.

Have you got a translation which I will identify as having been made by me? That is a message from the French Ambassador to me.

Mr. MORRIS. Yes, we have that, General.

General WILLOUGHBY. That will give you the date. It must have been this spring.

Mr. MORRIS. Yes, we will get that, General.

General WILLOUGHBY. The INS carried it as a news item. I am so impressed with the accuracy of intelligence reporting by journalistic professionals that I consider their reportage as always a part of my evidence. So if you cannot locate it there, I know of an INS dispatch at that time. It must have been around February, I should say, offhand speaking.

If the INS hasn't got it, then I am sure AP has. If not, Mr. Bett.

Mr. MORRIS. While we are getting that, General, I would like to ask you about certain leaders of the IPR who were active at headquarters during the war.

During last Tuesday's session, General, we had testimony from Prof. Karl Wittfogel that T. A. Bisson was a member of the Communist Party when Dr. Wittfogel knew him back in 1935—I think the date was.

Do you know that Mr. Bisson was assigned to your headquarters and served there until 1948, General Willoughby?

General WILLOUGHBY. I have a recollection that Bisson was a Department of Army civilian employee in one of the civil sections of SCAP, probably the Government section, in the period 1946–48.

Here again the exact dates you have to indulge the fact that I do not have the details of every investigative case at my fingertips.

Senator FERGUSON. I want to ask a question, if I might, please.

Mr. MORRIS. By all means, Senator.

Senator FERGUSON. General, are you under the same ban as other witnesses who came here, that they are unable to testify in relation to personnel files and so-called loyalty files?

General WILLOUGHBY. I am.

Senator FERGUSON. In other words, your lips are closed to this committee and you are unable to give to this committee anything in relation to a personnel file?

General WILLOUGHBY. Correct.

Senator FERGUSON. So if there is or is not a personnel file and its contents on any of these people that we are talking about in the United States Government, the people cannot learn through this committee what that file shows, or anything that is in that file, or your knowledge as to that file; is that correct?

General WILLOUGHBY. Will you permit me, Mr. Chairman, as this is a question of administrative significance, that I answer that in my way?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes; you may answer it your way. I do not call for a yes or no answer. I just want the evidence. I want the facts.

General WILLOUGHBY. The point was brought up by the counsel yesterday in which he requested from me information on Mr. T. A. Bisson, one Miriam Farley, and one Grajdanzev, who has since changed his name to Grad.

Mr. MORRIS. And they, General, are people who have been active in the Institute of Pacific Relations, are they?

General WILLOUGHBY. I realize that.

Mr. MORRIS. Who were employed at your headquarters, who were assigned to your headquarters by executive authority in the United States?

General WILLOUGHBY. Correct. They were hired in the States and unloaded on Tokyo.

Senator FERGUSON. I think the word "unloaded" may enable us to draw some conclusions from that word.

General WILLOUGHBY. In which case, Mr. Chairman, you must permit me an editorial rescission.

Senator FERGUSON. Yes; I understand that.

General WILLOUGHBY. I would like to put it this way: Mr. Chairman, as a citizen, I am naturally most desirous to assist this important committee. However, as a Federal officer, I am expected to observe Army orders and Presidential directives.

I invite your attention to a Department of Army circular letter dated August 21, 1948, on the subject, Release of Personnel Records and Information. I quote:

> No information of any sort relating to the employee's loyalty and no investigative data of any type, whether relating to loyalty or other aspects of the individual's record, shall be included in material submitted to a congressional committee.

The provision of the Presidential directive of March 13, 1949, I intended to apply to records of former employees as well as persons now in the Federal service.

These people, Bisson, Farley, Grajdanzev, fall under the category of former employees.

Still quoting the regulation:

> Any individual who may appear as a witness before a congressional committee will respectfuly decline to testify concerning the loyalty of any person or as to the contents of any investigative files and will state that he is forbidden to answer such questions by pertinent directives of the Army.

Senator WATKINS. I take it, General, that the order of that directive is not classified.

General WILLOUGHBY. No. The basis is the Presidential directive of 13th of March 1948.

You can find it in Bulletin No. 6, Department of the Army, on the 17th of March 1948.

Senator FERGUSON. We have had high military officers and others quote the same in the hearings where the present Chair was chairman.

In other words, you are unable to give us this information?

General WILLOUGHBY. Based on the precise wording of this.

Senator FERGUSON. I shall, however, ask the chairman of this subcommittee if he will not again ask the President to allow this committee to have access, through you or someone else, to personnel files in relation to activities of certain people whose names are brought to the attention of the committee, particularly those connected with the Institute of Pacific Relations.

Senator WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I want the record to show that I join in that request.

General WILLOUGHBY. May I add the following?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes.

General WILLOUGHBY. I desire to further clarify my position in this matter and say that the personnel files and records are within the purview of Counterintelligence.

While this investigation unit, like the Four Hundred and Forty-first CIC in Tokyo, is a subdivision of G–2, my personal and prior attention was concentrated on the Korean War effort and on military intelligence in the Far East.

Ultimately you must obtain information from officers whose sole business it was to develop and maintain personnel investigations.

I am, of course, not familiar with the details of literally thousands of file references or case histories.

Senator FERGUSON. Apparently the same rule applies not only to personnel files and those that have been employed, but it applied to Mr. Frederick Vanderbilt Field, who made an application for a position as an official in the Intelligence Branch of the United States Military Service.

The present Chair asked for that file, and all that is in it is merely a medical report, but no application for the position or letters of recommendation, or anything else. Nothing is in the file except a medical report.

Senator WATKINS. That is notwithstanding evidence to the fact that numerous other persons had made statements referring to said letters.

Senator FERGUSON. Yes; notwithstanding their testimony.

I want to express my opinion to the witness, the able general in Intelligence, that he does feel that he is bound by a Presidential and a military superior order, and he has given the reason for not giving this information and not answering these questions, that I accept his explanation.

But that does not prevent me, as a Senator and temporary chairman, from advocating to the chairman and to the counsel that we again, in behalf of the people of the United States, ask for this information, because I think it is valuable to our internal security and our defense.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, in this connection, I would like to point out that the reason we are asking for these particular three files is that Mr. T. A. Bisson, Miss Miriam Farley, and Mr. Andrew Grad have been active people in the Institute of Pacific Relations, who in addition were assigned to General Willoughby's headquarters.

Senator FERGUSON. That is correct.

Mr. MORRIS. I will ask Mr. Mandel if he will further identify from the exhibits already introduced, and letters that we may introduce now, something about the identity of those three people.

Senator FERGUSON. I might say in reply to that that is true, and it is always our duty, as members of this committee, to produce all the evidence we can outside of what the official records show, which would aid us greatly.

But it creates an impossible burden on many occasions upon this committee to complete its investigation.

Senator WATKINS. This record is from the letters taken from the IPR files, is it?

Mr. MORRIS. Some of the letters and some from exhibits already introduced, Senator.

Mr. MANDEL. It has been previously introduced that the Windows On the Pacific biennial report of the American Council, Institute of Pacific Relations, dated 1944 to 1946, on page 11, refers to T. A. Bisson, of the international secretariat.

Another exhibit previously introduced was a letter to Mr. Bisson from Wilma Fairbank, dated October 19, 1943, which referred to Mr. Bisson as the acting editor of Pacific Affairs.

Mr. MORRIS. So he was a member of the secretariat as well as the acting editor of the Pacific Affairs before he was assigned to General Willoughby's headquarters in Tokyo?

Mr. MANDEL. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. How about Mr. Grajdanzev?

Senator WATKINS. What is the date of that letter?

Mr. MANDEL. The date of the letter was October 19, 1943, and the date of the report was 1944–46.

Mr. MORRIS. They have already been introduced, Senator.

Senator FERGUSON. You may proceed.

Mr. MANDEL. I have here a letter taken from the files of the Institute of Pacific Relations, dated November 26, 1941, addressed to Mr. Robert K. Straus, 10 Rockefeller Plaza, New York, N. Y., from Robert W. Barnett.

I read a portion of this letter which refers to Mr. Grajdanzev:

> A month ago one department of the United States Government, and then later three departments, asked the institute for a monograph on the carrying capacity of the Trans-Siberian Railway together with a full analysis of the differentials in east to western movement of goods, the location of repair shops and round houses, the various points where congestion occurs, etc. Mr. Grajdanzev prepared a monograph which has been hailed in three Government departments as far more accurate than anything which they themselves could have prepared. This is just a sample of the kind of work which the institute is able to do and explains why the governments in this and other countries are so eager to get the services of members of the institute staff.

Mr. MORRIS. I would like that introduced into the record, Mr. Chairman, and have that marked as the next consecutive exhibit.

Senator FERGUSON. It will be received.

(The document referred to was marked "Exhibit No. 88," and is as follows:)

EXHIBIT No. 88

NOVEMBER 26, 1941.

Mr. ROBERT K. STRAUS,
New York, N. Y.

DEAR MR. STRAUS: In response to your request for me to do so, I have tried to set down in this letter how the American Council of the Institute of Pacific Relations has risen to the demands of the national emergency.

From the Army, Navy, the Federal Reserve Bank, the Department of Commerce, the Administrator of Export Control, and the Office of Price Administration and Civilian Supplies have come repeated calls for assistance which have been fulfilled by our research staff. Owen Lattimore, as you know, the editor of Pacific Affairs, was loaned to serve, on the nomination of President Roosevelt, as Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek's personal political adviser. We loaned first to the Universal Trading Corp. and then to the American, British, and Chinese Governments Ch'ao-ting Chi to serve as Secretary General of the A. B. C. Currency Stabilization Fund. We are glad that the War Department has recognized the ability of our expert on the Netherlands East Indies, Miss Ellen van Zyll de Jong, by giving her a research appointment. We assisted in arranging that Irving Friedman, a former member of the Secretariat, enter the division of monetary research of the Treasury Department. William W. Lockwood, on temporary leave, has worked as secretary of the American Committee for International Studies, and simultaneously for General Maxwell's and for Colonel Donovan's offices in Washington, but recently has taken over the secretaryship of the American Council. Both Mr. Carter and I have been invited to serve on the staff of the office of the Coordinator of Information, but have remained here because the necessity for popular education and private research seemed now more urgent.

A month ago one department of the United States Government, and then later three departments, asked the institute for a monograph on the carrying capacity of the Trans-Siberian Railway together with a full analysis of the differentials in east to western movement of goods, the location of repair shops and roundhouses, the various points where congestion occurs, etc. Mr. Grajdanzev prepared a monograph which has been hailed in three government departments as far more accurate than anything which they themselves could have prepared. This is just a sample of the kind of work which the institute is able to do and explains why the governments in this and other countries are so eager to get the services of members of the institute staff.

Our service to governments has not, happily, lessened thus far our aid to business groups, the press, and university and secondary-school circles. The demands for institute services from all these groups is greater than ever before. We provided indispensable information to the Fortune staff as it prepared its far eastern issue. We have assisted teachers' organizations to carry out their far eastern projects. We have set up some 13 regional conferences. Under the leadership of Catherine Porter, Miriam Farley, Dorothy Berg, and Kurt Bloch, a greatly enlivened Far Eastern Survey reaches a wider and more attentive audience. We broadcast weekly over CBS. We are publishing inexpensive pamphlets, among them Showdown at Singapore, Philippine Emergency, Japan Strikes South, Our Far Eastern Record, American Aid to China, and the Soviet Far East.

In the international field only in France and Holland has the work of the institute been curtailed. The Royal Institute in London has recently augmented its studies of the Far East and the far-eastern program of the Canadian and Australian institutes is more fundamental and better supported than at any period in the past.

You will agree with me, I feel sure, that the reasons which led to your support of the American Council last year are doubly valid now. May I suggest that you raise your 1940 contribution of $25 to $50 for 1941–42? This may prove to be the year of the long-awaited Japanese-American war—or, of Japan's surrender to ABCD economic pressure. Either development will greatly increase the American Council's responsibilities to our Government and to the American public.

Very sincerely yours,

ROBERT W. BARNETT.

Senator FERGUSON. For the purpose of explaining to the members of the committee, who are Mr. Straus and this man Barnett?

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Straus is of no significance in this instance, Senator, but Mr. Barnett served as secretary of the Washington office, I believe, and is now an important official of the United States State Department.

Senator WATKINS. Do the records show that?

Mr. MORRIS. In other places, Senator.

As I say, at this point we say that Mr. Straus has no significance in this.

Mr. MANDEL. I have here a letter taken from the files of the Institute of Pacific Relations, dated July 10, 1941, addressed to Lt. Col. Frederick D. Sharp, room 811, 1270 Sixth Avenue, New York, N. Y.

Our research has shown that Colonel Sharp was at that time connected with Military Intelligence.

The letter states:

DEAR COLONEL SHARP: I am sorry for the delay in answering your questions on the Siberian railways. I had hoped to put one of my colleagues at work on it, but his schedule has been a little dislocated through learning that his father and two other members of his family were killed in the German bombing of Belgrade.

Instead, I have asked another of my colleagues, Mr. Andrew Grajdanzev, to turn up as much material as possible. Without sources he has drafted the enclosed very tentative memorandum, a copy of which I enclose.

Neither he nor I wish you to regard this interim report as authentic or definitive. To give you anything really satisfactory will take about 12 days of very thorough research. Mr. Grajdanzev and I hope we can send you something to meet your requirements not later than July 22. Will that be too late for your purposes?

Sincerely yours,

EDWARD C. CARTER.

Then there is another letter addressed to a Mr. Thurber. No initial is given. It is under date of July 23, 1941, addressed to the same address, room 811, 1207 Sixth Avenue, which was the office at that time of Military Intelligence:

My colleague, Andrew Grajdanzev, has handed me the first draft of his notes on the Trans-Siberian Railway. I have not had an opportunity to check through this, nor have I had any of my other colleagues check on it. However, knowing that you are in a hurry for this first draft, I am sending it over today and will send you any corrections as soon as they reach my desk.

Sincerely yours,

EDWARD C. CARTER.

Finally, I have a letter to Mr. Carter, Edward C. Carter, dated July 24, 1941, from Lt. Col. Frederick D. Sharp, G. S. C.:

DEAR MR. CARTER: I have received the report on the Trans-Siberian Railroad drawn up so ably by your colleague, Mr. Andrew Grajdanzev.

To thank both you and him in proportion to its value would be difficult. May it suffice to say that our own researches are at an end with such a reference source, and that Mr. Thurber, of my office, will be sorely tempted to draw on your knowledge of industries and raw materials east of the Urals, which is the next goal.

Senator FERGUSON. They will be received in evidence and marked the next consecutive exhibits.

of the book which is now being bound. I have already sent copies to Remer in the Office of the Coordinator of Information, and to Bisson on the Board of Economic Warfare.

Both Grajdanzev and I would be glad to have your comments, and if there are any points which you think should definitely be corrected I would suggest that you let me know in the next day or two, as we may want to insert an errata slip in the book. The book itself is unfortunately a makeshift piece of manufacturing because we had to work with an incomplete and unsatisfactory set of proofs.

Sincerely yours,

W. L. HOLLAND.

Finally, on April 2, 1942, George H. Kerr writes to William L. Holland, on the stationery of the War Department, War Department General Staff, Military Intelligence Division G–2, Room 2628, Munitions Building:

MY DEAR MR. HOLLAND: I regret that my sudden coming to Washington in February precluded further talks with you about Formosa, to say nothing of further writing.

Some weeks ago there came to our MID files—and my Formosa section—a set of galley sheets of Dr. Grajdanzev's extraordinarily good work, which I first saw briefly in your office and now have read thoroughly. No covering letter came with it to me and so it is not clear whether this is a loan or a final gift to our files. If it is not a loan, I shall be free to divide it according to subjects and distribute it among my folders. If it is a loan, I shall keep it intact and forward it to you as soon as some of the statistical material can be digested. We live very largely on loans these days.

Please tell Professor Grajdanzev that it will give me great pleasure some day to talk with him. His work is certainly excellent. There are only a few very minor suggestions I might make, none of first importance.

Have the added chapter or chapters on strategy been set up? I would not be free to add anything attributable to my sources here, but I would be glad to read through the chapter again to make sure that some errors in judgment have not crept in. Needless to say, such checking must be done anonymously.

With every good wish,

GEORGE H. KERR.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Mandel, I think that will suffice for Mr. Grajdanzev, who, as the record will show, has now changed his name to Mr. Grad.

Mr. MORRIS. I wonder, Mr. Mandel, if you can just tell us briefly who Miss Farley is, in connection with the Institute of Pacific Relations, and possiby one letter indicating that she was looking forward to her activity in Tokyo?

Mr. MANDEL. This is an excerpt from the volume entitled "Security in the Pacific," a preliminary report of the Ninth Conference of the Institute of Pacific Relations, at Hot Springs, Va., January 6–17, 1945.

On page 159 Miriam S. Farley is listed as having participated in the conferences of 1936, 1939, and 1942. She is listed here also as an editor of the American Council Pamphlet Series, research associate, American Council, IPR.

Mr. MORRIS. She was the editor of the Far Eastern Survey; was she not, Mr. Mandel?

Mr. MANDEL. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. We offer that document as the next exhibit.

Senator FERGUSON. It may be received.

CONFERENCE MEMBERSHIP, UNITED STATES

Miriam S. Farley (1936, 1939, 1942), editor, American Council Pamphlet Series, research associate, American Council, IPR (p. 159).

(Years in parentheses after names indicate attendance at previous IPR conferences.)

Mr. MANDEL. I have here another letter from the files of the Institute of Pacific Relations, dated April 8, 1946, addressed to "Dear Bill."

Senator FERGUSON. Who could "Bill" be?

Mr. MANDEL. It may be William L. Holland, or William W. Lockwood.

I read only the last paragraph, as follows:

I've been put to work doing the political section of MacArthur's Monthly report. There will be a certain sporting interest in seeing how much I can get by with.

Yours,

MIRIAM.

This is addressed from "M. S. Farley, GHQ, SCAP, Government Section, A. P. O. 500, Care Postmaster, San Francisco."

Senator FERGUSON. This would indicate that on April 8, 1946, Miriam whose name was—what?

Mr. MANDEL. Farley.

Mr. MORRIS. Miriam S. Farley?

Senator FERGUSON. "M. S. Farley, GHQ, SCAP, Government Section, A.P.O. 500, care of Postmaster, San Francisco." She was then a Government employee on General MacArthur's staff and she was writing to someone in the Institute of Pacific Relations, because this is in the file and you obtained it from that file, and the paragraph was as she had written it.

Mr. MANDEL. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORRIS. You have identified this from the files; have you not, Mr. Mandel?

Mr. MANDEL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. And it was that personnel file that we were asking the general about that we might get some information from. That is correct; is it not?

Mr. MANDEL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. I will receive the whole letter because we do not want to take a section out of context.

Mr. MORRIS. The whole letter is introduced into evidence and will be marked as the next consecutive exhibit number.

(The document referred to was marked "Exhibit No. 95," and is as follows:)

EXHIBIT No. 95

APRIL 8, 1946.

DEAR BILL: Matsuo asked me to send this on to you after I had read it. It is a report which he did for the political adviser's office, and is not for publication.

I saw Yasuo last week. He looks well though much older, and is working 10 hours a day as editor of the English edition of Jiji Press. He has a year-and-a-half-old son. He told quite a tale of the days of the surrender. It seems he was instrumental in breaking the story of the first note (accepting Potsdam terms on condition that Emperor, etc.). Domei, with which he then was, got hold of the note somehow from the Foreign Office and was not authorized to make it public. After consultation between Yasuo and his chief, they did so nevertheless—put it on the radio. Within half an hour they got a reaction from San Francisco. Then the Kempeitai (Gendarmerie) descended on them and they had quite a rough time for 3 days. Y.'s chief was locked up for a while. To cover themselves they claimed to have gotten the story from the Moscow radio.

I've been put to work doing the political section of MacArthur's monthly report. There will be a certain sporting interest in seeing how much I can get by with.

Yours,

MIRIAM.

M. S. FARLEY,
GHQ, SCAP, Government Section, A. P. O. 500, care of Postmaster, San Francisco.

P. S.—I forgot to say that Yasuo wanted to be remembered to you, Phil Lillienthal, and others at the IPR.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, we do not want to restrict our request for files to those particular people.

Senator FERGUSON. I understand that. The request may be in connection with all that you may list.

Mr. MORRIS. That are other particular people about whom we would also like a file, because we understand that there are such files in the Tokyo headquarters.

Senator FERGUSON. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. I think this would be a sufficient example and this will be the last we will cite, Hugh Deane, who was an active member of the IPR.

Mr. MANDEL. I have here a letter addressed to Mr. Hugh Deane, Radio News Room, Coordinator of Information, Washington, D. C., January 12, 1942, and signed by Miriam Farley:

It is good to know that you are working in our propaganda department because I know that you have a lot to contribute to it. I am passing on your letter to several of my colleagues, including Bill Lockwood, and you will probably be getting lots of suggestions from us. If you don't keep after us; we are standing on our heads.

Mr. MORRIS. And that was addressed to Mr. Hugh Deane at the Office of the Coordinator of Information?

Mr. MANDEL. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. And what was the date?

Mr. MANDEL. January 12, 1942.

Mr. MORRIS. I would like to have that introduced in the record, Mr. Chairman, as the next consecutive exhibit.

Senator FERGUSON. It will be received.

(The document referred to was marked "Exhibit No. 96" and is as follows:)

EXHIBIT No. 96

JANUARY 12, 1942.

MR. HUGH DEANE,
Radio News Room, Coordinator of Information,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR HUGH: It is good to know that you are working in our propaganda department because I know that you have a lot to contribute to it. I am passing on your letter to several of my colleagues, including Bill Lockwood, and you will probably be getting lots of suggestions from us. If you don't keep after us; we are standing on our heads.

One rather obvious suggestion that occurs to me offhand is to plug Hull's note of November 26 and other American statements such as our note of December 1938 indicating that the United States was always willing to consider the peaceful alteration of the status quo including economic concessions to Japan. "We made you a fair offer but your military leaders rejected it and chose war," etc. Another rather obvious line which has doubtless already occurred to you is, "the Nazis are not your friends, they look down on the Japanese race and are just using you for their own purposes." This can be backed up by quotations from Nazi writings, the kind of thing that is found in the special section of Asia magazine for November 1941.

For our part we shall of course be much interested to know the kind of stuff that our Government is broadcasting to Japan. Would it be possible for us to obtain a file of transcripts of these broadcasts? It seems to me that it would be a very good thing if at a little later date the Far Eastern Survey could carry a short article describing American propaganda to Japan providing that this is consistent to the policy of your department.

You will be interested to know, in case you have not already heard, that we are about to open an office in Washington for the purpose of keeping in touch with all of the various departments of the Government which are working on the Far East. Bob Barnett is to be in charge and some of the rest of us will doubtless get down occasionally. I know that Bob will want to look you up as soon as he gets established.

I am passing your order for the Far Eastern Survey on to the subscription department.

Sincerely yours,

MIRIAM FARLEY.

Mr. MORRIS. I would like the record also to show that previous exhibits have described Mr. Hugh Deane as the editor of a publication now being circulated and printed in Shanghai, which is Communist China.

Hugh Deane was listed as an associate editor of the Shanghai Monthly Bulletin, which is now published from Shanghai.

Senator FERGUSON. Do you know how long he has been connected in that capacity in Shanghai?

Mr. MORRIS. No. We have just introduced particular volumes, Mr. Chairman.

Senator FERGUSON. Hugh Deane was so associated in Communist China?

Mr. MORRIS. That is right, at the time China was under Communist control.

Mr. Chairman, we have planned to introduce many more exhibits, such as those we have just introduced, but in consideration of the fact that the general is here and has been here all morning, I think we would like to discontinue the hearing at this time.

Senator FERGUSON. I want to ask the general something. I know he has been ill.

Mr. MORRIS. The general has one more thing.

Senator FERGUSON. He has been ill, but I want to ask him one more question.

General, in your experience in the Far East, have you found that the policies of communism, the Communist Party line, has been affecting in any way United States relations with and in the Far East?

General WILLOUGHBY. If I interpret your question correctly, Senator, you want me to give you a statement of the impact of communism on the Far East, with particular reference to Japan?

Senator FERGUSON. No. The United States and its relations in the Far East.

General WILLOUGHBY. Perhaps it is the fatigue, or the late morning hour, but would you mind stating that again, sir?

Senator FERGUSON. Here is what I want to find out, if you can give me the information: If you have seen any evidence of communism, as practiced by Russia, and the principles of communism in the Far East, having any bearing or relations to our policies, American policies, in the Far East?

General WILLOUGHBY. I will try to give you a series of perhaps disconnected comments, hoping that at the end the mosaic will become clear.

Senator FERGUSON. Yes.

General WILLOUGHBY. I would say that the impact of communism, as practiced by the Russians, of course, is by now pretty well known. It affects all Communist parties in all countries. It affects the Japanese Communist Party, and inferentially, of course, created a problem for the occupation forces, that is, America as exemplified by the occupation forces, in which we had either to take a stand or support the Japanese Government in taking a stand against the Japanese Communist Party and what it stood for.

We felt that that party was not a national party at all. It has no political independence or identity, that it took its orders from the master mind, the Politburo, like so many other Communist parties of national origin.

We felt that if we could not maintain American predominance in the sense of political ideals, that someone else would move in; that if we create a vacuum in the Far East, that that vacuum, on the basis of pure applied physics, would be filled by someone.

That someone is Soviet Russia.

Then we talk about the problems of the Far East now and in the past 10 years. We really mean the corrosive influence exercised by the power politics of the Soviet against and upon neighboring areas.

You had that example in what they have done to North Korea, liberated by us in 1945, and within a space of 5 years, converted to a warlike opponent of the United States.

You have seen the same thing in China. And unless the American policy is firm along this outpost of western civilization, that runs from, roughly, Alaska through Japan, through the Philippines, down to and including the British and Indonesian areas; if we create or permit the development of a vacuum there, that great and sinister power will move into it as it has moved into it on other occasions.

Whether that falls within the purview of a calculated policy by the United States, in that case the policy of our Government, I am not in a position to comment in either approving or disapproving manner.

But to any student of a geographical strategic problems, we must accept that the western frontier runs roughly from British Malaya through Siam, through Indochina, where there is an active front in Chungking; through the Philippines and the island chain leading ultimately to Alaska.

That is an opinion which is a blend of geopolitical military strategic factors, predicated on the raw materials which we must seize or not permit to fall into opposing hands.

In other words, it is a global problem of such complexity that it is probably difficult to answer in a brief summation statement.

And I may be disappointing to you, Senator.

Senator FERGUSON. No; I am glad to get that opinion.

I would like to have this answered: We found that there was an attempt to get Guenther Stein's works that he had written, to exert an influence. We find from this evidence that he was and is a Communist and was a Russian spy as a Communist.

Do you find any evidence that the writings of such people have had an influence upon America's foreign policy in the Far East?

I cite merely his writings as one example that he was writing here these many articles for the Institute of Pacific Relations.

General WILLOUGHBY. I will attempt to give you a reply considering the moral importance of this committee, or any congressional committee, which earnestly seeks to arrive at demonstrable facts, and it is within the obligation of citizenship, immigrant or otherwise, to assist those committees.

In an appraisal of my reply, which I am developing as I go along, you must discount my absence from the United States since 1938. I am a sort of oriental Rip Van Winkle, who is returning now in a series of shattering disillusions.

But I will say that, in general, your thesis that that type of writing is corrosive, objectionable, deteriorating to public opinion, cannot be challenged, and I agree with you. I think that there is a deliberate attempt to circulate, to public relation, to sell this type of book by every channel which these people are capable of, and I again refer to the illuminating article of Irene Kuhn in the American Legion, and Ralph Toledano's in Mercury, which are some of the outstanding articles that I have read since my return from abroad; that they show how that type of book is promoted, supported, book reviewed in calculated channels of subversion, while other books which would establish a balance of judgment are suppressed, belittled, criticized.

So in general terms, taking Stein or Smedley, or the ubiquitous Grajdanzev, to build up their stuff as the last word in reliable, technical, and expert information is part of a pattern of conversion of the mind, which is going on, and has been going on apparently for some time.

Does that answer your question?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes, it does; because we get from the file of the Institute of Pacific Relations, June 24, 1942, "W. W. L. to E. C. C." and "W. L. H.", a further comment:

> On circulating Guenther Stein's stuff in Washington: When I mentioned it to John Fairbank he expressed a great interest in seeing it and summoned together his Chinese staff, who all voiced a similar interest. John also suggested that his officer might be asked to trade certain information in return.

And I underscore:

> John suggested that his office might be asked to trade certain information in return.

It continues:

> I am leaving the matter to you to handle, however.

Mr. MORRIS. John Fairbank, Mr. Chairman, was head of the China desk of OWI at the time.

General WILLOUGHBY. I would say, as an interested bystander, that this letter is almost conclusive and highly indicative of the techniques that they employ in recommending each other and disseminating their work.

Senator FERGUSON. Do you mean Communist work?

General WILLOUGHBY. People that range from communism to fellow traveling, befuddled liberals, and whatever that category that has been described so often in the current press reports.

Senator FERGUSON. In your work in the Far East, you naturally came in contact with Communists and their activities, and that is the reason that I asked you the question, because I know that you could not perform your functions as a general in the United States Intelligence Service, major general, without having contact and experience. I know that your opinion will be of great value to this committee.

Now, General, you had something you wanted to present.

Mr. MORRIS. This clears up, Mr. Chairman, a conflict that may have come into the testimony earlier, about the time of Guenther Stein's arrest in Paris. The general has an official document there which he will identify and which will be introduced into the record.

General WILLOUGHBY. I will act as assistant to the counsel to file this. It is a message from the French Embassy to me in response to a query on the whereabouts and activities of Guenther Stein. In order to preserve its authenticity I will read it in its original French, and give you the translation immediately.

Entre en France dans le courant de 1949, Guenther Stein a obtenu le 18 octobre de la meme annee une carte de correspondant de l'Hindustani Times, quotidien de New Delhi.

* * * Entered France during 1949, Guenther Stein obtained, on the 18th of October of the same year, an identification card as accredited correspondent of the Hindustani Times, which is a daily of New Delhi.

A son arrivee, il a produit un passeport delivre le 2 septembre 1941 par les authorities de Hong Kong, ville ou il avait ete naturalise citoyen brittaique le 6 aout 1941.

At his arrival, he produced a passport, which he obtained on the 2d of September 1941, through the authorities of Hong Kong, the town where he obtained naturalization papers, as a British citizen, on August 6, 1941.

Il a ete expulse de France pour espionnage, en vertu d'un arrete du 14 novembre 1950 at s'est dirige sur l'Angleterre.

He was expelled from France for espionage—

The term is "espionage"—

following his arrest on the 14th of November 1950 and apparently left for England.

Il est probable qu'il se trouve encore actuellement dans ce pays.

It is likely that he at this time is actually in that country.

Mr. MORRIS. Who signed that, General?

General WILLOUGHBY. It has no signature because it is a carbon copy, but I will identify it as a report from the French Embassy in Tokyo to me.

Mr. MORRIS. I would like to have it introduced into evidence and marked as the next consecutive exhibit, having been identified by General Willoughby.

Senator FERGUSON. It will be received.

NOTE

Confidential

Entré en France dans le courant de 1949, Güenther Stein a obtenu le 18 octobre de la même année une carte de correspondant de l' "Hindustani Times," quotidien de New Delhi.

A son arrivée, il a produit un passeport délivré le 2 septembre 1941 par les autorités de Hong Kong, ville où il avait été naturalisé citoyen britannique le 6 août 1941.

Il a été expulsé de France pour espionnage, en vertu d'un arrêté du 14 novembre 1950 et s'est dirigé sur l'Angleterre.

Il est probable qu'il se trouve encore actuellement dans ce pays.

GUENTHER STEIN

Translation:

Entered France during 1949, Guenther Stein received a press card for the Hindustani Times, a daily of New Déphi on October 18 of the same year.

On his arrival, he produced a passport issued on September 2 1941, by the Authorities of Hong Kong, the city where he obtained naturalization papers, as a British citizen, dated August 6, 1941.

He was expelled from France, on a charge of espionage, following his arrest on November 14, 1950, and has left for England. It is probable that he is actually in that country.

Senator FERGUSON. General, I want to thank you for coming before us this morning. I realize that there has been some handicap by virtue of Executive order. I hope that it is not found that you have violated any of the sections of that order and that, as the chairman has expressed, it is this committee's desire that there be no retaliation against any Government employee for testifying before this committee.

Again I want to thank you. I know that you have been ill. We appreciate your coming down. We regret the length of the session.

General WILLOUGHBY. Not at all.

Senator FERGUSON. We will recess now. I do not want to say that we are through with your examination, because we may call you at another time.

We will meet again at 10 o'clock on Tuesday. Counsel will tell you as to whether or not you are desired.

Again I want to tell you that we appreciate your coming down.

General WILLOUGHBY. Glad to be of service.

(Thereupon, at 12:55 p. m., the committee recessed, to reconvene at 10 a. m., Tuesday, August 14, 1951.)

INSTITUTE OF PACIFIC RELATIONS

TUESDAY, AUGUST 14, 1951

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE TO INVESTIGATE THE ADMINISTRATION OF THE INTERNAL SECURITY ACT AND OTHER INTERNAL SECURITY LAWS OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
Washington, D. C.

The subcommittee met at 10 a. m., pursuant to recess, Hon. Pat McCarran (chairman) presiding.

Present: Senators McCarran, Eastland, Smith, Ferguson, and Watkins.

Also present: Senators McCarthy and Mundt; J. G. Sourwine, committee counsel; Robert Morris, subcommittee counsel; and Benjamin Mandel, director of research.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will come to order.

Miss Bentley, will you stand and be sworn, please?

You do solemnly swear that the testimony you are about to give before the subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary of the United States Senate will be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, so help you God?

Miss BENTLEY. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. You may proceed, Mr. Morris.

TESTIMONY OF ELIZABETH T. BENTLEY, CLINTON, CONN.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you give your name and address to the stenographer, please?

Miss BENTLEY. Yes, my full name is Elizabeth T. Bentley.

Senator FERGUSON. Will you speak loudly enough so that all can hear you, please?

Miss BENTLEY. Yes. My address is Clinton, Conn.

Mr. MORRIS. Miss Bentley, I wonder if you would tell us briefly of your formal education.

Miss BENTLEY. I have an A. B. degree from Vassar College, a master's degree from Columbia University, and a year's study at the university in Florence, Italy.

Mr. MORRIS. When did you first join the Communist Party of the United States?

Miss BENTLEY. In the middle of March 1935.

Mr. MORRIS. How long did you stay in the open Communist Party?

Miss BENTLEY. The so-called open Communist Party, that is, where I was attached to a unit of some twenty-odd people, for 3½ years up until about October 1938.

Mr. MORRIS. You say about 3½ years?

Miss BENTLEY. About 3½ years.

Mr. MORRIS. Did you then discontinue all connection with the Communist Party, Miss Bentley?

Miss BENTLEY. No, I went with what they called the underground; that is, I was working for an Italian Fascist contact. I was put under a person under whom I worked.

Mr. MORRIS. You say you were working for the Italian Fascist Party, you had infiltrated?

Miss BENTLEY. That is correct.

Mr. MORRIS. From there you went into what?

Miss BENTLEY. I was put in contact with one person to whom I reported.

Mr. MORRIS. Who was that?

Miss BENTLEY. Jacob Golos, G-o-l-o-s.

Mr. MORRIS. Jacob Golos?

Miss BENTLEY. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. What was his position?

Miss BENTLEY. He was quite high up in the NKVD, which is the OGPU. He was also a member of the three-man control commission.

Mr. MORRIS. You say he was a member of a three-man control commission of the American Communist Party?

Miss BENTLEY. Yes. That is practically the outfit that runs the American Communist Party. They are the disciplinary committee that can take action against the members.

Mr. MORRIS. Do you know who the other two members were at that time?

Miss BENTLEY. I don't know offhand. It's on record some place.

Mr. MORRIS. But you know he was one of three men?

Miss BENTLEY. He was one of three men.

Mr. MORRIS. You say he was also connected with the NKVD?

Miss BENTLEY. He had been connected with it as far back as the early twenties.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the NKVD?

Miss BENTLEY. I don't think I know what it means in Russian, but it's the internal security police, translated. It includes all of the Soviet espionage work whether military intelligence or rounding up the recalcitrants.

Mr. MORRIS. In other words, it is the Soviet military police?

Miss BENTLEY. That is right, operating abroad.

Mr. MORRIS. Abroad, from the Soviet Union?

Miss BENTLEY. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. You say Golos was a representative of the NKVD for the Soviet Union?

Miss BENTLEY. And a high-up one.

Mr. MORRIS. And a high-up one?

Miss BENTLEY. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. Could you tell us the nature of your assignment with Golos?

Miss BENTLEY. Well, after I had left the Italian Library of Information, which was the Italian Fascist outfit I mentioned, I stayed on with Mr. Golos as my contact, doing odd jobs for him. Finally the odd jobs came into contacting undercover Communists to get information. It started with a gentleman by the name of Abraham Brothman. He was doing espionage work.

Mr. MORRIS. He is the man who recently was convicted in New York?

Miss BENTLEY. He was recently convicted in New York for obstructing justice.

Mr. MORRIS. You were a witness in that case?

Miss BENTLEY. I was a witness in that case.

It gradually worked up to picking up people who were working for the United States Government and gathering information.

Mr. MORRIS. While you had that job, I wonder if you would describe what your relation was to Earl Browder, head of the Communist Party?

Miss BENTLEY. I never dealt with Mr. Browder until after Mr. Golos' death, at which time I took over his job.

Mr. MORRIS. What was your relation?

Miss BENTLEY. I was the boss, and he took the orders on intelligence matters.

Mr. MORRIS. On intelligence matters?

Miss BENTLEY. That is correct. If we wanted people to run cover businesses for agents, he would provide them. In one case that I recall a Soviet intelligence agent was about to be drafted into the Army, and he was to contact the NMU fraction—that is, the Communist group in the union—and get him shifted into the merchant marine.

Mr. MORRIS. What year was that?

Miss BENTLEY. 1944—the beginning of 1945.

Senator FERGUSON. Who would you contact to get him shifted to the merchant marine?

Miss BENTLEY. I didn't do that; it was his job.

Senator FERGUSON. That was his job?

Miss BENTLEY. That was his job.

Senator FERGUSON. At that time Browder was the head of the American Communist Party?

Miss BENTLEY. Browder was the head of the American Communist Party.

Senator FERGUSON. Since then he is not connected in your opinion with the American Communist Party?

Miss BENTLEY. I doubt if he is connected with the American Communist Party?

Senator FERGUSON. What about the International Communist Party?

Miss BENTLEY. Certainly.

Senator FERGUSON. What gives you that opinion?

Miss BENTLEY. He was in 1946, and I see no reason to change my opinion.

Mr. MORRIS. You say you were the assistant to Mr. Golos from what year?

Miss BENTLEY. From the middle of October 1938 until his death in 1943.

Mr. MORRIS. So for that 5-year period you were the assistant to Golos?

Miss BENTLEY. That is correct.

Mr. MORRIS. What happened upon the death of Golos?

Miss BENTLEY. Upon the death of Golos, because evidently no plans had been made within the secret police, I took over his job temporarily.

Senator FERGUSON. Was his death from natural causes?

Miss BENTLEY. Yes; he died of a heart attack. He had an extremely bad heart.

Mr. MORRIS. So at that time, after you had succeeded Golos, your relationship to Browder would be that of his superior in intelligence work?

Miss BENTLEY. That is correct; yes.

Mr. MORRIS. Did you know about the Institute of Pacific Relations at that time?

Miss BENTLEY. Yes; I did vaguely before 1943, but much more closely starting with the summer of 1943.

Mr. MORRIS. What were your dealings with the Institute of Pacific Relations and concerning the Institute of Pacific Relations?

Miss BENTLEY. Well, it happened rather by accident. I had better go back a little bit on that and mention that in February, I think it was 1941, we took on a new Communist agent, and that was Mary Price, who at that time was secretary to Walter Lippmann. The Soviet Intelligence felt that Lippmann had valuable material in his files, and therefore we had taken her on to get us copies of it.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you get copies?

Miss BENTLEY. Yes, we got complete copies—or so, at least, she told us.

Senator FERGUSON. You know you got some copies?

Miss BENTLEY. We got a tremendous amount. I know I went down one time and typed a pile like that [indicating].

Mr. MORRIS. When you say "came down," what do you mean by that?

Miss BENTLEY. From New York to Washington. I was living in New York, and I would come down on trips to Washington.

Mr. MORRIS. Where would you go in Washington? In other words, when you say you came to Washington?

Miss BENTLEY. I went to Mary Price's house. She was living on Olive Avenue at that time.

Mr. MORRIS. You never went to Mr. Lippmann's place?

Miss BENTLEY. Oh, no; because Mr. Lippmann did not know anything about it.

Senator FERGUSON. She was a secret agent?

Miss BENTLEY. She was a secret agent.

Senator FERGUSON. And you were attempting to steal things out of Mr. Lippmann's files?

Miss BENTLEY. Not only attempting, but we succeeded.

Senator FERGUSON. You succeeded. What were these things you copied? Do you recall any of them?

Miss BENTLEY. Yes. A number of them were documents dealing with our relations with Britain. Some of it was material that seems to have had some relation to the War Department and things of that sort.

Mr. MORRIS. Miss Bentley, you stated that your dealings with Mary Price at that particular time brought you into contact with the Institute of Pacific Relations. I wonder if you would explain that.

Miss BENTLEY. Mary got into rather bad health in the late spring of 1943 and went to Mexico on a vacation. She suggested that we keep in contact with her through Mildred Price, her sister. Mildred Price was a member or executive secretary of the China Aid Council.

Mr. MORRIS. Member or executive secretary?

Miss BENTLEY. Executive secretary, which is tantamount to being the head of it. That was a Communist-dominated organization.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the name of that organization?

Miss BENTLEY. The China Aid Council. At that time it was located, I think, around Twenty-third Street and Fifth Avenue. At first we looked on Mildred as a means of getting word back and forth to Mary. Then when we began talking to her we began realizing that there was a fertile field from which to get intelligence and that is when we began to get interested in the IPR.

Senator FERGUSON. This China Aid was for Communist China?

Miss BENTLEY. China Aid Council. I would say so.

Senator FERGUSON. There were different names for China aid, and I wondered.

Miss BENTLEY. The China Aid Council was particularly concerned with the Eighth Route Army and the Communist-dominated part of China.

Mr. MORRIS. Was the China Aid Council completely dominated by the Communist Party?

Miss BENTLEY. Yes; according to what she told me.

Mr. MORRIS. She was executive secretary?

Miss BENTLEY. Executive secretary.

Mr. MORRIS. Is there any way that you can amplify that?

Miss BENTLEY. Yes; Mr. Golos told me the same thing, and later Earl Browder told me the same thing.

Mr. MORRIS. Mildred Price's assistant was the woman named Mentana Sayers?

Miss BENTLEY. Michael Sayers' wife.

Mr. MORRIS. Did you know her to be a Communist?

Miss BENTLEY. Mildred told me that.

Mr. MORRIS. But Mildred Price did tell you that Mentana Sayers, her assistant in the China Aid Council, also was a Communist?

Miss BENTLEY. Yes.

Senator SMITH. Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Smith.

Senator SMITH. Is this the Mary Price that came from North Carolina and ran for public office down there?

Miss BENTLEY. I understand that. I believe Senator Hoey told me at one time she was running on the Progressive ticket. Was that it?

Senator SMITH. Something like that.

Miss BENTLEY. She went back to Greensboro, having come from there, in 1945.

Senator SMITH. It was some State office, I believe.

Miss BENTLEY. That is the same one.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to offer into evidence two letterheads with incidental letters of the China Aid Council into the record at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. From what source are you getting these?

Senator SMITH. May I ask one more question, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Senator SMITH. Is this the same girl that was connected with the Southern Council for Human Welfare?

Miss BENTLEY. She went with the Southern Council for Human Welfare in the spring of 1945 and how long she stayed with them I don't know.

Senator SMITH. Was she a Communist at that time?

Miss BENTLEY. She had been one for at least 10 years before I met her. She was a charter member of UOPWA.

Senator SMITH. Thank you.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to introduce into the record three letterheads. Mr. Mandel will identify the source, but I would like to show these to ask Miss Bentley if the organization that she has just testified about is the organization referred to on these letterheads.

First is a letterhead of the China Aid Council of the American League for Peace and Democracy. I would like to offer that to Miss Bentley and ask her if that is the same organization that she has just testified about.

Miss BENTLEY. Yes, I imagine that is the same one. There wasn't any League for Peace and Democracy at the time I knew the organization, but I was told, again second-hand, that that was an offshoot of it.

Mr. MORRIS. I see. Here I show you a letterhead dated November 24, 1941, China Aid Council combined with the American Committee for Chinese War Orphans, and ask you if that is the same organization about which you are testifying.

Miss BENTLEY. That is the same organization. It has the same phone number and same address.

Mr. MORRIS. Would you notice who the executive secretary and the administrative secretary to the executive secretary are? I think it is at the bottom of the list.

Miss BENTLEY. Mildred Price is the executive secretary, and Mentana Sayers is administrative secretary.

Mr. MORRIS. I see. Now I offer you a third letterhead, Miss Bentley, and ask you if you will identify that organization. That is a letterhead dated March 1, 1944, I believe; is it not?

Miss BENTLEY. Yes, this is after the organization moved up to around Columbus Circle.

Mr. MORRIS. Yes.

Miss BENTLEY. It left its quarters at 200 Fifth Avenue.

Mr. MORRIS. You say that that is the same organization about which you have testified?

Miss BENTLEY. That is the same organization, but it moved uptown into a building with, I understand, other Chinese organizations.

Mr. MORRIS. That organization was Communist-controlled, you say, and you were dealing with Mildred Price, executive secretary, who, according to your testimony, virtually ran the organization?

Miss BENTLEY. Yes; that is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. Now will you authenticate those exhibits?

Mr. MANDEL. The letter dated March 1, 1944, from the China Aid Council combined with the American Committee for Chinese War Orphans is addressed to William Holland of the Institute of Pacific Relations.

The CHAIRMAN. Being the same letter that has just been shown to the witness?

Mr. MANDEL. Yes; and going from Mrs. Edward C. Carter, president. It is a part of the Institute of Pacific Relations files which were turned over to us.

Now the letterhead reading "China Aid Council of the American League for Peace and Democracy" is not a part of the institute files, but comes to us as a result of our research, and I might note that the American League for Peace and Democracy has been cited as a Communist front by Attorney General Biddle.

We have another letterhead from the China Aid Council combined with the American Committee for Chinese War Orphans dated November 24, 1941, signed by Arthur Upham Pope, chairman, American Committee for Chinese War Orphans.

The CHAIRMAN. Being the same exhibit as was shown to the witness?

Mr. MANDEL. Yes, sir. This is also a part of the institute files.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Mandel, I wonder if you would read the members of the executive committee on that last letterhead?

Mr. Chairman, in the course of our investigation we are going to show that many of the personnel of the Institute of Pacific Relations were connected with the China Aid Council, so I think at this time as an example I would like to point out the list of people who were on the executive board as shown on the last letterhead, which I believe is a 1941 letterhead.

Mr. MANDEL. Yes. You wanted only people connected with the institute read, or all of them?

Mr. MORRIS. Put the whole list in.

Mr. MANDEL. The chairman is Dr. Claude E. Forkner. Then we have the honorary vice chairmen——

Mr. MORRIS. Leave the honorary vice chairmen out.

Mr. MANDEL. Next we have Arthur Upham Pope, treasurer. Then we have the executive committee, consisting of Dr. Henry A. Atkinson, Dr. Henry L. Bibby, Lyman R. Bradley, Mrs. Edward C. Carter, Dr. Ch'ao Ting Chi, Mrs. Elizabeth B. Cotton, Mrs. Lucy Forkner, Margaret Forsyth, Talitha Gerlach, Dr. Claude E. Heaton, Philip J. Jaffe, Sally Lucas Jean, Mrs. Philip C. Jessup, Duncan Lee, Mrs. Lin Yutang, Dorothy McConnell, Edgar H. Rue, Mrs. Gordon M. Tiffany, Mildred Price, executive secretary, and Mentana G. Sayers, administrative secretary.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you continue, Miss Bentley, in connection with your development of your association with the Institute of Pacific Relations?

Miss BENTLEY. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. You had mentioned Mildred Price and then had gotten to the China Aid Council.

The CHAIRMAN. Does counsel want these exhibits to go into the record?

Mr. MORRIS. I would like to introduce these three letterheads and have them marked as the next three consecutive exhibits.

The CHAIRMAN. They may be so marked and entered into the record.

Miss BENTLEY. During the summer and fall of 1943, we became interested in the far eastern field and in the IPR group.

Mr. MORRIS. Yes.

Miss BENTLEY. Mildred Price at this particular point was Communist unit organizer for the unit operating in the far eastern field.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you explain that a little more fully, please, Miss Bentley?

Miss BENTLEY. Yes. As you probably know, the Communist Party, the lowest echelon is made up of what they call the unit. That contains anywhere from three people on up. In the so-called head of that for purposes of party work is the unit organizer. Mildred, being a very energetic person and willing to take on a great deal of labor, was elected as unit organizer.

Since she was unit organizer of that far eastern unit, which included the IPR and the other organizations, we turned to her to see if there were people in the IPR and others of those far eastern organizations that came within our sphere of influence who would be useful for intelligence work. I once asked Mr. Golos why we just didn't take on the Institute of Pacific Relations itself, and he said, "No; they are operating much too loosely."

Mr. MORRIS. What did he mean by that?

Miss BENTLEY. He meant by that that they were operating so much in the open and they were making so many blunders that it would be a mercy if the FBI didn't get them.

Mr. MORRIS. You mean the Communists in the Institute of Pacific Relations?

Miss BENTLEY. The Communists in the Institute of Pacific Relations.

Mr. MORRIS. Did Miss Mildred Price indicate to you the degree of control that the Communists exercised in the institute?

Miss BENTLEY. She told me it was one of our organizations in the sense that we exercised a control over it.

Mr. MORRIS. Did Golos confirm that?

Miss BENTLEY. Yes; he did.

Mr. MORRIS. Would you amplify on that?

Miss BENTLEY. He told me it was an organization that originally had not, as far as he knew, been much under our control but later came under our control.

Senator FERGUSON. Is that what you call an instrument?

Miss BENTLEY. It would be a Communist-front organization of a sort. It is hard to find the exact technology for it.

Mr. MORRIS. At the time he told you that you were his assistant working for the Soviet military police?

Miss BENTLEY. That is correct. But, he said the members in that were operating in what he said was a dangerous method and therefore he said he didn't think we should take it on en masse. However, we did go through the list of Communist members in the IPR to see if there was anybody to salvage. We had already picked up Duncan Lee, who had to go to Washington in 1943.

Mr. MORRIS. Duncan Chapin Lee?

Miss BENTLEY. Duncan Chapin Lee.

Mr. MORRIS. What had he been doing?

Miss BENTLEY. He had been working for a law firm in New York, and then he received a position as a lawyer in OSS.

Mr. MORRIS. You say you had taken him out of the institute?

Miss BENTLEY. Yes; he had been brought to our attention by Mary Price through Mildred Price, and we found that he would be very close to General Donovan. Therefore, we relayed word to Mildred to disconnect him with that unit and put him in contact with us.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you meet him?

Miss BENTLEY. Yes; I did. Mary Price took care of him for, I believe, 6 months, and then I took him over personally.

Mr. MORRIS. You say you took him from the institute for work in your particular undertaking?

Miss BENTLEY. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. To your knowledge, was he completely a member of your organization at that time?

Miss BENTLEY. Yes; he had been a Communist Party member I gathered for some little while. He paid his dues to me, I brought him his literature, and he was under Communist discipline. He was quite definitely a member.

Senator FERGUSON. Was he at that time working for Donovan?

Miss BENTLEY. He was one of that circle of lawyers who worked around Donovan. I don't know what they were called—advisers, probably.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you get any information from him?

Miss BENTLEY. Quite a bit.

Senator FERGUSON. Out of the OSS?

Miss BENTLEY. I think he was our most valuable source in the OSS.

Senator FERGUSON. He delivered the material directly to you?

Miss BENTLEY. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the nature of the material that he delivered to you, in what form, in manuscript?

Miss BENTLEY. Most of it was given to me orally because he was frightened to death of what he was doing and afraid to pass it on. Some of it he had written on scraps of paper.

The CHAIRMAN. You got no microfilms?

Miss BENTLEY. No, no; we only had two people doing our microfilming.

Mr. MORRIS. Miss Bentley, was there anyone else whom you got into your organization via the IPR?

Miss BENTLEY. There was one other, Michael Greenberg. He was not strictly speaking a member of the American party, being at that time a Britisher, and the policy of the party at that time was not to have aliens as members.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, this Michael Greenberg, we have had testimony last Tuesday on Michael Greenberg and at the same time we introduced into the record a series of exhibits showing his connection with the Institute of Pacific Relations. I just would like to review those at this time, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well.

Senator FERGUSON. While he is looking that up, was Greenberg connected with the United States Government in any way?

Miss BENTLEY. Yes; I think it was the summer or fall of 1943 that he came down to Washington and took a position as sort of assistant to Lauchlin Currie, who was then I believe in the White House.

Senator FERGUSON. Did Greenberg ever deliver any papers to you?

Miss BENTLEY. Yes; he delivered information via Mildred Price to me. He was extremely temperamental and I thought it unwise to have him meet me.

Senator FERGUSON. Did this information come out of the White House?

Miss BENTLEY. Yes; it was mostly on the Far East, on China.

Senator FERGUSON. It came out of the White House and he was assistant to Lauchlin Currie?

Miss BENTLEY. Yes; or one of the assistants. I don't know whether he was the only one.

Mr. MORRIS. The nature of the exhibits is they showed that Greenberg succeeded Owen Lattimore as editor for the Institute of Pacific Relations.

The CHAIRMAN. You are referring to what exhibits?

Mr. MORRIS. Exhibits 8, 7, and 51.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well. All I want you to do is to identify the exhibits and their connection with the party named.

Mr. MORRIS. We will have to get that, Senator. I would like to comment upon exhibit No. 67, which was taken from the institute files. It is from Michael Greenberg on the letterhead of the White House in Washington, addressed to Miss Hilda Austern, Institute of Pacific Relations, 129 East Fifty-second Street, New York, N. Y.

DEAR HILDA: Mr. Currie has asked me to write you about the sending of IPR publications to William D. Carter in New Delhi, India. He says that he is baffled by the problem.

The only thing I can suggest is that you select a few books and try to get them out via OWI.

Sincerely yours,

MICHAEL.

That was introduced as exhibit 67 at the open hearings of August 7, 1951.

I would like to introduce, Mr. Chairman, at this time a letter dated May 23, 1943, from Mr. Y. Y. Hsu to Mr. Carter. I will ask Mr. Mandel if he will verify that that was taken from the institute files.

Mr. MANDEL. This letter was taken from the files of the Institute of Pacific Relations and is dated May 23, 1942, addressed to "Dear Mr. Carter," and it is from Yung-ying Hsu.

Enclosed please find a memorandum which Miss Mildred Price worked out with my assistance. She has submitted a copy to Mr. Mills of the CIO Greater New York Industrial Council. The memo is written, by the way, on Mr. Mills' specific request. Miss Price would like to have a conference with you to discuss the same problem. She also suggests my participation. The present memorandum is based upon findings in my two previous memos which have been submitted to you and Mr. Holland. There are a few new points which I intended to examine more closely as a part of my research work. These have been included in the present document in the form of general statements. I believe they are reasonably correct. I have not been able to secure an additional copy of the present memo for Mr. Holland. I am sure you will make the enclosed copy available to him as you see fit.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to introduce that into evidence as the next consecutive exhibit.

The CHAIRMAN. It may be inserted and properly identified.

(The document referred to was marked "Exhibit No. 101" and is as follows:)

EXHIBIT No. 101

OFFICE, May 23, 1942.

DEAR MR. CARTER: Enclosed please find a memorandum which Miss Mildred Price worked out with my assistance. She has submitted a copy to Mr. Mills, of the CIO Greater New York Industrial Council. The memo is written, by the way, on Mr. Mills' specific request.

Miss Price would like to have a conference with you to discuss the same problem. She also suggests my participation.

The present memorandum is based upon findings in my two previous memos which have been submitted to you and Mr. Holland. There are a few new points which I have intended to examine more closely as a part of my research work. These have been included in the present document in the form of general statements. I believe that they are reasonably correct.

I have not been able to secure an additional copy of the present memo for Mr. Holland. I am sure you will make the enclosed copy available to him as you see fit.

Sincerely yours,

YUNG-YING HSU.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, we will have the exhibit presently showing that Michael Greenberg succeeded Owen Lattimore as editor of Pacific Affairs, which is the publication of the International Institute of Pacific Relations.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well.

Mr. MORRIS. Miss Bentley, did Earl Browder ever come to you to talk over about the degree of control the Communist Party had or its interest in the Institute of Pacific Relations?

Miss BENTLEY. Did he come to talk to me about it?

Mr. MORRIS. Yes.

Miss BENTLEY. It arose from the fact that this particular Communist Party unit of which Mildred was the organizer and took care of business in the field, had as its political commissar Frederick Vanderbilt Field. He was to give them directives as to what they were to do and to relay messages to the top Communist leaders, especially to Browder. Browder had been personally in China and was interested in the far eastern situation.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. What did you call Mr. Field?

Miss BENTLEY. I said that the closest I could come to his function re the far eastern field would be political commissar.

Mr. MORRIS. So, Miss Bentley, you testify therefore that the Communist Party exercised control over the institute through Earl Browder through Frederick Field?

Miss BENTLEY. Yes; and through other groups, the party nucleus, the party units within the far eastern field.

Mr. MORRIS. Who headed that unit within the far eastern field?

Miss BENTLEY. Miss Mildren Price, but Frederick Vanderbilt Field was the man who was higher up than Mildred Price.

Senator FERGUSON. During what period would he be the commissar in the Far East?

Miss BENTLEY. During the period I knew it, I can say from my own experience, certainly in 1933 and 1934. I know that three times Mildred Price complained to me that Fred Field had not shown up to have conferences and they did not know how to apply the party line in the Far East; that they needed instructions, and would I go to Browder and complain. She couldn't go directly. Three times I went to Browder and said, "Will you get Fred Field on the job he should be doing?" and he, Browder, said, "I will do that."

Senator FERGUSON. So he was the man steering the organization and laying down the party line to Mildred Price as far as the party line concerned the Far East?

Miss BENTLEY. In other words, he relayed the line. I wouldn't say he made up the party line.

Senator FERGUSON. Yes. He was the man responsible for telling, at least, Mildred Price what the party line was?

Miss BENTLEY. That is correct.

Senator FERGUSON. Is that the way that people are steered to the party line, through someone like Frederick Vanderbilt Field?

Miss BENTLEY. Not entirely, This was an unusual situation. Usually you have a pyramiding from your unit to your section to your district, but this was considered to be such an important unit that they couldn't risk having it go through all these levels of Communist Party development, and therefore it went specially.

Senator FERGUSON. From a man like Field down through to her so that she could work the party line and hew to it in the Pacific Relations?

Miss BENTLEY. That is correct, and it was done that way so that there would be less danger.

Mr. MORRIS. You testified that her other activity was that she was executive secretary of the China Aid Council?

Miss BENTLEY. That is correct.

Mr. MORRIS. There was no conflict between that assignment and the assignment in the Institute of Pacific Relations?

Miss BENTLEY. No, rather they complemented each other.

Mr. MORRIS. May I introduce into the record after Mr. Mandel identifies this letter as a copy of a letter to Michael Greenberg, managing editor, Pacific Affairs, dated April 28, 1942. This is by way of showing that Michael Greenberg was connected with Pacific Affairs.

Mr. Mandel, will you identify that?

Mr. MANDEL. This is a copy of a letter dated April 28, 1942, from the files of the Institute of Pacific Relations addressed to Mr. Michael Greenberg, managing editor of Pacific Affairs, 129 East Fifty-second Street, New York City, signed by F. V. F., presumably Frederick Vanderbilt Field.

The CHAIRMAN. When you say that is a copy of a letter, did it come from the files in this form or have you the original?

Mr. MANDEL. We have the original, and that is a carbon.

The CHAIRMAN. The original was in the files?

Mr. MANDEL. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. This is a true and correct copy?

Mr. MANDEL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The original is taken from the files of the Institute of Pacific Relations?

Mr. MANDEL. Yes.

Senator FERGUSON. Could I inquire for the record when Frederick Vanderbilt Field applied for a commission in the United States Army in the Intelligence Section? What was the date of that?

Mr. MORRIS. I believe it was May 1942, is my recollection.

Senator FERGUSON. Would that come in the time when he was Communist Commissar for the Far East?

Miss BENTLEY. It could have been that. From what Mildred said he had been for some time, and that was in the summer of 1943, so it could be.

Senator FERGUSON. Would that be an important position, to have the commissar on our intelligence staff, for the Communists, I mean?

Miss BENTLEY. The Soviet Intelligence didn't like to lose anybody to the Army unless they could get into strategic positions—that is, not the infantry but with Intelligence they would consider that very good.

Senator FERGUSON. That would be an important position?

Miss BENTLEY. That would be an important position.

Senator FERGUSON. As you say, though, you tried to keep your members out of the real fighting because they could give you little aid?

Miss BENTLEY. They could give us little aid, and they would also get knocked off. We tried to get them into Washington.

Senator FERGUSON. You tried to get them into a safe spot.

Senator SMITH. Did you know about the efforts and maneuvers made to get Frederick Field in the Intelligence Service of the Army?

Miss BENTLEY. No, I didn't.

Senator SMITH. At that time, I mean.

Miss BENTLEY. No. I had heard of Fred Field before, but I had really not come up against him until 1943.

Mr. MORRIS. You have testified that Michael Greenberg was taken from the Institute of Pacific Relations and sent to Washington. Would you tell us a little bit about his assignment in Washington?

Miss BENTLEY. I am afraid I probably told you most of what I know. He was simply one of the assistants to Lauchlin Currie in the far-eastern field, which he knew well.

Mr. MORRIS. Lauchlin Currie was then executive assistant to the President?

Miss BENTLEY. That is correct. Right on the heels of that I believe he became, was it the head of FEA or Far Eastern Division?

Senator FERGUSON. Do you have in the record when Greenberg became a United States citizen?

Mr. MORRIS. I think we have that later on, Senator.

Senator FERGUSON. That will go into the record?

Mr. MORRIS. Yes.

Mr. Chairman, I at this point think we should discuss Mr. Lauchlin Currie.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

(The document referred to was marked "Exhibit No. 102" and is as follows:)

EXHIBIT No. 102

APRIL 28, 1942.

Mr. MICHAEL GREENBURG,
Managing Editor, Pacific Affairs,
129 East Fifty-second Street, New York City.

DEAR MICHAEL: I have read the letter which George Taylor has written to Pacific Affairs regarding my review of his book. I understand from you that the editors have opened the way for him to write this letter and intend to print it in the same issue which will contain my review. I also understand that this is the first time in the history of the journal that the editors have permitted a reviewer to be attacked in this manner and without allowing his review to stand unchallanged for at least one issue.

Let me say that I regard Taylor's letter as nothing more nor less than an attempt to smear me personally. I am naturally sorry to find my former associates so frightened of their shadows as to lend themselves to this method and procedure.

I shall not offer any reply to Taylor's letter. My review stands; it expresses about all I wish to say on the matter. Anything further would simply add to a personal controversy in which I have no interest. A counterreply on my part would make the magazine look even more ridiculous than it will under present circumstances.

In order to point out to you, and for the record to show how thoroughly irresponsible I believe this matter to have been handled, let me review what happened:

1. Bill Holland telephoned me to ask if I would be willing to review the Taylor book. I replied that I had not read it, but would be glad to do so and write a review. After reading the book I felt that I should not review it for a journal like Pacific Affairs because my review would have to be extremely critical. I telephoned you to explain this and asked you to find a substitute. You replied that you wished me to go ahead with the review, knowing that it was to be strongly critical.

2. I turned in the review a few days later. As you were not in your office when I went to the I. P. R. I gave the message to Hilda Austern. At this point I want to clear up what appears to be another misunderstanding. In asking Hilda to give you the review I asked her to request you to make no changes in the copy without my having the opportunity to approve them. I specifically did not take the unreasonable and dogmatic position that no changes were to be made. Simply that I wanted to see them if they were made. I checked this with Hilda today and find that she agrees that this was the message she passed on.

3. Finally, I was informed that the editors had decided to let Taylor write an answer for publication with my review, and you then gave me a copy of his letter.

I would have regarded this as entirely appropriate if I had originally been asked to contribute to a political discussion of the main impressions given Mr. Taylor's book—I say "main impressions" because, as you are well aware, somewhere in the book he says everything, therefore, the reviewer can only comment on the general impressions he conveys. But I was not asked to do this. I was simply asked to write a review for a supposedly scholarly journal. I myself thought I was not the person to do this, but on calling this to your attention I was urged to go ahead. Taylor, on the other hand, was apparently let loose to write a slippery political rebuttal packed with ridiculous innuendoes about my "revelation" received of course straight from Moscow.

A final word. In printing Taylor's letter I should like to ask the favor that you print it precisely as you showed it to me, with no editing, no deletions whatsoever. I shall count on its being sufficiently absurd to thoughtful persons to vindicate my judgment of his book and, by inferences, of his work.

I said that was a final word, but obviously there must be one more. If you and the other editors want to forget the whole business, I suggest that you withdraw my review, get someone else—any of a hundred "scholars" with whom you are in contact—to review it for the next issue, forget the entire episode yourselves, and give me the very great privilege and pleasure of so blanketing this out of my mind that I retain the high respect for my I. P. R. colleagues that I am most anxious to preserve.

With most cordial personal regards,

F. V. F.

Mr. MORRIS. We have exhibits to show that Mr. Lauchlin Currie was a very active adviser and participant in the Institute of Pacific Relations work. While we are introducing those exhibits, Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask Miss Bentley if she will testify concerning the relationship that Lauchlin Currie had to her particular activities in that period.

Miss BENTLEY. Yes. One of the espionage groups that I handled in Washington, which I roughly call the Silvermaster group because the man who headed it was N. Gregory Silvermaster.

Mr. MORRIS. Approximately how many people were in that group?

Miss BENTLEY. I think there were 8, 9, or 10.

Senator FERGUSON. Silvermaster was in what section?

Miss BENTLEY. FSA, which is the Farm Security Administration, which is a part of the Agriculture Department, although for 6 months I think he was in the Board of Economic Warfare.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you have trouble or difficulty in moving these agents that you had into strategic positions in Government or in the Army that you were talking about, that you did not want them where there was danger but you wanted them in strategic positions? For example, Silvermaster, did you have trouble moving people such as that, or how were they moved to strategic positions so that you could get your information?

Miss BENTLEY. We didn't have too much trouble. In the case of Silvermaster, he pulled strings and got in there.

Senator FERGUSON. What were your avenues for placing people in strategic positions?

Miss BENTLEY. I would say that two of our best ones were Harry Dexter White and Lauchlin Currie. They had an immense amount of influence and knew people and their word would be accepted when they recommended someone.

The CHAIRMAN. Harry Dexter White was in what department?

Miss BENTLEY. Under Secretary of the Treasury, under Mr. Morgenthau.

Senator FERGUSON. In other words, Currie and White were your instrumentalities in putting people in strategic positions?

Miss BENTLEY. I would say they were our most important ones.

Senator FERGUSON. Yes. Did you have any other ones?

Miss BENTLEY. Yes. I mean, whoever we had as an agent in the Government would automatically serve for putting someone else in. For example, Maurice Halperin was head of the Latin American Section in OSS, and we used him to get Helen Tenney in. Once we got one person in he got others, and the whole process continued like that.

Senator FERGUSON. But if you desired to shift a person from one position to another position you would use White and Currie?

Miss BENTLEY. We would use White and Currie if we could.

Senator EASTLAND. Do you know who White's principal contacts were in the Government so that he could place people in Government?

Miss BENTLEY. It was my understanding that he knew practically everyone in Washington who had any influence.

Senator EASTLAND. You do not know who he would contact?

Miss BENTLEY. No, not specifically; that was his affair, and we did not inquire into it.

Senator FERGUSON. As I recall the Far East, Mr. Morgenthau at the time before Pearl Harbor had drawn a plan for the Far East, it was the Morgenthau plan. Did you know anything about it?

Miss Bentley. No, the only Morgenthau plan I knew anything about was the German one.

Senator EASTLAND. Did you know who drew that plan?

Miss BENTLEY. Due to Mr. White's influence, to push the devastation of Germany because that was what the Russians wanted.

Senator FERGUSON. That was what the Communists wanted?

Miss BENTLEY. Definitely Moscow wanted them completely razed because then they would be of no help to the Allies.

Mr. MORRIS. You say that Harry Dexter White worked on that?

Miss BENTLEY. And on our instructions he pushed hard.

Senator FERGUSON. You never heard of the Morgenthau plan that was set up for the Far East?

Miss BENTLEY. I don't recall it.

Senator EASTLAND. Who else participated in drawing up the Morgenthau plan besides Harry Dexter White?

Miss BENTLEY. I am afraid I don't remember now.

Mr. MORRIS. Did Sol Adler have anything to do with it?

Miss BENTLEY. As far as I remember Sol Adler was in China.

Mr. MORRIS. He was in China?

Miss BENTLEY. He was a Treasury Department expert, but most of the time he was in China. I am quite sure he hadn't returned by that time.

Senator EASTLAND. What you say is that it was a Communist plot to destroy Germany and weaken her to where she could not help us?

Miss BENTLEY. That is correct. She could no longer be a barrier that would protect the Western World.

Senator EASTLAND. And that Mr. Morgenthau, who was Secretary of the Treasury of the United States was used by the Communist agents to promote that plot?

Miss BENTLEY. I am afraid so; yes.

Senator FERGUSON. What do you mean by "I am afraid so"?

Miss BENTLEY. Certainly Secretary Morgenthau didn't fall in with Communist plots.

Senator FERGUSON. But you know it to be a fact?

Miss BENTLEY. I know it to be a fact.

Senator FERGUSON. You do not qualify it, do you?

Miss BENTLEY. No; I don't qualify it. I didn't want to give the thought that he did it knowingly.

Senator SMITH. He was unsuspectingly used.

Senator FERGUSON. So you have conscious and unconscious agents?

Miss BENTLEY. Of course, The way the whole principle works is like dropping a pebble into a pond and the ripples spread out, and that is the way we work.

Senator FERGUSON. Some are conscious and some are unconscious as to what they are doing?

Miss BENTLEY. That is correct. A good many of our most valuable items came from the fact that many people in the Pentagon couldn't contain themselves, and they had to confide in our people.

Mr. MORRIS. I wonder if you would tell us for our record the relationship that Harry Dexter White had with your work.

Miss BENTLEY. Harry Dexter White, I couldn't tell you that he had actually been a member of the party, but to all intents and purposes he was because he followed its discipline. According to Nathan Silvermaster he was afraid to meet people like myself. He had for some years been working for an agent who had turned sour, later identified as Whittaker Chambers. That had given him a terrific fright, and he had stayed away for a while from these activities.

Then he had met the Silvermasters and they had brought him back into their group. His attitude was that I am going to help you, but my right hand doesn't want to know what the left is doing. Therefore, he didn't want to meet anyone he knew to be a Soviet agent, he wanted to pass it through Silvermaster to me.

Senator FERGUSON. This idea of Chambers going sour on the Communist Party was learned by the State Department because he made his report to the State Department, did he not, so that the people knew that he had gone sour? That was before he testified in court or in the open, was it not?

Miss BENTLEY. I don't know, but the Communists know when their people go sour before anybody else does usually.

Senator FERGUSON. When did you first learn that Chambers had given information to the American Government officials who were anti-Communist?

Miss BENTLEY. I didn't know anything about Whittaker Chambers at all except as a man called X who had handled a number of my people in 1948.

Senator FERGUSON. So his name you did not learn?

Miss BENTLEY. No. They gave a name such as Sam or Al and you don't know his real name.

Senator FERGUSON. So White did not name Chambers as the man who went sour?

Miss BENTLEY. No. I don't know whether White knew Chambers. Certainly he didn't give it to Silvermaster.

Mr. MORRIS. Did you have a confidential Government record come to you from White?

Miss BENTLEY. Many of them, all labeled from "Harry" because Soviet agents like to know who is providing what.

Mr. MORRIS. How many copies of such reports would you receive?

Miss BENTLEY. How many copies?

Mr. MORRIS. Would it come in duplicate?

Miss BENTLEY. Sometimes it was a carbon copy. Many, many times those documents were photographed in the Silvermasters' cellar because they couldn't be spared.

Mr. MORRIS. Would you give us a concrete example of your dealings with Harry Dexter White?

Miss BENTLEY. In the way of material?

Mr. MORRIS. Yes. Who gave it to you, for instance?

Miss BENTLEY. Well, in the early days Lud Ullmann, who was then working in the Treasury, used to bring it out. Sometimes Harry was leery about bringing it out himself. Sometimes it would be given to Bill Taylor.

Mr. MORRIS. Who is William Taylor?

Miss BENTLEY. He was another Communist Party member in the Treasury who paid his dues and was a member of the Silvermaster group.

Mr. MORRIS. Was Ullmann in the same category?

Miss BENTLEY. Ullman was in the same category. I knew Ullmann as well as the Silvermasters.

Mr. MORRIS. Let us take Ullmann. Would he give you a report and tell you it was a report from Harry White?

Miss BENTLEY. Yes, and he would also type on it "from Harry."

Mr. MORRIS. What would you do?

Miss BENTLEY. I would take that back, and when Mr. Golos was alive I would give it to him and after he passed on I would give it to the successor agent.

The CHAIRMAN. To whom?

Miss BENTLEY. To the succeeding Soviet contact I had; there were three of them.

Mr. MORRIS. In any case, were they ever microfilmed?

Miss BENTLEY. Many cases. In many cases the volume got too big, and they had to be microfilmed.

Mr. MORRIS. Where was that done?

Miss BENTLEY. In their basement. They had a home-made affair there where they put their camera.

Mr. MORRIS. Could you describe where that was?

Miss BENTLEY. The Silvermaster home?

Mr. MORRIS. Yes.

Miss BENTLEY. Right off Chevy Chase Circle, I think it was 5515 Thirty-fourth. I have forgotten the exact number.

Mr. MORRIS. You have been there?

Miss BENTLEY. I was there almost every 2 weeks, I should——

Mr. MORRIS. What was your purpose in going there?

Miss BENTLEY. My purpose in going there was to collect Communist dues and all the information collected during the 2 weeks.

Senator FERGUSON. In other words, the bulk got so large that you could not carry it to New York?

Miss BENTLEY. Physically I could have carried it, but it would have been unwise to go hauling large bundles around like that.

Senator FERGUSON. And you got it into microfilms so that you could take them into New York without being seen and having a package?

Miss BENTLEY. There was also the problem with lots of documents that you could only take them overnight and return them in the morning.

Mr. MORRIS. Miss Bentley, would you testify about an idea of Harry Dexter White whereby he was going to perfect your intelligence organization?

Miss BENTLEY. I don't quite understand the question.

Mr. MORRIS. You have testified in executive session that Harry Dexter White had a plan whereby he was going to integrate all intelligence matters coming into your ring.

Miss BENTLEY. Do you mean the trading of information between Government agencies?

Mr. MORRIS. Yes.

Miss BENTLEY. He not only had a plan, but we put it into effect.

Mr. MORRIS. Tell us about that.

Miss BENTLEY. We were so successful getting information during the war largely because of Harry White's idea to persuade Morgenthau to exchange information. In other words, he would send information over to Navy, and Navy would reciprocate. So there were at least seven or eight agencies trading information with Secretary Morgenthau.

Mr. MORRIS. You say this plan of trading information was initiated by White?

Miss BENTLEY. This plan was initiated by White because he knew it would come across his desk.

Mr. MORRIS. He being the Executive Assistant?

Miss BENTLEY. He was the Under Secretary, next man down the ladder.

Senator EASTLAND. Who negotiated that agreement?

Miss BENTLEY. From what I was told, it was Secretary Morgenthau himself.

Mr. MORRIS. You say it was initiated by White?

Miss BENTLEY. It was initiated by Harry White.

Senator EASTLAND. You testified he used Morgenthau?

Miss BENTLEY. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. Miss Bentley, I wonder if you would tell us exactly what your relations were with Lauchlin Currie.

Miss BENTLEY. Lauchlin Currie was not, as far as we knew at that time, a member of the Communist Party, but he was very close to various members of the Silvermaster group, including George Silverman, whom he knows very well, and Silvermaster. He was willing to bail them out when they were in trouble, when they were being fired for disloyalty or when they needed help to get a job.

Besides that he was passing on information to us.

Senator FERGUSON. Currie was passing it on?

Miss BENTLEY. Yes.

Senator FERGUSON. Can you give us any information on what you received through Currie?

Miss BENTLEY. Most of it was far eastern. There was the time when he relayed the information that the Soviet code was about to be broken.

Mr. MORRIS. Broken by whom?

Miss BENTLEY. The United States authorities.

Mr. MORRIS. He discovered that the United States authorities had broken the code, and he relayed it to you?

Miss BENTLEY. Were about to break it. I relayed it back, and my Russian head said, "Which code?"

Senator EASTLAND. Did he say which code?

Miss BENTLEY. No, I was unable to get back and find out. He just said the Soviet code.

Senator FERGUSON. Where did you get that information?

Miss BENTLEY. That information came from White via Silverman, as I recall it.

Senator FERGUSON. From Currie?

Miss BENTLEY. From Currie.

Mr. MORRIS. Was that a highly classified fact at the time?

Miss BENTLEY. Definitely. I don't know enough about Government labelings, but it was certainly something you wouldn't pass around.

Mr. MORRIS. Was it your understanding, Miss Bentley, that Lauchlin Currie was a full-fledged member of the Silvermaster group?

Miss BENTLEY. Definitely.

Mr. MORRIS. Did he always act in that capacity or was he reassigned in some fashion?

Miss BENTLEY. It was my understanding he was going to be reassigned when I left the group in September, I think it was, 1944. My Soviet contact told me that they did not believe in having such large groups for security reasons because if someone turns sour they know too much; that he intended to put White directly in contact with a Soviet superior, and Lauchlin Currie also in direct contact with a Soviet agent, and possibly with some of the smaller fry he could put two or three in one group. But he definitely mentioned putting White and Currie in direct contact.

The CHAIRMAN. Who was it that mentioned them?

Miss BENTLEY. I don't know his real name, he was known to me as Bill.

The CHAIRMAN. He was living where?

Miss BENTLEY. I don't know whether he lived in Washington or New York.

Mr. MORRIS. But he was your superior in the Soviet military police?

Miss BENTLEY. He was my superior in the Soviet military police and also I am quite sure it went through.

Mr. MORRIS. Do you know what particular agent Currie was going to be assigned to?

Miss BENTLEY. No, I don't.

Senator FERGUSON. Why do you say you think it went through?

Miss BENTLEY. Because after this Soviet contact had taken over the Silvermaster group he requested me to stay on with them for 3 months. In talking with Silvermaster he told me they had already put the plan into effect, and they were about to make contact with Soviet agents, so I am convinced it went through.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I think at this time we should point out what Lauchlin Currie's relations were with the Institute of Pacific Relations. I therefore ask Mr. Mandel if he will call to our attention some few of the exhibits that we have selected to show what Lauchlin Currie's role was in the Institute of Pacific Relations.

The CHAIRMAN. Are these exhibits to which you refer being made a part of the record?

Mr. MORRIS. We will introduce them.

The CHAIRMAN. I would like to have the foundation, the source, and how you got it.

Mr. MANDEL. First I refer to the testimony of Edward C. Carter on July 25, 1951, in which he identified Lauchlin Currie as a member of the Institute of Pacific Relations. Now I have here a photostat of a letter dated October 27, 1942, addressed to Joseph Barnes at 430 West Twenty-second Street, New York, N. Y.

The CHAIRMAN. Where does the instrument come from?

Mr. MANDEL. The instrument comes from the files of the Institute of Pacific Relations.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it an original instrument or photostat?

Mr. MANDEL. It is a photostat. It is signed by Edward C. Carter and the letter reads as follows:

DEAR JOE: Recently in Washington Lauchlin Currie expressed to me the hope that some day when you are in Washington you would give him the privilege of a private talk. As you know, he is an intimate friend and admirer of Owen Lattimore and has himself made two visits to Chungking. You and he would find a great deal in common, not only in matters Chinese, but in affairs elsewhere. I do hope that you can see him soon.

His office is in the State Department Building, but you reach him through the White House exchange.

Sincerely yours,

EDWARD C. CARTER.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to introduce that letter into the record and have it marked as the next consecutive exhibit.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be so marked and entered into the record

(The document referred to was marked "Exhibit No. 103" and is as follows:)

DEAR JOE: Recently in Washington Lauchlin Currie expressed to me the hope that some day soon when you are in Washington you would give him the privilege of a private talk. As you know, he is an intimate friend and admirer of Owen Lattimore and has himself made two visits to Chungking. Mr. MANDEL. Next is a memorandum from the files of the Institute of Pacific Relations dated November 30, 1942, and the memorandum is addressed to Mr. Carter, copy for Mr. Jessup at Mont Tremblant. This is in connection with the Mont Tremblant conference of the IPR.

In response to your request for designations of American Council members of Mont Tremblant committee, I am putting down the following suggestions.

This is signed by William W. Lockwood.

These should be reconsidered at Mont Tremblant after checking with Jessup so that they are merely tentative for the present.

The Pacific Council: Jessup, the regular American Council member, will be in the chair so presumably another American should represent the Council. I believe Kizer is the best choice.

Program Committee: Currie would be an excellent member, with Field as alternate. Currie may not wish to be burdened with this, however, and I understand you have Field in mind as program committee secretary, which would be excellent. The final decision here I would like to leave until later.

International Research Committee: Dennett is the best person, in view of his availability afterward for continuing responsibility. I would hope that Frank Coe could at least sit in on the meetings, in addition.

International Finance Committee: Brayton Wilbur; alternate, Brooks Emeny.

Publications Committee: Tentatively, Len De Caux.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have that received into the evidence as the next exhibit, pointing out that the significance of this document is that Lauchlin Currie, about whom we have had testimony, on November 30, 1942, was proposed by Mr. Lockwood in official capacity to Mr. Jessup as chairman of the program committee of the Mont Tremblant conference, which was the triennial conference and one of the important functions of the IPR.

The CHAIRMAN. The exhibit will be properly marked in sequence and inserted in the record.

WM. W. LOCKWOOD.

Mr. MANDEL. This is a letter from the files of the Institute of Pacific Relations dated February 18, 1941, addressed to Dr. Ch'ao-ting Chi from Edward C. Carter and reads as follows:

DEAR CHI: What would you think of my sending to Chungking some such cable as the following:

"LAUCHLIN CURRIE,

"American Embassy, Chungking:

"If press could report you had visited Chow Enlai this might help public opinion in view present crop ugly rumors regarding serious break in China's unified resistance."

It is a very ticklish matter, and I do not want to make things worse. However, it is certainly not in American interest or that of any country in the Pacific for China to start a two-front war.

Sincerely yours,

EDWARD C. CARTER.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to introduce this into the record as the next consecutive exhibit pointing out at the same time that Dr. Chi is a man who has been identified by several witnesses here as an important member of the Communist Party.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be inserted in the record.

(The document referred to was marked "Exhibit No. 105" and is as follows:)

Mr. MANDEL. This is another letter from the files of the Institute of Pacific Relations and is dated March 10, 1944, addressed to Dr. John Fairbank, care of Dr. Lauchlin Currie, the White House, Washington, D. C., signed by W. L. Holland.

DEAR JOHN: Here is a letter to Liu Yu-wan which I should like to have sent by hand or via the APO in Chungking. Would you be kind enough to inquire whether John Davies can take it with him if he is likely to be going through Chungking in the near future or alternatively whether it could be sent via APO to Mac Fisher or Jack Service or someone else whom you know to be in Chungking and willing to deliver the note? If for any reason you prefer not to do this, don't hesitate to tell me. I shall be down in Washington next Wednesday and probably Thursday also.

No more stuff seems to have come from Hsiang. Is there any way you could get a note to him via Kates or Mac Fisher asking whether anything has been transmitted for the use of the IPR?

As Carter probably told you, we have now prodded the University of California into taking some action about our friend and have offered to advance them a travel fund immediately.

P. S.—As a project in the field of cultural relations with China, I wonder what you and Wilma would think of the idea of getting an American publisher to reissue all or most of the chapters in the Symposium on Chinese Culture.

Mr. MORRIS. The significance of this document, Mr. Chairman, is that John Fairbank received his mail care of Dr. Lauchlin Currie at the White House. I would like to have that introduced as the next consecutive exhibit in the evidence.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be inserted in the record.

(The document referred to was marked "Exhibit No. 106" and is as follows:)

Sincerely yours,

W. L. HOLLAND.

P. S.—As a project in the field of cultural relations with China, I wonder what you and Wilma would think of the idea of getting an American publisher to reissue all or most of the chapters in the Symposium on Chinese Culture which the China IPR published in Shanghai in 1932. One or two chapters, for example, on industry are a little out of date but the book is still constantly being quoted and asked for though it has long been out of stock. If you thought the scheme worth while, I might ask Hu Shih and perhaps one or two other Chinese here to add supplementary chapters which would serve to bring the book partly up to date. There's such a demand from the publishers today for books from the Far East that I don't think we would have any difficulty in finding a publisher.

Mr. MANDEL. Here is another memorandum dated June 20, 1942, from the files of the Institute of Pacific Relations headed "1942 conference personnel, interview WWL," presumably with W. W. Lockwood, "with Lauchlin Currie, June 17, regarding IPR 1942 conference."

1. We may proceed on the assumption that the administration looks with favor on the idea of the conference and will put no official obstacle in the way of participation by Government people. (This implies no guaranty, of course, that any particular individual will be able or will agree to attend.)

Currie himself would like to be at the conference and presumably we can count on his being present.

Official participation will be essential to success.

2. Wallace and Perkins would be ideal, if available. Currie also suggested Harry White of the Treasury and Jim Baxter of the Office of Strategic Services.

As for the State Department, it is awkward to choose among four or five individuals. Berle would be important to secure, but he is always bracketed with Acheson. Similarly, Hornbeck and Hamilton are usually bracketed together. Pasvolsky is very important in the whole postwar set-up of the State Department.

Currie evaded a direct answer to the question as to whether we must include the old-line far eastern people, but indicated by inference that it would be rather awkward not to do so. He also said that if Alger Hiss were invited and Hornbeck were not, it would put the former in an impossible position. Currie's suggestion was that ECC see Welles, extend the courtesy of an invitation to him personally, and then invite his suggestions as to which of the other top State Department people should be included. Currie also mentioned Wallace Murray, Chief of the Near Eastern Division, which takes in India and Burma. He expressed no opinion as to Murray's personal qualifications.

There is no strong reason from the Washington viewpoint to prefer September to December or vice versa. Currie himself, however, thought that last year's plan of catching people at the end of the summer was a good one.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to introduce into evidence, and have it marked as the next consecutive exhibit, the item referred to. The purpose of introducing this exhibit is to show the role that Lauchlin Currie played as a high adviser in connection with the work of the Institute of Pacific Relations.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be inserted in the record.

Mr. MANDEL. I have here a group of telegrams, taken from the files of the Institute of Pacific Relations.

One telegram is addressed to Edward C. Carter:

Glad to see you at 12:30 Wednesday.

LAUCHLIN CURRIE.

The telegram does not show a date, but the subsequent telegram will undoubtedly indicate the date of the correspondence.

The next is a copy of a telegram dated September 17, 1941, to Lauchlin Currie, White House, Washington, D. C.:

Wire collect could I see you 10 minutes any time Thursday or Friday preferably Thursday.

EDWARD C. CARTER.

Here is another telegram dated October 7, 1942, to Lauchlin Currie, Executive Offices of the President, the White House, Washington, D. C.:

Visiting Washington tomorrow Thursday will telephone you in morning for appointment.

EDWARD C. CARTER.

Another one dated October 7, year not given, the White House:

EDWARD C. CARTER,
Institute of Pacific Relations:

Eighth any time would be better if convenient.

LAUCHLIN CURRIE.

Here is another dated June 26, 1942, a note addressed to Currie:

I am going to be in Washington on Thursday, July 2, and hope you can see me in the forenoon of that day.

EDWARD C. CARTER.

Another telegram, a copy of a telegram, June 23, 1942, addressed to Lauchlin Currie, Administrative Assistant to the President, Washington, D. C.:

Washington visit postponed until next week.

EDWARD C. CARTER.

Another copy of a telegram dated May 5, 1942, addressed to Lauchlin Currie:

Wire collect can you spare 5 minutes any time Wednesday.

EDWARD C. CARTER.

And then we have another here, dated April 25, 1942, a telegram to Edward C. Carter.

Planning to attend conference Tuesday.

LAUCHLIN CURRIE.

The telegram is marked as coming from the White House.

Mr. MORRIS. Are they samples of correspondence that you have discovered in the files between Lauchlin Currie and Edward C. Carter?

Mr. MANDEL. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORRIS. They are not all of the correspondence between these two people, are they?

Mr. MANDEL. No, sir.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to introduce these telegrams just read by Mr. Mandel into the record, and have them marked as the next consecutive exhibit.

The purpose of these telegrams is to show the relationship that existed between Lauchlin Currie and Edward C. Carter, namely, that Carter frequently went to Washington and conferred with Lauchlin Currie in the White House. Mr. Carter, at that time, was the secretary general of the Institute of Pacific Relations.

The CHAIRMAN. These will be inserted into the record.

EDWARD C. CARTER,
Institute of Pacific Relations:
Glad to see you at 12:30 Wednesday.

LAUCHLIN CURRIE.

Mr. MANDEL. Here is a brief memorandum, dated July 10, 1941. "W. L. H." presumably W. L. Holland, from "E. C. C." presumably E. C. Carter.

I am, of course, delighted that you have persuaded Chi to allow us to go ahead with his book suppressing only those passages which are likely to affect Chi's work.

My acquiescing in Chi's request did not derive from a desire to defer to Washington bureaucrats, but simply and solely to my desire to refrain from doing anything which would defeat the purposes of Chen Han-sen, Chi, Lauchlin Currie, Harry White, and Morgenthau in their very big program in China.

I had a feeling that you would be able to persuade Chi to approve of precisely what you have secured his approval for. I am naturally delighted.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to introduce this into the record as the next consecutive exhibit. I understand that Senator Ferguson has a question he would like to ask about it before we pass it on.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you know anything about this program, and concerning which I was talking about previously, in China? Did that come to your attention?

Miss BENTLEY. No; I am afraid not. I was pretty new in the game at that time.

Senator FERGUSON. You knew about it in the one in Germany but not the one in China?

Miss BENTLEY. That is correct; yes.

Senator FERGUSON. All right.

Mr. MORRIS. I would like to point out at this time that we have thus far introduced into the record evidence that Chen Han-seng, Chi, Lauchlin Currie, and Harry White are the four people mentioned in this memorandum as having had former connections with the Communist Party.

The CHAIRMAN. The exhibits will be inserted in the record.

Mr. MANDEL. Another exhibit coming from the file of the Institute of Pacific Relations, dated June 15, 1942. "E. C. C." presumably Mr. Carter, from "W. W. L." presumably W. W. Lockwood.

In response to your request I have hastily jotted down a number of suggestions for the American group at the conference. It's a long list, of course, but I believe we should add to it considerably, and then get competent advice—say that of Currie, Barnes, and Jessup—on elimination. This list runs too much in the regular groove as regards non-Government people. So far as Washington is concerned, we need more intimate knowledge as to who really are in the key positions.

Then follows a list of individuals. Under the heading of "Government," we have Ernest H. Gruening.

Mr. MORRIS. I think, Mr. Mandel, we do not have to go into that list. I think, Mr. Chairman, I would like to introduce this into the record as evidence of the fact that the Institute of Pacific Relations, and, in this case, Mr. Lockwood writing to Mr. Carter, considered that the competent advice should be gotten from Currie, who is Lauchlin Currie, Barnes who is Joseph Barnes, and Jessup who is Philip Jessup, again to establish that Mr. Currie was looked upon by the institute as one of the senior advisers of that organization.

As such, I would like to have it introduced into the record as the next consecutive exhibit.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be so inserted.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Mandel has just one more, Mr. Chairman, bearing on this point of Lauchlin Currie's position in the IPR.

Mr. MANDEL. Here is a letter dated August 28, 1941, from the files of the Institute of Pacific Relations, addressed to Lauchlin Currie, Executive Offices of the President:

DEAR CURRIE: A Chinese scholar who ought to know better has written recently to at least three of my friends criticizing at length Lattimore and Lattimore's appointment, the IPR, etc. All three of his correspondents have referred the letters to me.

It is not terribly important, but I would like to send copies of the letters to Lattimore, but in such a way as to make certain that they are not read by others before reaching him. Have you any means of getting a letter of mine to Lattimore if I were to send it to you to forward?

Sincerely yours,

EDWARD C. CARTER.

The CHAIRMAN. To whom was that addressed?

Mr. MANDEL. This is addressed to Lauchlin Currie.

Mr. MORRIS. At the White House.

Mr. MANDEL. Here is the reply, dated September 2, 1941, on the stationery of the White House, addressed to Edward C. Carter:

DEAR CARTER: I will be glad to get the letters you mentioned to Lattimore uncensored. Since it will not be official business I will have to ask you for airmail postage as far as Hong Kong.

Sincerely,

LAUCHLIN CURRIE.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to introduce that into the record, and have it marked as the next consecutive exhibit.

The CHAIRMAN. It may be inserted into the record.

LAUCHLIN CURRIE.

Mr. MORRIS. The purpose of introducing those exhibits was to show the connection of Lauchlin Currie, about whom we have had testimony this morning, with the Institute of Pacific Relations.

Miss Bentley, do you know Sol Adler?

Miss BENTLEY. Not personally; no.

Mr. MORRIS. Miss Bentley, did you know about Sol Adler?

Miss BENTLEY. Yes. Solomon Adler was, again, a member of the Silvermaster group. He paid his dues through Mr. Silvermaster to me. Most of the time I was in charge of that group, he was over in China. But he did send reports to various people, including Harry Dexter White in the Treasury Department, which were relayed on to us.

Mr. MORRIS. Now, what were the natures of those reports, Miss Bentley?

Miss BENTLEY. Reports on internal Chinese politics, mainly, as to what the Nationalists were doing and what the chances were for the Eighth Army people and the Communists in China.

Mr. MORRIS. What was his Communist assignment in China? Can you tell us a little bit about that, Miss Bentley?

Miss BENTLEY. When he went over there he was told—that was before my day, so I didn't participate in it—he was told that he should follow the party line in China, and carry out to the utmost whatever Moscow wanted in the Far East.

Senator EASTLAND. Who was that?

Mr. MORRIS. This is Sol Adler, Senator, who was one of the high officials in the Treasury Department, and who was in charge of the Treasury Department for China.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well.

Mr. MORRIS. I wonder if you can tell us something more about Solomon Adler, Miss Bentley? Anything more about Solomon Adler that you can tell us would be helpful.

Miss BENTLEY. In what respect?

Mr. MORRIS. About his connection with the organization.

Miss BENTLEY. I understand that he had been connected with the organization for a few years before I came along.

He not only was connected with the Silvermaster organization, but he had Communist contacts within China. One of those was Chi. I have forgotten his first name.

Mr. MORRIS. Dr. Ch'ao Ting Chi?

Miss BENTLEY. He was the man proposed to be the Chinese delegate to the United Nations. Is that the same one?

Mr. MORRIS. That is right.

Miss BENTLEY. Well, he had dealings with him, both in this country and in China, and with numerous others of the Communists in China, although he was supposed to cultivate the Nationalists on behalf of our own Government, and also to forward the Communist plan.

He was really quite friendly, for example, with Madam Chiang Kai-shek. I remember one report that came through on Adler at one time that complained that he was not tending to business and influencing the quarters he should be. He was playing too much bridge with Madam Chiang Kai-shek.

Mr. MORRIS. Miss Bentley, did you know a man named Israel Epstein?

Miss BENTLEY. I don't know him personally, no. I know about him.

Mr. MORRIS. Would you tell us what you know about him, Miss Bentley?

Miss BENTLEY. Yes. In February 1941, I helped set up a cover business, to cover the espionage activities, with funds supplied by Earl Browder, of the American Communist Party, and with a contact from a Soviet agency which had been arranged by Soviet Intelligence. We needed personnel, and Israel Epstein's then wife, Mrs. Edith Epstein, had just returned not too long before from China, and we considered her. So Mr. Golos got her dossier and discovered that Israel Epstein had been a member of the Russian Secret Police for many years in China, and because Mrs. Edith Epstein was his wife, she would be fit to take on as part of our personnel in the business.

Mr. MORRIS. Was there any doubt in your mind that Israel Epstein was an important Sovie agent?

Miss BENTLEY. No doubt at all. Mr. Golos checked up on him and had heard a great deal about him.

Mr. MORRIS. How reliable would a report like that, from Mr. Golos about Mr. Epstein as a Soviet agent, be as far as you are concerned?

Miss BENTLEY. Any report which I would get from my Soviet superior on those things would be reliable on that.

Mr. MORRIS. So there was no doubt in your mind that Israel Epstein was what he told you he was?

Miss BENTLEY. No doubt whatsover.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you ever take his wife on as an agent?

Miss BENTLEY. No, we simply used her in the office. It turned out she was not as far left as her husband, and we did not like our agents to know too much about us. Since we hired her in the office, it would be unwise to take her as an agent.

Senator FERGUSON. But you did put her in the office?

Miss BENTLEY. We did put her in the office because we thought she would be discreet and protect us in case anything came up.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Mandel, I wonder if you can bring forth the exhibit to show Israel Epstein's connection with the Institute of Pacific Relations?

Mr. MANDEL. Mr. Epstein was the author of the article entitled "Hong Kong, Past and Present," in the Far Eastern Survey for April 24, 1946.

Mr. MORRIS. Is the Far Eastern Survey a publication of the Institute of Pacific Relations?

Mr. MANDEL. It is an official publication of the Institute of Pacific Relations.

Here is a letter dated September 6, and the year is not given. It is addressed to "Dear Holland" signed by "I. Epstein."

The CHAIRMAN. That was obtained from where?

Mr. MANDEL. It was obtained from the files of the Institute of Pacific Relations:

I clean forgot about giving you the particulars for the letters on Saturday. One letter should be written for me, and the other for Miss Liu Wu-Kou, Kweilin. It is not necessary to have any for anyone in Chen Ta's or other academic outfits, because they can work from their own institutions.

Enclosed also are the excerpts from the translation of Chiang's book. Would like to have these back when you are through.

I suppose you know that Fairbank came in from Kweilin (come to think of it, I told you Saturday) and have received something, through him, from H. and Elsie.

When are you leaving? Are you returning here if you do go down to Kweilin? I ask because we will be requesting you to take some stuff to New York.

Sincerely.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to introduce this into the record as the next consecutive exhibit bearing on Israel Epstein's activities with the Institute of Pacific Relations.

The CHAIRMAN. It may be inserted in the record.

SEPTEMBER 6.

Mr. MORRIS. Miss Bentley, did you know anything about John K. Fairbank, who was mentioned in the last letter?

Miss BENTLEY. Only that he was sometimes used by Mildred Price to bring material back from China. You see, it was difficult to bring things back from China that wouldn't go through the censorship or wouldn't otherwise get opened and looked at. Mme. Sun Yat-sen and a number of other people in China, a few Communists, were sending material to Mildred for the China Aid Council. So, anyone who was sympathetic or one of the boys would bring them back on their trips.

Mr. MORRIS. And do you know that Mildred Price did use John K. Fairbank to bring back messages from whom?

Miss BENTLEY. From Mme. Sun Yat-sen?

Mr. MORRIS. To?

Miss BENTLEY. To Mildred Price, from China, because I know at least one occasion when he did bring all these documents back.

Mr. MORRIS. Was Mme. Sun Yat-sen a Communist?

Miss BENTLEY. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. Could you develop that a bit for us?

Miss BENTLEY. As to show Mme. Sun Yat-sen was?

Mr. MORRIS. Yes; and her relations with your organization.

Miss BENTLEY. Mme. Sun Yat-sen, as far as I know, had been a Communist for quite some time, and was very important in the Communist movement over there. And, therefore, she was in contact with the China Aid Council, which was going all out to help the Communist area.

Mr. MORRIS. So, you do know that she was working with the China Aid Council?

Miss BENTLEY. Quite definitely. They got consistent letters from her, and they wrote back, and their aid was going to Communist areas in China.

Mr. MORRIS. Miss Bentley, would you try to place a date of the time when John K. Fairbank brought a message back from Mme. Sun Yat-sen to Mildred Price? Was it during the time he was the head of the China Division of the Office of War Information?

Miss BENTLEY. I don't know exactly when he was head of that. I would say it was in 1944. It was after Mr. Golos' death. It must have been 1944, or the tag end of 1943.

Mr. MORRIS. Miss Bentley, could you tell us what you know about Philip Jaffe?

Miss BENTLEY. Yes. His name first came up when, as I told you, we had been canvassing the IPR through Mildred Price to see if we could find good intelligence material. We had gone through them. It didn't look hopeful; a lot of them were too temperamental, and our best prospect as an intelligence worker seemed to be Philip Jaffe, according to Mildred, although she did say that she was very much afraid that he was rather too well known as a Red and, therefore, he wouldn't be too useful.

In undercover work, you have to have people who are inconspicuous and not too well known. So, we decided not to go on with that project. But she described him as being a very loyal comrade and reliable.

Mr. MORRIS. So, it is your testimony that you did not take Philip Jaffe from the Institute of Pacific Relations for espionage because he was too open a Communist?

Miss BENTLEY. Yes. We got that information from Mildred Price.

Mr. MORRIS. And, for that reason, he wouldn't be suitable?

Miss BENTLEY. That is correct; yes.

Mr. MORRIS. Were you ever warned against associating with the Institute of Pacific Relations?

Miss BENTLEY. Yes. I was told to be very careful in dealing even with Mildred. As a matter of fact, I think Mr. Golos' phrase was: "It was as red as a rose, and you shouldn't touch it with a 10-foot pole."

Mr. MORRIS. The IPR?

Miss BENTLEY. Yes. He felt, from the point of view of good undercover work, they were far too bungling and they were too much in the open, and it was far too dangerous to be associating with the Institute of Pacific Relations. It might get us in trouble.

Mr. MORRIS. Miss Bentley, did you ever hear of Edward C. Carter's relationship to the Communist organizations mentioned?

Miss BENTLEY. I know very little about Edward C. Carter.

Mr. MORRIS. What do you know about him?

Miss BENTLEY. I know that Mildred Price brought his name up, inasmuch as they were associated, and she said he was O. K., and by that she meant that he was a reliable person that she could trust.

Mr. MORRIS. That she could trust in connection with the party work?

Miss BENTLEY. Yes. Whether or not he was actually a party member is something I don't know.

Mr. MORRIS. Is there anything more you know about Edward C. Carter, Miss Bentley?

Miss BENTLEY. Not that I can think of at the moment.

Mr. MORRIS. Did you know a Miss Harriet Lucy Moore?

Miss BENTLEY. Yes. I knew Harriet Moore personally. This forum, that I told you we set up as a cover business in 1941, had a license to ship parcels to Russia. Right after we had set it up in February, you remember, the Germans attacked Russia. And the result of that was that we got the brilliant brainstorm of wanting to send packages to Russia, and the Russian War Relief was born not too long after that. And in connection with that, I had dealings with Harriet Moore, and I was told by Mr. Golos, by the people downtown in the Communist Party, that she was a comrade and I should deal with her as such.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, we have introduced into the record a long series of exhibits showing Harriet Lucy Moore's connections with the Institute of Pacific Relations.

In the middle 1940's, she was acting secretary of that organization. Prior to that, Mr. Chairman—I think it was 1941—she was chairman of the nominating committee of the Institute of Pacific Relations. At that same year she was also a member of the executive committee of the Institute of Pacific Relations, and a member of the board of trustees.

Mr. Chairman, those exhibits have already gone into evidence, together with many others, showing that she was very actively associated with the Institute of Pacific Relations. Miss Bentley has now testified about knowing her as a member of the Communist Party.

What do you know about Frederick V. Field, Miss Bentley?

Miss BENTLEY. I don't know him personally. I know, as I have stated before, being told by Browder and by Mildred Price.

Mr. MORRIS. Your dealings with him were through Browder?

Miss BENTLEY. My dealings with him were through Browder, because I was not getting into the IPR.

Mr. MORRIS. Miss Bentley, did you ever have a meeting at Field's house?

Miss BENTLEY. Yes. Earl Browder very often used Fred Field's house to meet people where it had to be highly underground.

Mr. MORRIS. Field was not there?

Miss BENTLEY. Field was not there; no. He just loaned the house to Browder, and Browder was there when I went with a couple of people that he didn't want to come out in the open. They met there. I understand that was done quite frequently on undercover meetings.

Mr. MORRIS. What was the nature of that particular meeting?

Miss BENTLEY. That particular meeting was in connection with what should happen about the cover business.

Mr. MORRIS. And how long did it last?

Miss BENTLEY. The cover business?

Mr. MORRIS. No; the meeting?

Miss BENTLEY. I would say we were there a good 2 hours, probably. We had quite a number of things to talk about.

Mr. MORRIS. Miss Bentley, do you know of an organization called the American Friends of the Chinese People?

Miss BENTLEY. I have heard about it; yes.

Mr. MORRIS. What do you know about it, Miss Bentley?

Miss BENTLEY. I have been told that it, again, was in the Communist sphere of influence.

Mr. MORRIS. By whom?

Miss BENTLEY. I think I was told that by Mildred Price.

Mr. MORRIS. Do you know anything about the publication Amerasia?

Miss BENTLEY. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. What do you know about Amerasia?

Miss BENTLEY. I was also told that that was Communist-dominated.

Mr. MORRIS. Who told you that?

Miss BENTLEY. Both Golos and Mildred Price.

Senator EASTLAND. Do you know anything about Owen Lattimore?

Miss BENTLEY. No; I don't know Lattimore.

Senator EASTLAND. You do not know whether he is a Communist or not?

Miss BENTLEY. No; I don't.

Mr. MORRIS. Do you know Robert Miller?

Miss BENTLEY. Yes; I know Robert Miller. Robert Miller was one of the Communist Party members that I took on as an espionage agent way back in 1941. He worked for the CIAA. That is Nelson Rockefeller's Coordinator of Inter-American Affairs, I think it was called. I think he was in the Political Division of that outfit. I think in 1944 he migrated from there to the State Department. He was one of the people I dealt with directly, collected his dues and got his information.

Mr. MORRIS. Miss Bentley, did you ever have any direct relations with John P. Davies?

Miss BENTLEY. No.

Mr. MORRIS. Did you ever have anything to do with any of his reports, official State Department reports?

Miss BENTLEY. Yes, through the Silvermaster group. I was told that he was quite sympathetic to our cause, and I remember one report of his that they gave to me which definitely showed that fact.

Mr. MORRIS. You were shown a report written by John P. Davies?

Miss BENTLEY. I think it was just after he came back from India. I wouldn't swear to it, but I think so.

Mr. MORRIS. What did the report show, Miss Bentley?

Miss BENTLEY. I remember at the time saying, "Yes; they were quite right about his sympathies," because the report showed it.

Mr. MORRIS. Miss Bentley, did you know James S. Allen?

Miss BENTLEY. I may have met him once. I am not sure.

Mr. MORRIS. What do you know about James S. Allen?

Miss BENTLEY. Not too much. You see, he was more or less in the open party, and I was undercover. So, if I met him at all, it was in the early days in the party, when I could associate openly with people.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I might point out that these people that we are asking Miss Bentley about are people who are connected with the Institute of Pacific Relations, and have been shown to be such by previous exhibits.

I would like to point that out, Mr. Chairman.

Do you know Frank Coe?

Miss BENTLEY. Not personally. He, again, was a member of the Silvermaster group, worked in the Treasury Department. I collected his Communist Party dues from the Silvermaster group, and it was my understanding from the Silvermasters, again, that he had been a member of the party for quite some time.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, we have already introduced the exhibits into the record which show that Mr. Frank Coe attended conferences of the Institute of Pacific Relations.

Mr. Mandel, have you anything further?

Mr. MANDEL. This is taken from the files of the Institute of Pacific Relations, marked "Private IPR Discussion Group on United Nations Cooperation," dated March 15, 1943, at 700 Jackson Place, Washington, D. C. On this list is Dr. Frank Coe, Michael Greenberg, and others.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to introduce that into the record as the next consecutive exhibit.

The CHAIRMAN. That was taken from the files of the Institute of Pacific Relations, Mr. Mandel?

Mr. MANDEL. They all came from the files of the institute.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be inserted in the record at this point.

(The document referred to was marked "Exhibit No. 113" and is as follows:)

Mr. Joseph Jones, Department of State, Washington, D. C.
Mr. David Weintraub, Office of Foreign Relief and Rehabilitation, Washington, D. C.
Mr. Len DeCaux, Publicity Director, CIO, Washington, D.C.

Mr. MORRIS. Miss Bentley, did you know anything about Joseph Barnes?

Miss BENTLEY. Not personally; no. He was a friend of Mr. Golos. Mr. Golos worked with him, and Mr. Golos told me he was O. K.

Mr. MORRIS. What do you mean by "he was O. K."?

Miss BENTLEY. That meant that he could be worked with and would take directives.

Mr. MORRIS. Communist directives?

Miss BENTLEY. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. Miss Bentley, did you know Vladimir Kazakevich?

Miss BENTLEY. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. Can you tell us what you know about Vladimir Kazakevich?

Miss BENTLEY. He was originally a White Russian who came to this country, I think, in the twenties, and then fell in with some Communist Russians on the west coast in the early thirties, never actually becoming a member in the sense that he was possessed with a book or that he was considered one, but to all intents and purposes was just as good. He was a propagandist for the Russians. He lectured for them. He wrote articles for them, and he had continuous dealings with Mr. Golos.

Whenever he found any interesting information, he brought it in to him, knowing where it was going. In fact, Mr. Kazakevich even told me several times he knew that. At one time he got a job at Cornell University giving courses on Russian civilization to Army students. But someone discovered him, I think it was Mr. Woltman on the then World Telegram, and he was exposed. I understand that he has now gone back to Russia. At least, I read it in a newspaper article.

Mr. MORRIS. I wonder if you can tell us what you know about Alger Hiss?

Mr. Chairman, we have had previous testimony showing that Alger Hiss was an adviser of the IPR, and a member of the board of trustees of the IPR. For that reason, we are going to ask Miss Bentley if she had any connections, indirect or direct, with Alger Hiss.

Miss BENTLEY. They were indirect ones, but to my mind conclusive ones.

In 1944 I took on a group of people I called the Perlo group.

Mr. MORRIS. Who is Perlo?

Miss BENTLEY. Victor Perlo is a gentleman that I understand was a quite brilliant statistician with the War Production Board. He is now out of the Government. At the last I heard of him, I think he is in the Jefferson School in New York.

One of the members of the group was a Mr. Harold Glasser, in the Treasury.

In the process of checking everyone's past, I found that Mr. Glasser had, at one time, been pulled out of that particular group and had been turned over to a person whom both Mr. Perlo and Mr. Charles Kramer refused to tell me who it was, except that he was working for the Russians, and later they broke down and told me it was Mr. Alger Hiss.

Of course, I immediately checked that with my Soviet superior, because it could have been somebody else's intelligence service, and could be dangerous. Word came back to me "that is all right. Lay off the Hiss thing. He is one of ours, but don't bother about it any more."

Mr. MORRIS. And you did not bother about it?

Miss BENTLEY. No. When you were told by your superior to lay off, you laid off.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, we have more testimony from Miss Bentley in the executive session, but I think it is of such character, particularly inasmuch as it involves foreign governments, that we should have an executive session on that score.

I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that we adjourn until after lunch and commence with an executive session at that time.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well.

The chairman will be unable to preside after lunch. I have another committee meeting.

Senator Smith, could you preside?

Senator SMITH. I have another committee meeting also. I could probably be here for a little while. I think my committee starts at 3 o'clock.

Mr. MORRIS. It is important testimony, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. I was wondering if we could meet at a later hour in the afternoon, when I might get through. What would you say to 4:30? It would be a little late.

Mr. MORRIS. That would be all right, Mr. Chairman.

Senator SMITH. I might be able to be here for an hour, at 2 o'clock.

Mr. MORRIS. I think we will be able to finish in an hour, Senator Smith.

The CHAIRMAN. How about at 4:30?

Mr. MORRIS. That will be fine, Senator.

Senator SMITH. You spoke about collecting Communist dues and making your rounds.

How often did you make these rounds? I believe you said every 2 weeks.

Miss BENTLEY. I came down every 2 weeks. Once in a while it would be less frequent, if people were on vacations, and once in a while more frequently if there was extra data. I didn't collect them every time.

Perhaps I should explain. Ordinarily, in the open party, they try to collect them regularly. When it comes to undercover work, it is done more or less as a matter of tightening your hold on a person. In other words, the money that you get out of him isn't so important, it is impressing on him that he has one more link in the party.

Senator SMITH. Did you collect the dues in other spots than Washington?

Miss BENTLEY. Yes. For example, the Perlo group came up to New York to meet me, and I collected them there.

Senator SMITH. What is the amount of the dues?

Miss BENTLEY. That is one of the most awful things for anyone to try to get. I don't know whether you have ever seen a Communist dues scale, but no one short of a financial wizard can keep them straight, and they change all the time.

All I can remember of my own dues is that at one time when I earned $25 a week, I paid 25 cents a week dues. But it was broken down in categories, almost like an income tax, and then a surtax after so much.

Senator SMITH. Did you have any trouble collecting from your members?

Miss BENTLEY. Very often. Very often, at least they said, they were financially embarrassed.

Senator SMITH. Did you get any money for this work from Russia?

Miss BENTLEY. No; in our case we didn't, no. As a matter of fact, it went the other way around. People were paying dues, including myself, for the privilege of being Communists. We were not being paid by Russia. But then, that is good espionage practice. The Russians told me that they felt that a person who thought something of it would be able to go up higher.

Senator SMITH. They train you also on that phase, do they?

Miss BENTLEY. That is right.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Mandel, I wonder if you would put into the record additional evidence that Harry Dexter White was associated with the Institute of Pacific Relations? We have already put in some, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MANDEL. Taken from the files of the Institute of Pacific Relations is a memorandum dated November 3, 1942, for Miss Harriet L. Moore, Prof. Philip C. Jessup, and Mr. Benjamin H. Kizer, entitled "Invitations Issued for the American Group, Mont Tremblant Conference, Institute of Pacific Relations."

Listed here as representing the White House, Currie, Lauchlin (attendance probable); Treasury Department, White, Harry D. (in London).

Others mentioned are Frank Coe, William T. Stone, and others.

Mr. MORRIS. That was for the Mont Tremblant Conference in 1942, is that right, Mr. Mandel?

Mr. MANDEL. That is right.

(The document referred to was marked "Exhibit No. 114" and is as follows:)

Mr. MANDEL. Here is a letter from the Institute of Pacific Relations, dated October 21, 1942, addressed to Robert W. Barnett, from William W. Lockwood, and I read a few excerpts:

The interviews with conference invitees yesterday were quite successful on the whole. Remer and Bunch definitely will come unless OSS policy prevents. Despres makes the same reservation; also he is not yet sure of being able to get away for that time. Coe and Stone accept tentatively, although uncertain about whether they can get away for the full period. Emerson doubts very much that he can free himself to attend. Coe and Stone have agreed to take up the question with Perkins, and have hopes that he will attend for 2 or 3 days, though no longer than that. Other possibilities developed in discussion, and these I'll take up with you later.

Meanwhile there are one or two specific things I'd like you to do.

Harry White is in London, I am told, though I didn't call his office. I am mailing a formal invitation to him, and suggest that you call his secretary to say that this is something about which we should like to talk with White on his return.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have that introduced into the record, and have it marked as the next consecutive exhibit.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be inserted into the record.

(The document referred to was marked "Exhibit No. 115" and is as follows:)

EXHIBIT No. 115

OCTOBER 21, 1942.

Mr. ROBERT W. BARNETT,
I. P. R. 700 Jackson Place NW.

DEAR BOB: The interviews with conference invitees yesterday were quite successful on the whole. Remer and Bunch definitely will come unless OSS policy prevents. Despres makes the same reservation; also he is not yet sure of being able to get away for that time. Coe and Stone accept tentatively, although uncertain about whether they can get away for the full period. Emerson doubts very much that he can free himself to attend. Coe and Stone have agreed to take up the question with Perkins, and have hopes that he will attend for 2 or 3 days, though no longer than that. Other possibilities developed in discussion, and these I'll take up with you later.

Meanwhile there are one or two specific things I'd like you to do.

Harry White is in London, I am told, though I didn't call his office. I am mailing a formal invitation to him, and suggest that you call his secretary to say that this is something about which we should like to talk with White on his return.

I also invited Len De Caux, CIO publicity director and editor of the CIO News. He immediately gave his tentative acceptance. I got a very favorable impression from conversation with him, and Michael knows him.

De Caux suggested Boris Shiskin of the A. F. of L. as another good labor person for the conference. He is the research director, I believe. If the nominating committee approves, I'd like you and Michael to see him at the Washington headquarters and extend an invitation. Before doing this, however, you had better wait for further word from me.

In the opinion of Hiss, Coe, and Despres, we ought to try to get Berle or Acheson, or both. More about this later, too.

One important gap in the present line-up is India. The Washington possibilities are Paul Alling, now political adviser and formerly chief of the State Department's Near Eastern Division; Wallace Murray, present chief; Eric Beecroft, and Norman Brown. From what I learned of the two State Department men, neither would be very useful to us. As between Beecroft and Brown,

I'd like your opinion and Michael's. Despres says that the written work of Brown's section is first rate—imaginative and pointed. He doesn't know Brown's qualifications as a conference participant Remer thinks well of Brown as more than the conventional academician. In his favor are not only his position, but also his academic standing. Although we are paying little attention to this consideration in making up the American group, it would be desirable, other things being equal, to include at least one person with senior rank among scholars in the Asiatic field. But this shouldn't decide the matter unless on other grounds as well Brown is the best nominee.

Another possibility we might consider is someone from Knox's office or Stimson's. Coe and Hiss mentioned Adlai Stevens, one of Knox's special assistants. Hiss also suggested with some approval Harvey Bundy, former assistant Secretary of State and now special assistant to Stimson. Then there is General Little, a Marine general formerly in China, now retired (?) Also General Magruder, whereabouts unknown. Despres suggested Admiral Hart, saying that it wouldn't be a bad idea to have someone who would give a pretty forthright and orthodox Navy view, as this view will greatly influence the postwar settlement.

Still other suggestion include Robert Sherwood, head of the OWI's Overseas Section, and Gardner Cowles.

Ben Kizer probably will write Congressman Coffee a personal letter, and leave it to us to follow up with an interview.

In a day or so I'll send a revised list indicating where we now stand on invitations and acceptances.

Read Hager, by the way, would like very much to see you, and took down your telephone number He has been with Rupert Emerson in the office of the OPA regional administrator handling Territories and possessions. Next week he probably will shift to the civilian staff of the Munitions Assignments Board. This will put him in a key position, as a member of the group, working for Hopkins in this field. His home address is 2031 Huidekoper Place.

Sincerely yours,

WILLIAM W. LOCKWOOD, Secretary.

Mr. MORRIS. You see there that Harry White is represented as invited as representing the Treasury Department.

Senator SMITH. I think, Mr. Chairman, that maybe the statement should be made there that that does not mean, the introduction of this exhibit does not mean, that all of the people on here, whose names are on here, are called suspects because there are names of a great many.

The CHAIRMAN. I understand it is introduced for a purpose, to connect Harry Dexter White.

Mr. MORRIS. It is introduced to show that Harry Dexter White was interested in IPR activities.

In this particular case, he was a delegate to the Mont Tremblant Conference in 1942.

Senator SMITH. I see names of a great many American citizens here on these two sheets of paper, and I was wonrdering about it.

The CHAIRMAN. The exhibit does not refer to them at all.

Senator SMITH. That is exactly what I wanted.

Mr. MORRIS. I think, further along those lines, Mr. Chairman, you have pointed out that incidental association between people whom we have named as Communists here, which association reflects only mere association and nothing significant, that we have asked the members of the committee to withhold any conclusions about their particular identity with the Communist organization.

The CHAIRMAN. That is correct.

Mr. MORRIS. One more question.

Could you tell us what you know about Joseph Eckhart.

Miss BENTLEY. Yes, quite a lot about Joseph Eckhart. I met him originally in November 1936 because he needed a secretary, or so the excuse was, to edit his letters, because his English wasn't too good.

I was introduced to him by the then organizational secretary of the city office of the League Against War and Fascism.

Mr. MORRIS. Who was that?

Miss BENTLEY. Beatrice Carlin.

That organization, of course, has been thoroughly branded as being Communist dominated; not only that, the organization originated in Moscow. It was understood that Mr. Eckhart was a Communist.

As time went on, he was unable to use me because he had come to this country, I understand, for the express purpose of trying to get airplanes to Spain. That was during the civil war. He was going to sneak them out through Mexico. The Neutrality Act intervened along in there, and he stayed on until 1938, and found that he couldn't use me.

But I discovered that he was a highly important person at that point, that he had come from Moscow without the usual strings of reporting to superiors, and I knew him, as I said, from November 1936 until January, I guess it was, 1938.

I found out later on that he was a Soviet military intelligence person. Mr. Golos told me that.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I have introduced that testimony into evidence not immediately connecting the Institute of Pacific Relations with that individual person.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well.

Is that all you have to offer?

Mr. MORRIS. Yes, until we have an executive session, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well.

The committee will stand in recess until 4:30 when we will have an executive session.

(Whereupon, at 11:55 a. m., Tuesday, August 14, 1951, the hearing was recessed until 10 a. m., Thursday, August 16, 1951.)

INSTITUTE OF PACIFIC RELATIONS

THURSDAY, AUGUST 16, 1951

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE TO INVESTIGATE THE ADMINISTRATION OF THE INTERNAL SECURITY ACT AND OTHER INTERNAL SECURITY LAWS OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
Washington, D. C.

The subcommittee met at 10 a.m., pursuant to recess, Hon. Pat McCarran (chairman) presiding.

Present: Senators McCarran, Smith, Ferguson, and Watkins.

Also present: Senators McCarthy and Mundt; J. G. Sourwine, committee counsel; Robert Morris, subcommittee counsel; and Benjamin Mandel, director of research.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will come to order.

Mr. Morris, your witness?

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I am going to call on Mr. Carter first. Mr. Canning and Mr. Chambers, I wonder if you would accommodate the gentlemen of the press by letting them have the pictures?

The CHAIRMAN. Let me say to the witnesses that they are not required or do not have to have their pictures taken in this committee. If there is no objection on their part, they may sit up here and the press may take pictures, otherwise they will not be taken.

Mr. CHAMBERS. In my case one more will not matter.

The CHAIRMAN. All right, gentlemen.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Carter?

The CHAIRMAN. Now again may I say that the acoustics in this room are not very good, and when it is crowded it makes it just a little bit worse. Will you kindly bear with the committee and try to be as quiet as possible, especially if you have to speak to your neighbor, in which case please resort to the whisper method only.

You may proceed, Mr. Morris, the witness has been sworn.

TESTIMONY OF EDWARD C. CARTER, INSTITUTE OF PACIFIC RELATIONS

Mr. MORRIS. The purpose of calling Mr. Carter in today is that we have run into a certain amount of difficulty in determining the identity of a person mentioned in one of the exhibits. Since Mr. Carter was the recipient of the letter involved I thought it would be best to have him in here to answer this particular question. We had one day last week testimony by Prof. Karl August Wittfogel of the School of Chinese Studies in Columbia University, testimony that Herbert Norman was in 1938 a Communist.

In filing our exhibits at the time there was a possibly significant letter that we introduced at the time, which reads as follows, and this is a letter now which was introduced as an exhibit on that occasion. It is a letter from W. L. Holland to Mr. Carter dated September 5, 1940.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the origin of that letter?

Mr. MORRIS. It was identified by Mr. Mandel as taken from the IPR files.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know the exhibit number?

Mr. MORRIS. What is the exhibit number, Mr. Mandel?

Mr. MANDEL. Exhibit No. 72.

Mr. MORRIS. I will read the letter. The significant paragraph reads as follows:

Phil is leaving tonight and is taking with him Landon's book on the Chinese in Siam and the major part of Yasuo's Industrial Japan.

It goes on to list other things that this Phil is taking with him to Japan.

Phil will be in Japan from about September 18 to October 6, and can be reached care of the Japanese IPR. Any very secret messages might be sent him care of Herbert Norman at the Canadian Legation.

We do not know who Phil is, Mr. Carter.

The CHAIRMAN. Let the record show that counsel is now reading from Exhibit 72 of the hearing of the committee.

Mr. MORRIS. We thought we would ask Mr. Carter who Phil is, in this letter that you received from Mr. Holland.

Mr. CARTER. I will be very glad, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Just tell us who Phil is, that is the question.

Senator FERGUSON. Identify him by his last name.

Mr. CARTER. Lilienthal.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the answer.

Mr. MORRIS. Do you want to say something?

Mr. CARTER. If I may. In view of the introductory remarks of Mr. Morris regarding Mr. Norman, I wish to say that the reiteration by the counsel of this committee of Dr. Wittfogel's slanderous attack on Mr. Norman is, I think, out of keeping.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the end of the answer, that is sufficient.

Senator FERGUSON. Might I inquire, Mr. Chairman, what the secret information was that you wanted to send or was being sent?

Mr. CARTER. May I answer this question?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Lilienthal was at that time research assistant to Mr. W. L. Holland, whose office that year was provided by the University of California in the offices of the Giannini Foundation, and we had a large number of research manuscripts which Mr. Lilienthal was taking to Shanghai to be printed there for two reasons, one because costs in Nationalist China for printing were very low, and second, Shanghai was a very good distribution point for the whole Pacific. Mr. Lilienthal took these manuscripts, but was to stop in Tokyo to visit the Japanese IPR.

It was a somewhat tricky situation because at that time Japan and China were at war, and the Japanese were opposed to the IPR at that time because the IPR writers usually supported actively China's resistance to Japan under Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek. There might be some necessity of communicating with Mr. Norman, but it was undesirable to involve the Chinese and the Japanese in any further controversy, and so we used, or it was proposed by Mr. Holland, that the facilities of the Canadian Legation be used.

As a matter of fact, there was no occasion for using them, and no message was sent.

Senator FERGUSON. Why did you not use our Embassy, the American Embassy?

Mr. CARTER. You would have to ask Mr. Holland that.

Senator FERGUSON. And the secret messages were these documents that were to be printed?

Mr. CARTER. No, they weren't the documents; they were simply——

Senator FERGUSON. Manuscripts to become documents?

Mr. CARTER. The manuscripts were to become documents, but it was not about those manuscripts that were to become books, it was in the case the Japanese, who were very critical of the international IPR and the American IPR at that time because they regarded the IPR as pro-Chiang Kai-shek and anti-Japanese, it was simply in case some misunderstanding of that sort came up that this precaution was taken but never exercised.

Senator FERGUSON. Now Herbert Norman.

Mr. CARTER. Yes.

Senator FERGUSON. Was he representing the IPR in Japan?

Mr. CARTER. No; he had been a research assistant in the International Secretariat sometime before, and after he had finished his Rockefeller Fellowship at Harvard he wrote one of the really great books in the IPR shelf, Japan's Emergence as a Modern State. Because of his eminence in the Japanese field, after he terminated his work with the IPR the Canadian External Affairs Ministry appointed him to their Legation in Tokyo.

Senator FERGUSON. Your only reason then for using Norman was that he was a member of the Legation?

Mr. CARTER. Two reasons. One was, he was a former member of our staff and was still interested in the institute, and his book was continuing its sale, and he was there in the Legation. Mr. Lilienthal would see him, and it was thought that it might be a convenient post-office address, but as I said, it was not used. There was no occasion to use it.

Senator WATKINS. I would like to ask a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well.

Senator WATKINS. Did not the Japanese at that time have a unit in the IPR in good standing?

Mr. CARTER. Oh, yes.

Senator WATKINS. Whatever material you sent out would be sent to them the same as to other countries that had units?

Mr. CARTER. The final product would be sent to them just as it was to all the other countries in the Pacific.

Senator WATKINS. In view of the nature of your organization, why was it necessary to have secrets?

Mr. CARTER. Because Japan and China were in a state of violent war, although I think technically it was undeclared.

Senator WATKINS. That is the only reason?

Mr. CARTER. Obviously.

Senator WATKINS. I do not think it is so obvious, otherwise I might have caught it before you gave your answer.

Mr. CARTER. It was obvious to me. I am sorry I did not make it obvious to you.

The CHAIRMAN. Any further questions?

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, we have a letter here, and while we have Mr. Carter on the stand I would like to ask him a few questions on it.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well.

Mr. MORRIS. We had testimony yesterday, day before yesterday, by Elizabeth Bentley that Israel Epstein was a Soviet agent. That was brought out in the regular course of her testimony, and she knew that from her official dealings in the Communist Party.

Now this letter concerns itself with The Unfinished Revolution in China, which was written by Israel Epstein, and this letter, which Mr. Mandel will identify, was one of the letters taken from the IPR files.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Mandel, will you identify that as a letter taken from the files of the Institute of Pacific Relations?

Mr. MANDEL. This is a letter taken from the files of the Institute of Pacific Relations dated June 12, 1947. Would you like it read?

Mr. MORRIS. May I have a copy of that, please?

I think, Mr. Chairman, if we have this read paragraph by paragraph and then I will ask Mr. Carter a few questions about it.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Mandel, will you read the first two paragraphs?

Mr. SOURWINE. Mr. Morris, if you have copies of that letter, would you give a copy to Mr. Carter?

Mr. MANDEL. This is marked "Private and confidential."

DEAR MISS FORD:

The reference is to Miss Ann Ford, publicity director, Little, Brown & Co.—

This is to acknowledge Epstein's The Unfinished Revolution in China, which you so kindly sent me a few days ago. I have already read two-thirds of it and hope to complete it within a few days.

I think it's of the utmost importance that you devise some means of getting it read at an early date among others by Secretary of State George Marshall, Senators Vandenberg, Morse, and Ives; John Foster Dulles and John Carter Vincent of the State Department. You will know better than I how to make certain that they read it in the near future. A letter from me on the subject might lead a few of them to think that I was recommending it because I was an admirer of Epstein's and for that reason they might slightly discount my recommendation.

I have another suggestion to make. The book is so full of profound understanding and admiration of the Chinese people that I think it is equally important to find ways and means of getting a wide circulation in China. Have you thought of a Chinese edition? In the past there has been a tendency for Shanghai publishers to get out pirated editions in English. This would be all to the good if the printing was done accurately and the full text was reprinted. Sometimes, for mercenary reasons, they make substantial cuts.

Mr. MORRIS. That is enough for the time being. Why were you so interested, Mr. Carter, to have the leaders, the heads of our State Department, John Foster Dulles, John Carter Vincent, and Secretary of State George Marshall, read The Unfinished Revolution in China by Israel Epstein?

Mr. CARTER. And Senators Vandenberg, Morse, and Ives. It struck me as a human document by a man who had been long in China and seemed to me to have a rather broad and deep knowledge of things Chinese and the Chinese people.

Mr. MORRIS. Did you not know that Israel Epstein was a Soviet agent?

Mr. CARTER. I did not.

Mr. MORRIS. Did you recognize the book as a Communist publication?

Mr. CARTER. I did not. I would hardly have sent it to as astute and wise and patriotic men as this list if I had thought that it was Communist propaganda.

Mr. MORRIS. Is it your testimony that you never knew Israel Epstein was a Communist?

Mr. CARTER. At that time.

Mr. MORRIS. Or a special pleader for the Communists?

Mr. CARTER. No.

The CHAIRMAN. The question was, Did you know him to be?

Mr. CARTER. I did not know him to be a Communist on June 12, 1947.

Senator FERGUSON. Have you changed your mind since then as to whether or not he was?

The CHAIRMAN. I think you could answer that question "Yes" or "No" and then make your explanation. It would save time, Mr. Carter, if you do that.

Mr. CARTER. I am terribly sorry, Senator McCarran, but this is one of the things that you can't say "Yes" or "No."

The CHAIRMAN. Read the question and see whether you can answer "Yes" or "No."

Senator FERGUSON. Let me put the question again. Have you changed your mind as to Epstein being or ever having been a Communist?

Mr. CARTER. I have reconsidered and have not reached a final conclusion.

Senator FERGUSON. You are now in doubt?

Mr. CARTER. Yes.

Senator FERGUSON. All right. You are familiar with this book, are you not, The Unfinished Revolution in China?

Mr. CARTER. I haven't read it for a long time.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, I would like to have the clerk of the committee put some of these paragraphs in here, but I do not want to delay this examination this morning.

The CHAIRMAN. If you will designate, Senator.

Senator FERGUSON. I will have them designated and see that they go in the record here, and I will have a copy of that furnished to you and then ask you, and get an answer later, about what you think in the light of your reconsideration.

Mr. CARTER. Thank you.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

Mr. SOURWINE. Might I ask one question, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. SOURWINE. The witness has made a statement that on June 12, 1947, he did not know Mr. Epstein to be a Communist?

Mr. CARTER. Yes.

Mr. SOURWINE. So that we might have a comprehensive answer on that point, Mr. Carter, did you on June 12, 1947, know Mr. Epstein ever to have been a Communist or ever to have worked for the Communists?

Mr. CARTER. I did not.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Mandel, I wonder if you would read the next to the last paragraph in the letter—that is, the next to the last in the P. S.

Mr. MANDEL (reading):

P. S.—Of course, many will say that Epstein is a special pleader. I think this is probably true, but I think he is pleading for a more sound analysis of the world than many of the other current special pleaders. I hear that the New York Times has asked Owen Lattimore to review the book. I hope other publications will make as wise a choice.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Carter, what did you mean there, that Epstein was a special pleader?

Mr. CARTER. He was pleading for the Chinese people.

Mr. MORRIS. That is your interpretation of the expression "many will say that Epstein is a special pleader"?

Mr. CARTER. Yes.

Senator FERGUSON. He was pleading also for a new kind of world, was he not? Do you not say that?

The CHAIRMAN. It is the P. S., I think.

Mr. MORRIS. He has it, I believe.

Mr. CARTER. He is "pleading for a more sound analysis of the world than many of the other current special pleaders."

Senator FERGUSON. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. In other words, Mr. Epstein was there pleading for what you thought was a sound analysis of the world?

Mr. CARTER. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. In view of the fact that we had Israel Epstein identified as a Soviet agent as of that time, does it surprise you about your own opinions of the world situation at that time?

Mr. CARTER. Not completely because some of the identifications alleged in this room haven't convinced me of their authenticity.

Mr. MORRIS. Is it your testimony then that you do not believe that Israel Epstein was a Soviet agent at that time?

Mr. CARTER. I had no knowledge at that time that he was a Soviet agent, and I do not know today whether he was or was not.

Senator FERGUSON. I want to read one paragraph here about you saying that he was a special pleader for a new kind of world and ask you whether it was this kind of world that you were talking about. This is page 411.

The only point in this formulation with which a student in political science might quarrel was the phrase "Communistic form of government." Communism is not a form of government but an economic society.

Now, is that what you were talking about, that he was a special pleader for that?

Mr. CARTER. Well, not having read the book for some time and being confronted with a few sentences out of a big book——

Senator FERGUSON. I appreciate that.

Mr. CARTER. At the moment I don't feel that I would help the committee at all by making an answer. I would be very glad to study it and send you in writing my reaction and my answer to your question.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, you were saying that he was a special pleader for a particular form of government or kind.

Mr. CARTER. Yes.

Senator FERGUSON. Do you not think that Epstein was advocating communism in this book?

Mr. CARTER. I don't want to be difficult, but I would like to read the book unhurriedly.

Senator FERGUSON. I will ask you questions later on it then.

Mr. CARTER. All right.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, there was reference there to—

I hear that the New York Times has asked Owen Lattimore to review the book. I hope other publications will make as wise a choice.

I think it would be appropriate to make excerpts from Mr. Lattimore's review, which appeared in the New York Times.

Senator FERGUSON. First, I would like to ask Mr. Carter the question, Did you think that Owen Lattimore would give the same kind of review of this book as you had in mind, a new form of government that was appropriate?

Mr. CARTER. I can't remember what I had in mind. I did regard and still regard Owen Lattimore as very acknowledgeable about China, and this was a book by a man who knew a great deal about China. Whether I had in mind any particular emphasis on this or that point in the book I can't for the life of me remember this morning.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, you were all for the book?

Mr. CARTER. I thought it was a good book, and that it should have wide circulation, and that it should come to the attention of our most thoughtful Americans.

Senator FERGUSON. And you felt that if Owen Lattimore reviewed this book he would take the same slant on it as you have taken?

Mr. CARTER. Well, I thought he probably would see that it was a useful book.

Senator FERGUSON. Yes. You anticipated that he would follow the same thinking on it as you had?

Mr. CARTER. No.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, you say "I hope other publications will make as wise a choice."

Mr. CARTER. I thought he was a qualified reviewer, and I hoped that other papers would get equally qualified reviewers.

Senator FERGUSON. And you anticipated that he would recommend it?

Mr. CARTER. I thought it was likely.

Senator WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I have a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Smith, I think, wanted to ask a question.

Senator SMITH. I was wondering if Mr. Carter would read the last paragraph on sheet 2 and tell us what he meant by that.

The CHAIRMAN. Will you kindly read that, Mr. Carter?

Senator SMITH. Out loud.

Mr. CARTER (reading):

I imagine the Kuomintang government will put the book on the "forbidden" list for import in China. I would hope that you could get it into the hands of Ambassador Leighton Stuart and some of the American correspondents like Benjamin Welles—

That is the son of Sumner Welles—

Christopher Rand and Arch Steele, Sun Fo, Madame Sun Yat-sen and a few others, before the bronze curtain falls.

Senator SMITH. What did you mean by that paragraph, Mr. Carter?

Mr. CARTER. I thought that it certainly should be in the hands of our Ambassador, Leighton Stuart, who has a lifelong knowledge of China, some of our principal American correspondents, and Sun Fo, who was a member of the Chiang Kai-shek cabinet, Madame Sun Yat-sen, who was a member of the Soong family, and others.

It seemed to me that I was suggesting that this book come to the attention of first, correspondents from the Times and Tribune and other American papers.

Senator SMITH. When you put in quotation marks "forbidden list," what did you mean by that?

Mr. CARTER. I knew at that time that the war-weariness following the war, the difficulty of reorganizing China at that time after the devastation of the Japanese and so forth, that some agencies of the Nationalist Government were very sensitive to any criticism of the regime and that they might, that some bureaucrats might, put this on a forbidden list.

Senator SMITH. You regard this book as inimical to the Nationalist interests then?

Mr. CARTER. No, I though it could be very useful to the Nationalist Government, but I thought that some of the less intelligent bureaucrats in the Nationalist Government might think it was hostile.

Senator SMITH. Do you not think it was hostile to the Nationalist Government?

Mr. CARTER. On what point?

Senator SMITH. The book.

Mr. CARTER. I think I said I would comment after I had read the book. But I think it was critical of certain features in the Nationalist Government, features that our own Ambassador, Leighton Stuart, was aware of and constantly labored in private with Chiang Kai-shek to reform.

Senator SMITH. Do you not regard the book as being one that would add to the blame, so to speak, of the Nationalist cause and encourage the Communists?

Mr. CARTER. I did not so regard it.

Mr. MORRIS. Did you not regard it as an open espousal of the Communist cause?

Mr. CARTER. I did not.

Mr. MORRIS. How can you reconcile the fact that Israel Epstein in your opinion was a special pleader for Communist China? It was your testimony that he was a special pleader for the Chinese.

Mr. CARTER. I felt that Leighton Stuart was a special pleader for the Chinese.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not the question.

Mr. MORRIS. In view of your testimony when you discussed the idea of Israel Epstein being a special pleader, you felt he was a special pleader on the part of Communist China?

Mr. CARTER. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. How can you reconcile this paragraph which Senator Smith has been just examining you on where you say that the book would probably be put on the forbidden list by China?

Mr. CARTER. Put on the forbidden list, as I said, by some bureaucrat.

Mr. MORRIS. By the Chinese Government? Obviously it is an official list you are talking about?

Mr. CARTER. The dichotomy in the various bureaus of the Chinese Government, or multichotomy, were such that, as in some other governments, one section of the government doesn't know what the other section's right hand and left hand is doing.

Senator WATKINS. Modeled after our own?

Mr. CARTER. I wouldn't make that aspersion.

Mr. MORRIS. I would like an answer, Mr. Chairman, to my question whether this book was an open espousal of the Communist Chinese cause.

Senator FERGUSON. I would like to ask a question. You at least thought, Mr. Carter, that this book was more favorable to the Communist element in China than it was to the then existing Nationalist Government?

Mr. CARTER. I wouldn't affirm that without reading the book again.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, you wanted to get it to Madame Sun Yat-sen?

Mr. CARTER. Yes, and Sun Fo, members of the Cabinet.

Senator FERGUSON. But Madame Sun Yat-sen, you wanted to get it to her?

Mr. CARTER. Yes.

Senator FERGUSON. She was more favorable to the Communist side at that time?

Mr. CARTER. She was very keen on the united front.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, the united front meant to some of those people victory for the Communists, did it not?

Mr. CARTER. I suppose it did to the Communists.

Senator FERGUSON. Yes. Now was she not favorable to the Communist side?

Mr. CARTER. She is apparently living now under Communist rule. I don't know whether she is having a good time or bad time.

Mr. MORRIS. She is an official of the Government, is she not?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes. Have you any doubt that she is sympathetic to the Communist Government?

Mr. CARTER. Pretty nearly everyone—the Chinese Communist Government, the Communist Government of China, contains hundreds, thousands of former Chiang Kai-shek officials.

Senator FERGUSON. But that does not say that they are not Communists?

Mr. CARTER. They may or may not be.

Senator FERGUSON. Do you think the present Chinese Government in China proper is not a Communist Government?

Mr. CARTER. The leaders are Communists and are following definitely an out-and-out Communist line, but there are employed in high positions in that Communist Government a great many Chinese who were loyal supporters of Chiang Kai-shek and the National regime. Which category Madame Sun Yat-sen is in today I don't know. I have read a great many attacks saying that she has gone over hook, bait, and sinker to the Communist cause.

I have heard other statements that she is very critical of many of the features of the Communist regime and not having been on the spot I am not able to reach any balance.

Senator FERGUSON. You do not want to say then that this book was more favorable to the Communist side of the Government, of the people in China, that were represented?

Mr. CARTER. Not until I have read it.

Senator FERGUSON. But not withstanding this statement that you were fearful that it was going on the forbidden list and would be kept out?

Mr. CARTER. As I said, there were cliques, there are opposition groups, within the Kuomintang government, and as the Senator hinted, as there exists elsewhere.

Senator WATKINS. I was referring to the fact that you said one group would not know what the other group was doing. I thought that perhaps you meant they were following what our people were doing.

Mr. CARTER. Yes.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you find Owen Lattimore more sympathetic to the Communist China side than to the Kuomintang side?

Mr. CARTER. I did not.

Senator FERGUSON. But you thought he was a wise choice to review this kind of a book?

Mr. CARTER. I did.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have Mr. Mandel read excerpts from this review by Owen Lattimore, which has been referred to in testimony.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well.

Mr. MANDEL. This review is taken from the New York Times book review section, June 22, 1947, pages 5 and 29. I will read excerpts:

* * * From Edgar Snow's Red Star Over China to Theodore White and Annalee Jacoby's Thunder Out of China the list of names is distinguished—and most of these writers won their distinction solely or primarily by what they had to say about China. Israel Epstein has without question established a place for himself in that distinguished company * * *.

* * * The writers either throw their weight into criticism of the Kuomintang, like Mr. White and Mr. Jacoby, or into outspoken support of the Chinese Communists, like Mr. Epstein * * *.

There is no question about Mr. Epstein's partisanship. He not only justifies Chinese Communist policy but he justifies it and Russian policy in relation to each other and in relation to American policy. * * * Mr. Epstein has presented enough facts for this reviewer, at least, to form an opinion.

The CHAIRMAN. Who wrote that?

Mr. MORRIS. Owen Lattimore.

Senator FERGUSON. Did that disappoint you when you said that you hoped other publications would make as wise a choice?

Mr. CARTER. This was written over 4 years ago.

Senator FERGUSON. Do you recall now that Lattimore said that about the book?

Mr. CARTER. I don't. I am very glad to see it and discover that Lattimore was writing frankly and honestly about the book.

Senator FERGUSON. Now your opinion of Lattimore, does that bring you to the conclusion that this book was more favorable to the Communists than to the non-Communists?

Mr. CARTER. It does; certainly.

Senator FERGUSON. No doubt about it?

Mr. CARTER. No.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Smith?

Senator SMITH. Your letter of June 12, 1947, is the one that had the paragraph that I directed your attention to just now. I notice this review was published in the New York Times June 22, 1947, 10 days after you wrote the letter?

Mr. CARTER. Yes.

Senator SMITH. Had you seen Lattimore's review that was going to be published at the time you wrote your letter of the 12th?

Mr. CARTER. No; I hadn't seen it. Well, I don't remember. I think it's unlikely, but I can't swear to it. Mr. Morris might bring up something.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Carter, are you now going to change your testimony, namely, that you did not recognize that to be an open espousal of the Chinese Communist cause on further thought?

Mr. CARTER. I am afraid, Mr. Chairman, that on piecemeal quotations I would like to read the book.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Are you going to change your mind?

Mr. MORRIS. I have two other reviews that I think are appropriate.

Senator FERGUSON. You agreed with this opinion of Lattimore? You usually agreed with Lattimore's opinion on China; did you not?

Mr. CARTER. Usually, not invariably.

Senator FERGUSON. Are you now in conflict with this opinion? Does this not refresh your memory?

Mr. CARTER. Well, it tells me what Lattimore's reaction to the book was.

Senator FERGUSON. You never got that reaction?

Mr. CARTER. I can't remember. I am not trying to stall.

Senator FERGUSON. Does it not seem strange to you now, not having to use hindsight, that you would recommend a book to George Marshall, Senator Vandenberg, my distinguished colleague, and others mentioned in this article, that Owen Lattimore talked of in this language? Does that not now seem strange to you?

Mr. CARTER. Well, I have such high respect for the intellectual ability and integrity of all those men that I must have thought they would make up their own minds.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you want to get this side at least to them, the Communist side?

Mr. CARTER. I had no desire to do that.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, how do you reconcile that with Lattimore's judgment that you respect so much, on China if this was not a Communist propaganda book?

Mr. CARTER. Of course, I have to let you do the reconciling.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, did you ever know a Communist to do some writing that he did not infiltrate his writings with Communist propaganda? You have been a great reader and a student. Have you ever known a Communist to write and not infiltrate his writing with Communist propaganda?

Mr. CARTER. I have read translations of Soviet Russia, presumably Communist scientists on fish, on forests, on cattle breeding, where I could never discover a Communist line. That is my answer.

Senator FERGUSON. Let us get a little closer. I will change my question a little. You did answer that, I think, by some avoidance when you got to fish and cattle. Let us go into the political field.

Have you ever known a Communist writer to not infiltrate his political writings with Communist propaganda?

Mr. CARTER. I think it's their usual pattern.

Senator FERGUSON. Yes. Not only usual.

Mr. CARTER. Invariably, you would say?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Mandel, I wonder——

Senator FERGUSON. Do you want that answer to stand about the fish now, or do you want to strike it out?

Mr. CARTER. No; I would leave it in. Put reindeer in also.

Senator FERGUSON. I still think the Commies have a line on the fish question.

Mr. CARTER. The Japanese think so.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Mandel, would you read excerpts from two other reviews of the same book?

Mr. MANDEL. I read excerpts from a review by Frederick V. Field appearing in the New Masses for July 22, 1947, on pages 20 and 21. The New Masses is a Communist magazine.

> The main subject of the Unfinished Revolution in China is the history, first, of China's war of resistance against Japan, and second of the struggle of the Chinese people against the Kuomintang dictatorship and American imperialism. * * *

Then we find further down the following:

> * * * During the war against Japan it was in those parts of China where the people were moved to organize themselves by Communist leadership that resistance was successful and that Chinese history spurted forward. * * *

The next is a quotation from the Daily Worker of June 18, 1947, a review of the same book by Samuel Sillen.

> We have had many excellent books about China in the past few years, books by topflight reporters like Harrison Forman, Gunther Stein, Agnes Smedley, Theodore White, and Annalee Jacoby. At the top of this list belongs a book published today, Israel Epstein's Unfinished Revolution in China.

Mr. MORRIS. Had you read either of those reviews, Mr. Carter?

Mr. CARTER. I don't subscribe to either the New Masses or the Daily Worker. I see them occasionally on subway stands.

Mr. MORRIS. Do you recognize now that the three reviews are very much similar, in fact, Sillen's analysis of the thing, talking about the distinguished company, almost coincides completely with Lattimore's?

Mr. CARTER. Well, not quite; Lattimore does not mention Smedley, Guenther Stein, or Harrison Forman.

Mr. MORRIS. He mentioned Edgar Snow's Red Star Over China, and Ted White and Annalee Jacoby's Thunder Out of China, and says:

> Israel Epstein has without question established a place for himself in that distinguished company.

Mr. CARTER. Is that from the Daily Worker?

Mr. MORRIS. No; that is from the review by Lattimore.

Senator FERGUSON. Was that distinguished company?

Mr. CARTER. Lattimore thought so. You will have to ask him.

Senator SMITH. Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Smith.

Senator SMITH. Mr. Carter, with respect to the thing by Field, published in the New Masses 10 days after your letter, had you seen Mr. Field's review at the time you wrote your letter?

Mr. CARTER. No.

Senator SMITH. Were not you and Mr. Field working very closely at that time, June 1947?

Mr. MORRIS. He was a member of your executive committee, was he not, Mr. Carter?

Mr. CARTER. I have forgotten the exact date. Perhaps you could refresh my memory as to when he resigned from the board's executive committee. He had a long time previously resigned as a member of the staff, and when he resigned as a member of the staff my weekly or monthly or daily contact with him ceased. He was working on other things mostly.

Senator SMITH. Did you subscribe to what Field said in his review?

Mr. CARTER. I don't remember seeing it until this morning. Which particular point?

Senator FERGUSON. About the American imperialism.

Senator SMITH (reading):

that their foreign oppressors are today primarily American imperialists——

Mr. CARTER. That was the usual Communist line all over the world, that the people of the United States of America were imperialists if we had taken over the job from the French, and so forth.

Senator SMITH. This was a review of that book?

Mr. CARTER. Yes.

Senator SMITH. Is this one of the reasons why you wanted this book to be distributed in China to slant the people further in favor of the Communists?

Mr. CARTER. What I was concerned about, Senator, was that the most intelligent people in this country could get an understanding of various points of view and stresses in China. I felt that unless the Kuomintang cleaned house economically, administratively, militarily, the Communists were bound to take over, and I hoped that public opinion in this country could be so informed that before it was too late Chiang Kai-shek and the better elements in the Nationalist Government could listen to our Ambassador Leighton Stuart, listen to others, clean house, and prevent the Communists from taking over China.

Senator SMITH. But your paragraph here was referring to getting the book circulated in China.

Mr. CARTER. Well, my focus first of all with the American edition was to get it circulated in the United States. A second suggestion was that there be a Chinese edition in the hope that it would reach as many Chinese as possible who were in a position to aid in the reform of the Kuomintang and shoring it up and making it so democratic, so efficient, that the Chinese Communists would have nothing to offer and that Chiang and the better element around him would remain in China. And we now know he is not in China but is in Formosa.

Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Carter, did you then think that the way to change the Chiang Kai-shek government was to espouse the cause of communism?

Mr. CARTER. No.

Senator FERGUSON. Is not that just what this book did? Is that not exactly what the book did?

Mr. CARTER. If that is your opinion.

Senator FERGUSON. I take these men who wrote about it. Is that not what they say it did?

Mr. CARTER. It certainly looks like it.

Senator FERGUSON. You read it before you recommended it?

Mr. CARTER. I read the book, I think, in manuscript or galley proof.

Senator FERGUSON. Yes. Do you now think that that was the way to change the Government of China, was to advocate the Communists?

Mr. CARTER. I did not; I just said that I thought we were playing for time as a chance that Chiang, with American aid, could save the situation and stop the Communist avalanche.

Senator FERGUSON. All right. Do you know of any other books of similar nature that you recommended to our Secretary of State and those that were in the Far Eastern Division or people in Congress that had something to say in relation to foreign policy that was similar to the Epstein book?

Mr. CARTER. It was our practice to send to appropriate officers of our Government copies of all our publications. Of course, they automatically went to the Library of Congress, they went to those few people in Congress who were members of IPR, the Far Eastern Division, the Secretary of State's Office, and so on.

Senator FERGUSON. It was your purpose to influence public opinion in America in the Far East?

Mr. CARTER. It was our purpose to provide facts and diverse opinion so that the public could make up its own mind. Mr. Root, Mr. Hughes, many of our Secretaries of State have said that the Government has great difficulty in acting intelligently because of the lack of an informed public opinion. So far as the Pacific was concerned we conceived our role to get the facts, to provide a variety of opinions, analyses from all sorts of points of view so that the public, the Government, press, and business could make up its own mind.

Senator FERGUSON. You did hope, however, that it would follow the suggestions that you were making?

Mr. CARTER. The institute as such didn't make suggestions on policy at all.

Senator FERGUSON. You were hoping that this book, the Unfinished Revolution in China, would influence American public opinion?

Mr. CARTER. We thought it should be; I thought it should be considered.

Mr. MORRIS. When you say "we" who do you mean, Mr. Carter? Mr. Lattimore?

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Larrimore was not on the staff of Pacific Affairs at that time. I meant my colleagues on the staff. I wish now to speak for myself. I hoped that this and other books would aid because I think you remember, Senator McCarran, always throughout our history we have concentrated on Europe. We teach French, Italian, German, and Spanish. It is only recently that we have taught Chinese and Japanese. We wanted the public to have ample data on the Far East.

The CHAIRMAN. So for that reason you wanted a Communist doctrine spread in this country; is that right?

Mr. CARTER. No.

Senator FERGUSON. Why did you mark this "private and confidential" when you wanted so many people to know about it?

Mr. CARTER. Well, I was writing to a publisher, Little, Brown & Co. in Boston using the names of eminent people whom I had not consulted. I had not consulted Senator Vandenberg or General Marshall. I simply said, "You may wish to get this book into the hands of these people."

Senator FERGUSON. Was the reason that you wanted this private and confidential that you were saying that this book would be forbidden in your opinion in Nationalist China?

Mr. CARTER. It could be.

Senator FERGUSON. That would be a reason for keeping this confidential?

Mr. CARTER. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, without laboring this point too long I would like three more paragraphs read into the record at this time. Would you read the first three paragraphs in the P. S.?

The CHAIRMAN. Of what?

Mr. MORRIS. From the letter of Mr. Carter to Miss Ford.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

Mr. MANDEL (reading):

I have not consulted Epstein with reference to this letter. I hope, however, that it may meet with his approval and elicit further concrete suggestions from him. To that end I am taking the liberty of sending him privately a copy.

P. S. 2.—Referring to General Marshall, I wish you could find someone who could get him to read the book from start to finish and not simply the end with Epstein's analysis of Marshall. It seems to me he would need the cumulative effect of the preceding chapters to make him reassess objectively his own role.

I assume that John Carter Vincent would read the book with a very open mind. Probably he is generally acquainted with most of the material, but he has probably never seen it organized so logically. If he were sold on the book he might persuade General Marshall to read it from cover to cover.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Carter, why were you so anxious that John Carter Vincent read the book?

Mr. CARTER. Wasn't he Chief of the Far Eastern Division of the State Department at that time?

Mr. MORRIS. As such did he have access to General Marshall?

Mr. CARTER. Well, through, I suppose, the Under Secretary of State. I never knew whether he went directly to General Marshall or not.

Mr. MORRIS. Why do you say here—

If he were sold on the book he might persuade General Marshall to read it from cover to cover.

Mr. CARTER. John Carter Vincent's official duty at the that time was to handle the China administration of the State Department, and he would probably be regarded in a formal organization of the Department by General Marshall as one of the far eastern experts.

The CHAIRMAN. And you thought that this book would be a good book for General Marshall to be guided by naturally?

Mr. CARTER. I thought it would be a good thing for him to read.

Mr. MORRIS. What did you mean when you said, Mr. Carter:

I assume that John Carter Vincent would read the book with a very open mind. Probably he is generally acquainted with most of the material, but he has probably never seen it organized so logically.

What did you mean by that, Mr. Carter?

Mr. CARTER. I thought John Carter Vincent was very open-minded, I still do, and I thought that there would be very little material that was in it new to him.

Mr. MORRIS. Why do you say that, Mr. Carter?

Mr. CARTER. Because his whole machinery of the State Department, War, Navy, Treasury, Agriculture, the data, the intelligence, of that whole area came automatically to him and his colleagues.

Mr. MORRIS. Including Communist doctrine?

Mr. CARTER. Well, the State Department's job was to find out what was going on, whether the people who were operating were friends or foes. Their duty was to study Communist China. They sent people to study. Any government that is on its job has its intelligence officers going into what is called enemy territory and our Government apparently did.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Carter, did you ever consider John Carter Vincent to be a Communist?

Mr. CARTER. No.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have these two documents received as the next consecutive exhibits.

The CHAIRMAN. They will be received.

EXHIBIT No. 116

JUNE 12, 1947.

Private and confidential.

Miss ANNE FORD,

Publicity Director, Little, Brown & Co., Boston, Mass.

DEAR MISS FORD: This is to acknowledge Epstein's The Unfinished Revolution in China, which you so kindly sent me a few days ago. I have already read two-thirds of it and hope to complete it within a few days.

I think it's of the utmost importance that you devise some means of getting it read at an early date among others by Secretary of State George Marshall, Senators Vandenberg, Morse, and Ives, John Foster Dulles and John Carter Vincent of the State Department. You will know better than I how to make certain that they read it in the near future. A letter from me on the subject might lead a few of them to think that I was recommending it because I was an admirer of Epstein's and for that reason they might slightly discount my recommendation.

I have another suggestion to make. The book is so full of profound understanding and admiration of the Chinese people that I think it is equally important to find ways and means of getting a wide circulation in China. Have you thought of a Chinese edition? In the past there has been a tendency for Shanghai publishers to get out pirated editions in English. This would be all to the good if the printing was done accurately and the full text was reprinted. Sometimes, for mercenary reasons, they make substantial cuts.

Would it be out of the question for you to consider at an early date printing a cheap paper cover edition for maximum circulation in India, the Philippines and China with the expectation that some orders would come in from Indochina, Siam, Burma, and the Netherlands East Indies?

The book combines in one volume several books. It is a penetrating history of China during the war years. It is a sociological document of importance, and it is a military handbook that might have been of enormous value to the Maquis in France and even to the little handful of anti-Hitler Germans in Germany. It might become a military and political handbook for Viet-Nam and in other Asiastic areas if the imperialist powers try to reassert their pre-Pearl Harbor domination.

The book is not so much needed in the Communist areas in China as it is in the Kuomintang areas where its authoritative accounts would give new hope, as well as new methods, to the millions of Chinese who are dissatisfied with the right wing Kuomintang domination. You have only to read the newspapers to discover what a large potential market for Epstein's book there is amongst non-Communist professors and students in the Chinese universities. The history of the last few decades proves conclusively that the Chinese student movements are far more influential in China than in many other countries in starting new and creative political and social movements.

More than at any other time in recent years, there is a large British public both in the United Kingdom, Canada, and also in Australia and New Zealand which would find the book illuminating, not only with reference to China, but in their thinking with reference to a great many movements in the continent of Europe and elsewhere.

I congratulate Little, Brown & Co.'s unerring wisdom in deciding, not only to publish this book, but in leaving no stone unturned in getting a very wide circulation.

Sincerely yours,

EDWARD C. CARTER.

P. S.—I have not consulted Epstein with reference to this letter. I hope, however, that it may meet with his approval and elicit further concrete suggestions from him. To that end I am taking the liberty of sending him privately a copy.

P. S. 2.—Referring to General Marshall, I wish you could find someone who would get him to read the book from start to finish and not simply the end with Epstein's analysis of Marshall. It seems to me he would need the cumulative effect of the preceding chapters to make him reassess objectively his own role.

I assume that John Carter Vincent would read the book with a very open mind. Probably he is generally acquainted with most of the material, but he has probably never seen it organized so logically. If he were sold on the book he might persuade General Marshall to read it from cover to cover.

Of course, many will say that Epstein is a special pleader. I think this is probably true, but I think he is pleading for a more sound analysis of the world than many of the other current special pleaders. I hear that the New York Times has asked Owen Lattimore to review the book. I hope other publications will make as wise a choice.

I imagine the Kuomintang government will put the book on the "forbidden" list for import in China. I would hope that you could get it into the hands of Ambassador Leighton Stuart and some of the American correspondents like Benjamin Welles, Christopher Rand and Arch Steele, Sun Fo, Madame Sun Yat-sen and a few others, before the bronze curtain falls.

EXHIBIT No. 117

REVIEWS OF THE UNFINISHED REVOLUTION IN CHINA, BY ISRAEL EPSTEIN, BOSTON, MASS., LITTLE, BROWN & CO.

(By Owen Lattimore, New York Times, Book Review, June 22, 1947, pp. 5 and 29):

* * * From Edgar Snow's Red Star Over China to Theodore White and Annalee Jacoby's Thunder Out of China the list of names is distinguished—and most of these writers won their distinction solely or primarily by what they had to say about China. Israel Epstein has without question established a place for himself in that distinguished company. * * *

* * * The writers either throw their weight into criticism of the Kuomintang, like Mr. White and Mr. Jacoby, or into outspoken support of the Chinese Communists, like Mr. Epstein * * *

There is no question about Mr. Epstein's partisanship. He not only justifies Chinese Communist policy but he justifies it and Russian policy in relation to each other and in relation to American policy. * * * Mr. Epstein has presented enough facts for this reviewer, at least, to form an opinion.

He convinces me that the trend of the civil war in China is not toward the triumph of an ideology or the winning of dictatorial power by individual generals or politicians. * * *

(By Frederick V. Field, New Masses, July 22, 1947, pp. 20–21):

* * * The people of China have arisen against both their native and foreign oppressors and because it happens that their foreign oppressors are today primarily American imperialists the story of this great historical event is especially pertinent to the political life of the American people.

There is no other book that so faithfully or expertly records this momentous turning point in history as Epstein's * * *

What distinguishes Epstein's work from the notable contributions of the others is, first, that his is more comprehensive both at the contemporary and historical levels, and second, the amazing wealth of detail which he has assembled. * * *

The main subject of The Unfinished Revolution In China is the history, first, of China's war of resistance against Japan, and second of the struggle of the Chinese people against the Kuomintang dictatorship and American imperialism. * * * He writes about the American missionary who sold out to the would-be emperor Yuan Shih-Kai and the reader recognizes the present Congressman who now parallels his infamous role.

* * * During the war against Japan it was in those parts of China where the people were moved to organize themselves by Communist leadership that resistance was successful and that Chinese history spurted forward. * * *

The Unfinished Revolution In China deserves to be widely read.

(By Samuel Sillen, Daily Worker, June 18, 1947, p. 11):

We have had many excellent books about China in the past few years—books by topflight reporters like Harrison Forman, Gunther Stein, Agnes Smedley, Theodore White, and Annalee Jacoby. At the top of this list belongs a book published today, Israel Epstein's Unfinished Revolution In China.

Mr. MORRIS. I think, Mr. Chairman, that that is all we want on this particular point at this time.

Mr. CARTER. Thank you, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. That is all.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, will you call Mr. Canning?

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Canning, will you come forward, please?

Will you raise your right hand? You do solemnly swear in the testimony that you are about to give before the Subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary of the United States Senate, it will be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, so help you God?

Mr. CANNING. I do.

TESTIMONY OF WILLIAM MARTIN CANNING, CINCINNATI, OHIO

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Canning, will you give your name and address to the stenographer, please?

Mr. CANNING. William Martin Canning, 789 North Crescent Avenue, Cincinnati, Ohio.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Canning, will you tell us your most recent employment?

Mr. CANNING. I was until recently on the staff of Xavier University of Cincinnati.

Mr. MORRIS. You are a graduate of what college?

Mr. CANNING. College of the City of New York.

Mr. MORRIS. Do you have a graduate degree?

Mr. CANNING. Yes, I have a master's degree from Columbia.

Mr. MORRIS. In what year did you obtain that, Mr. Canning?

Mr. CANNING. 1936.

Mr. MORRIS. Now, Mr. Canning, did you ever join the Communist Party?

Mr. CANNING. I did.

Mr. MORRIS. When did you join the Communist Party?

Mr. CANNING. In the early part of 1936 I joined the Communist Party unit at the City College.

Mr. MORRIS. And how long did you remain a member of the Communist Party?

Mr. CANNING. A little over 2 years, until the latter part of 1938.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Canning, during that period were you ever in a position that you were able to discern people in the Communist movement and learn of their identity?

Mr. CANNING. Yes. I, of course, was active in the City College unit and as a student at Columbia I knew others there at Columbia who belonged to other units of the Communist Party.

Mr. MORRIS. What was your position in the Communist fraction there, Mr. Canning.

Mr. CANNING. At City College?

Mr. MORRIS. Yes.

Mr. CANNING. Well, I had various positions at one time or another. I assisted in the editing of a secret publication distributed among the staff, the City College Teacher-Worker. I was also literature director for another period.

Mr. MORRIS. I wonder generally, Mr. Canning, could you give us an idea of how many members of the City College faculty were in the Communist Party?

Mr. CANNING. Somewhere between 40 and 50. I have forgotten that now.

Senator FERGUSON. Out of a total number of how many?

Mr. CANNING. The total staff?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes.

Mr. CANNING. The total staff consisted perhaps of 300, at least 300.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Canning, you also had occasion to know who some of the people on the Columbia faculty were who were members of the Communist Party?

Mr. CANNING. Not so much on the faculty, but I did know graduate students who were members of the Columbia unit.

Senator FERGUSON. Did the schools have separate cells?

Mr. CANNING. That is right; yes.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of calling Mr. Canning here today is to ask him to identify some of these people that he encountered in City College and at Columbia whose affairs have come into the Institute of Pacific relations, and we are going to discuss that.

First, of all, Mr. Canning, did you know a man named Lawrence Rosinger?

Mr. CANNING. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you tell us what you know about him?

Mr. CANNING. I knew Lawrence Rosinger while he was a student at City College and subsequently when he continued on at Columbia in graduate work. I knew Lawrence Rosinger to be a member of the Columbia University unit of the Communist Party.

Mr. MORRIS. Is there any doubt in your mind whatever that Mr. Rosinger was a member of the Communist Party?

Mr. CANNING. No.

Mr. MORRIS. On how many occasions did you meet him?

Mr. CANNING. Quite frequently.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you estimate it as much as possible?

Mr. CANNING. I would meet him at Columbia several times a week during 1936 and 1937, in that period.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Mandel, I wonder if you would introduce into the record at this time evidence of Rosinger's activities within the Institute of Pacific Relations.

Senator FERGUSON. I would just like to ask a question. Did you discuss communism with Rosinger?

Mr. CANNING. I did; yes.

Senator FERGUSON. And you feel certain that he was a member of the Columbia unit?

Mr. CANNING. There is no doubt in my mind.

Senator FERGUSON. No doubt?

Mr. CANNING. No.

The CHAIRMAN. All right, Mr. Mandel.

Mr. MANDEL. These excerpts have been taken from the official publications of the Institute of Pacific Relations and from books written by Mr. Rosinger and I read some of these excerpts.

Author of China's Wartime Politics, 1937—44, Princeton University Press in cooperation with the International Secretariat of the IPR, published in 1944.

On the jacket of Mr. Rosinger's book entitled "State of Asia," and this book is issued under the auspices of the Institute of Pacific Relations in 1951, I quote:

Lawrence K. Rosinger has covered far-eastern events as a member of the research staffs of the American Institute of Pacific Relations. His books include China's Wartime Politics, 1937–44—and so forth.

He is listed as a member of a meeting staff and round table recorder in a volume entitled "Problems of the Pacific, 1939, Proceedings of the Study Meeting of the Institute of Pacific Relations, Seventh Conference, Virginia Beach, Va., November 18, December 2, 1939," page 275.

He is listed as a conference member of other conferences in 1939 and in 1949. The one held in New Delhi, India, was in 1949.

Then his writings in the official publications of the Institute of Pacific Relations, including the Far Eastern Survey and Pacific Affairs, are here listed.

Mr. MORRIS. Senator, I would like to have that received as the next consecutive exhibit.

(The document was marked "Exhibit No. 118" and is as follows:)

Book review, 1946, page 97.

Senator FERGUSON. What year were you discussing these matters with Rosinger?

Mr. CANNING. As I recall, throughout this period of my own membership he was also a member of the Communist Party.

Senator FERGUSON. The years again?

Mr. CANNING. From the early part of 1936 to the latter part of 1938.

Senator FERGUSON. So it is just before these writings?

Mr. CANNING. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Some of them even while you were doing the discussing?

Mr. CANNING. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Canning, did you make available to the proper authorities your knowledge that Rosinger was a Communist?

Mr. CANNING. Yes; I did.

Mr. MORRIS. I wonder if you will extend that just a little bit. Tell us to what extent you made that known to the authorities.

Mr. CANNING. Well, my first testimony on these matters of the City College Communist unit and Columbia University activities was in 1940 during the hearings of the New York State Legislative Committee on the Public Schools, Coudert committee.

Mr. MORRIS. In other words, you testified publicly that Lawrence Rosinger was a member of the Communist Party?

Mr. CANNING. As I recall.

Mr. MORRIS. That fact was probably reported in all the press at the time?

Mr. CANNING. As to the publicity, I did testify on all of these matters both in private testimony and in public but, Mr. Morris, I don't recall whether or not the public testimony carried this information.

Senator FERGUSON. When did you leave the party, if you did leave it?

Mr. CANNING. In the latter part of 1938.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Mandel, do you have any other letters showing Mr. Rosinger's activities with the Institute of Pacific Relations? I would like to have you read them if you have.

Mr. MANDEL. I have a letter here dated August 9, 1940, from the files of the Institute of Pacific Relations addressed to Mr. Edward Carter and signed by Lawrence K. Rosinger. I read the first paragraph as follows:

> On returning from my vacation, I found that a letter had arrived from the New York City Board of Education, appointing me to a high-school teaching position, beginning with this fall. I wish that I were not confronted with a choice between this and devoting all my time to the Far East, but I have decided to accept. Refusal now would simply make it necessary to accept 6 months hence or to be removed from the list and might involve going to a far less satisfactory school than the one I have been assigned to.

Another letter, dated August 19, 1940, from the files of the Institute of Pacific Relations headed "E. C. C.," presumably E. C. Carter, from "W. L. H.," presumably William L. Holland. I read from the paragraph referring to Rosinger as follows:

> Speaking of Rosinger, I am of course delighted to hear that he has landed a job and I think that he is wise in taking it. I should like your advice on his request that we extend the research grant of $500 to apply for a longer period. Since the grant has already been authorized and is to be turned over to the custody of the American Council, I suppose there is no real objection to this procedure.

Mr. MORRIS. Who was that writing, Mr. Mandel?

Mr. MANDEL. That is E. C. C., presumably E. C. Carter, to E. C. Carter from W. L. H., presumably W. L. Holland.

Mr. MORRIS. I would like the chairman to take cognizance of the fact that this was dated 1940. I would like to have this entered into the record and marked as the next consecutive exhibit together with this previous one.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be so marked.

(The documents referred to were marked "Exhibits Nos. 119 and 120" and are as follows:)

EXHIBIT No. 119

AMERICAN COUNCIL, INSTITUTE OF PACIFIC RELATIONS, INC.,
New York City, August 9, 1940.

Mr. EDWARD C. CARTER,
Lee, Mass.

DEAR MR. CARTER: On returning from my vacation, I found that a letter had arrived from the New York City Board of Education, appointing me to a high-school teaching position, beginning with this fall. I wish that I were not confronted with a choice between this and devoting all my time to the Far East, but I have decided to accept. Refusal now would simply make it necessary to accept 6 months hence or be removed from the list and might involve going to a far less satisfactory school than the one I have been assigned to. Besides, as you know, I expect to be married in the near future, and it may be well to secure a steady position as soon as possible.

This will not interfere with my IPR work, except that it will slow down the pace. I have practically finished the research for my inquiry report on China's recent political development and will begin writing next week. By the beginning of the school term (September 9), I should have about 50 printed pages done (i. e., approximately one-third of the book). Teaching will not prevent my going forward with the rest in the evenings and over weekends, and the entire report should be finished some time in the fall (let us say, by the end of November).

As you know, Bill Holland assigned me $500 for 5 months' research (September 1940–January 1941) on another book, which is to be my doctoral dissertation as well as an IPR publication: Nationalism and National Unity in China, 1924–35. The fact that the inquiry report will extend into the fall means that I shall not be able to start on this second project until a few months after the expected date. Besides, teaching will make it necessary to devote part time rather than full time to the new research. I would therefore like to suggest that the $500 grant apply to a period of 12, instead of 5 months, i.e., cover the entire year, September 1940–August 1941. I feel that this is a logical arrangement that will be fair to the IPR as well as satisfactory to myself. I have not yet written to Bill Holland about this, since I am awaiting your approval. If you find it satisfactory, I will write to Bill, and perhaps you will want to do the same.

I have received the pamphlet, Total Defense, and will send you my comments in a few days.

I was very sorry to learn of your sister's death and wish to extend my condolences.

Sincerely yours,

LAWRENCE K. ROSINGER.

BERKELEY, CALIF., August 19, 1940.

E. C. C. from W. L. H.

Many thanks for your letter of August 14, about the Fahs manuscript. I think you have reached a most statesmanlike compromise and I am very pleased that Fahs has agreed to accept so many of the changes. I know that Fahs regretted that we did not put the long marks over the vowels of Japanese words. I recognize that there is a good deal to be said for including them, but our decision was based simply on the fact that Hilda and I had gone into the question when Norman's book was being printed and had come to the conclusion that the extra expense was not warranted, since there were really no instances where the omission of the marks would have resulted in error or ambiguity. Having once established that rule we felt that we should follow it in the case of Fah's manuscript, where the number of Japanese words was even smaller. I would be perfectly happy to be overruled in this matter, particularly if the printer can insert the marks without having to do substantial resetting. I personally feel that inserting them would be both unnecessary and pedantic. In fact in many of Fah's references I felt that he was being unnecessarily learned by quoting the full Japanese titles of laws, which for the purposes of the inquiry might better have been given in the English translation, as in Allen's book, since there was nothing peculiarly Japanese about the language. If Fah's had had occasion to quote rather long passages of Japanese or to discuss the meaning of certain Japanese terms, then I shold have had no hesitation in making full use of the long remarks.

I am interested in his report of the opinions expressed by Borton and Norman. Phil and I were both surprised to hear that Norman had raised any question since he and Phil and I had extensive correspondence over the bibliography and Norman usually had no hesitation in expressing his desires. Neither Phil nor I recollect that he raised any objections to the manner of quoting French titles.

I am sending a further personal note to Fahs to thank him for having come so far in meeting our wishes. I shall be interested to hear his reaction to the letter from Ushiba.

I have read Angus' memorandum on Peffer's report with great interest. While I do not often agree with Angus' interpretations, I have great respect for his clarity and powers of criticism. It seems to me that his comments are important, and that it would be a good idea for you to make a rather strong personal plea with Peffer to attempt some means by which those comments and also those made by Dennery Condliffe and myself could be at least mentioned in the report. As you know, Toynbee takes account of criticisms in footnotes, but if necessary they could be lumped together in an appendix, together with any specific replies or general remarks that Peffer cared to make. In addition to this, I think it would be desirable for Peffer or you to explain in the preface to the book that it is necessarily different in character from other reports in the inquiry series because it must be frankly a personal view and somewhat speculative in character.

I am a little perturbed to know that Angus is still not in favor of publishing his own memorandum nor of enlarging and revising it as we had hoped. I don't know what we can do about this, but it seems to me that we had reason to expect a good deal more from Angus for the money that was paid to him in one way or another. Perhaps there is some totally new subject that he would prefer to write on, not strictly in the legal field. At any rate, I hope you will let him know that we feel the inquiry will not be complete unless it has a substantial report from him on this or some other topic.

I shall send you my comments on Roth in a day or two. In the meantime I have been wondering what the situation is on the manuscripts by Harriet Moore and Keenleyside. There is also the same question of Borton's report. At one time I thought Leaning had screwed himself up to the point where he thought he could attempt a rewrite job. However, the political situation in Japan has been changing so fast that I now think it might be a better idea for you to discuss the whole question afresh with Borton, and ask whether he would not rather let you attempt a fairly substantial revision in which he could omit the greater part of the economic sections, including the materials on agriculture and population which are now being covered more fully by Miriam Farley. I would also suggest a working arrangement by which either Shepherd or Leaning could go over Borton's revisions from week to week, so that we should not have a substantial rewrite job at the end. It might even be desirable to offer Borton a further $40 or $50.

If this plan could be followed, I believe that we might salvage something pretty useful from the study. Something should be done because there will be a serious gap in the inquiry documentation if we omit a study on Japanese political developments. It will parallel the corresponding Chinese study by Rosinger. Speaking of Rosinger, I am of course delighted to hear that he has landed a job, and I think that he is wise in taking it. I should like your advice on his request that we extend the research grant of $500 to apply for a longer period. Since the grant has already been authorized and is to be turned over to the custody of the American Council, I suppose there is no real objection to this procedure. The only slight reservation I have is that we stretched a point or two in making this grant to Rosinger, largely on the ground that it would enable him to devote 4 or 5 months full time in the American Council to completing a study on which he has already done considerable research. However, I know that high-school salaries are pathetically low, especially for anybody contemplating marriage, and I also have high regard for Rosinger's scholarship. So, if you are prepared to back me up, I shall be willing to accede to Rosinger's proposal.

I enclose a letter from Miss Cleeve, which you may want to read and return to me. The last paragraph refers to a suggestion I made some months ago, urging that something pretty decisive should be done about leasing or ceding some of the British West Indian possessions to the United States as a means of getting American good will and increasing material support, and also taking the wind out of the sails of the extreme isolationists in this country. Miss Cleeve is lukewarm, as I suspected she would be. It was ironical, however, that her letter arrived on the very day that the papers announced that actual negotiations were in progress about this scheme.

Mr. MANDEL. This is a letter dated June 6, 1940, to Mr. Carter from Owen Lattimore.

Senator FERGUSON. Before you read that, I would like to inquire. Mr. Canning, did you ever know whether or not Rosinger either publicly or privately withdrew from the Communist Party?

Mr. CANNING. During the period that I was in the Communist movement he did not withdraw.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you ever hear that he had after that?

Mr. CANNING. No; I never did.

Senator FERGUSON. Either in a public manner or private manner?

Mr. CANNING. No: I had no knowledge of his having left.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

Mr. MORRIS. Have you read anything by Mr. Rosinger in the last few years, Mr. Canning?

Mr. CANNING. I have read several articles of his; yes.

Mr. MORRIS. Did they impress you as the writings of a man still in the Communist movement?

Mr. CANNING. It would be hard to say. There is no open sign that what he is writing is Communist propaganda, but the tendency is toward support of the Red Chinese group.

Mr. MORRIS. In other words, they are not the writings of a man who has broken with the Communist Party, in your opinion?

Mr. CANNING. I think the writings would give no evidence of his either being in or out of the party; that is, the few that I have read.

The CHAIRMAN. What is next?

Mr. MANDEL. Another letter, dated June 6, 1940, to Mr. E. C. Carter from Owen Lattimore, refers to "Rosinger's promised article on Soviet policy ought to interest him; and so should Brandt's article on the Far East and the World Market." I cite also the testimony of Mr. William L. Holland in company with Edward C. Carter in executive session on June 21, 1951. Mr. Morris asked:

> How about the grant to Rosinger?
> Mr. HOLLAND. I think, either late in 1949 or early 1950, I requested from the offices of the Rockefeller Foundation a special grant to be made to the American IPR to enable Mr. Rosinger to undertake a comprehensive survey of the post-war Far East. This book, entitled "The State of Asia," edited by Rosinger, with contributions by some 13 other Far East experts, had just been published by Alfred Knopf.

It continues the quotation.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, this is a reading of testimony that already has been presented to the committee. The point of that is to show that it would indicate from that testimony that Mr. Carter had obtained two grants from the Rockefeller Foundation for Mr. Rosinger to continue his work.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well.

Mr. MANDEL. I have here from the files of the Institute of Pacific Relations a typed list of some experts on China, Netherlands Indies, and Manchuria, and among those listed is the name of Lawrence Rosinger, Manhattan High School of Aviation Trades, 220 East Sixty-third Street, New York.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like the last two letters read by Mr. Mandel introduced in evidence and marked as the next consecutive exhibits.

The CHAIRMAN. They may be so marked.

(The documents referred to were marked "Exhibits Nos. 121, 122, and 122–a" and are as follows:)

EXHIBIT No. 121

BALTIMORE, MD., June 6, 1940.

Mr. E. C. CARTER,
Institute of Pacific Relations,
129 East Fifty-second Street, New York City.

DEAR CARTER: Thanks for sending me Corbett's comments. I am glad to see that plans for the next issue of Pacific Affairs fit in with his suggestions. Rosinger's promised article on Soviet policy ought to interest him; and so should Brandt's article on the Far East and the World Market.

I might also be able to make an article on What Japan Knows About Outer Mongolia, from the translation of a Japanese book which Grajdanzev is to send me.

With regard to Corbett's idea for a "substantial review article combining Buell and Bingham * * * working out in practice their plan of Pacific association," wouldn't you consult with Corbett to see whether he himself would undertake such an assignment? His qualifications and his outlook indicate that he is the man to give such an article depth as well as breadth.

If he should want to do it for the September issue, the copy would have to be in my hands at the end of this month.

Yours very sincerely,

OWEN LATTIMORE.

EXCERPTS FROM THE TESTIMONY OF EDWARD C. CARTER AND WILLIAM L. HOLLAND, (P. 260)

Mr. MORRIS. How about the grant to Rosinger?

Mr. HOLLAND. I think, either late 1949 or early 1950, I requested from the offices of the Rockefeller Foundation a special grant to be made to the American IPR to enable Mr. Rosinger to undertake a comprehensive survey of the post-war Far East. This book, entitled "The State of Asia," edited by Rosinger, with contributions by some 13 other leading Far East experts, has just been published by Alfred Knopf.

Now you may also be referring to the fact that in late 1949 the Rockefeller Foundation—I think on the request of my predecessor, Mr. Clayton Lane—made a travel grant of, I should imagine, something like $2,000 to Mr. Rosinger to enable him to go to India to attend the India-American Conference which was held jointly by the American IPR and the Indian Council of IPR in Delhi, in the summer of 1949.

Netherlands Indies:
W. L. Holland. (See above.)
Ellen van Zyll de Jong, international secretariat, IPR, 129 East Fifty-second Street, New York
Amry Vandenbosch, University of Kentucky, Lexington
Rupert Emerson, formerly of Harvard, now in the Territories Section, Department of Interior, Washington, D. C.

All of the foregoing are American citizens except the following:

Mr. Holland is a New Zealander who has resided in the United States for several years.

Dr. Chi is Chinese, but is employed by the Sino-American Corp., set up jointly at the instance of the Chinese and American Governments.

Dr. Bloch and Dr. Wittfogel have probably taken out their first citizenship papers.

Mr. Grajdanzev is a Siberian who reads Russian, Chinese, and Japanese. He has taken out his first citizenship papers.

Mr. MANDEL. Another item from the files of the Institute of Pacific Relations is dated February 5, 1950, "FVF from LKR," presumably Frederick Vanderbilt Field, from Lawrence K. Rosinger. I read the first sentence:

I think Lattimore's article is excellent, clearly thought out and very well put. I have a few suggestions of a minor character that may improve it further * * *.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the letter introduced into evidence and marked as the next consecutive exhibit.

The CHAIRMAN. It is so marked and inserted in the record.

(The document referred to was marked "Exhibit No. 123" and is as follows:)

EXHIBIT No. 123

FEBRUARY 5, 1940.

F. V. F. from L. K. R.:

I think Lattimore's article is excellent; clearly thought out and very well put. I have a few suggestions of a minor character that may improve it further:

Page 1, paragraph 3, line 3: Shouldn't "therefore" be "however", since the implication of the two previous sentences is that we are taking a strong position toward Japan?

Page 3, line 10: Since the implication here is that we should develop a correct policy before the events, instead of sadly understanding events after they have occcurred, how about saying "the problem today is one of correctly understanding and shaping history in the making"?

Page 4, line 11: Wouldn't it be better to say: "It will be partly because of American stupidity"? After all, if it is foolish to say that Russian influence by itself can bring Bolshevism to China, then it is at least equally false to attribute that power to the United States.

Pages 4–5: The argument here is that social explosions result when internal forces meet outside pressures. I don't know what can be done about it, but this argument—despite a certain cogency—struck me as a little bit foolish, since it is almost equivalent to saying that (e. g.) if Tsarism had been Tsarism, then there would never have been a Bolshevik revolution. And yet the point has its validity. Perhaps it would be helpful to indicate here (as well as later) that the pressures upon China do not now constitute a fixed mathematical quantity, but that their weight can be changed radically by the counterpressure of the United States.

Page 5, last line: Considering the highly dubious origin of the New Life movement (i. e. it was essentially a political move in the civil-war period), I wonder whether it should be cited as an example of the drive toward "modern," "efficient" political ideas. I don't know much about what has happened to the movement since the outbreak of the far-eastern war, but my feeling is that New Life is pretty much in the background—perhaps almost the discard.

Page 6, line 10: Perhaps it would be desirable to qualify "every" by "almost," since I suppose that there are certain elements, particularly compradore elements in the captured cities, that—whatever their abstract desires—would be willing to deal with the Japanese—permanently. Or is Lattimore's statement "wants to grow stronger" sufficient to make "almost" unnecessary?

Page 12, paragraph 3, line 5: "led by the Communists." Since Lattimore has not stated precisely what the nature of the split in the united front might be, one would be entitled to assume that important Kuomintang elements might go along with the Communists. In this case, one could only say that the Communists would have more weight than they do now, but whether they would actually be the leaders is at least open to discussion. (This, I think, is particularly valid, since Lattimore has already said that "most" of the Chinese, in the circumstances mentioned, would go along with Russia and that only "some" of them would be of the Wang Ching-wei type.)

At this point perhaps it would buttress the argument to mention the well-known fact that Sun Yat-sen turned to Russia back in 1923-24 only after he was convinced that he could expect nothing—except possibly opposition—from other powers.

I think it might be wise in the paragraph next to the last line in the article to indicate that there might be ways, other than the embargo, of helping China—just so that the suggestions made will have as catholic a character as possible.

Mr. MANDEL. This is a letter dated October 9, 1940, "E. C. C. from W. L. H.," presumably E. C. Carter from William L. Holland, and Mr. Holland writes regarding a trip that he is proposing to make: "The principal people I want to see," and he lists among others Rosinger.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to introduce that into evidence as the next consecutive exhibit.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be so marked and received.

(The document referred to was marked "Exhibit No. 124" and is as follows:)

EXHIBIT NO. 124

GIANNINI FOUNDATION,
UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA,
Berkeley, Calif., October 9, 1940.

E. C. C. from W. L. H.

Thank you for your letters of October 7 about the meeting on the 16th and 17th. I shall be awaiting your word about whether Tarr can come. I can easily arrange to meet you in Chicago on the morning of the 15th, and would like to leave by an afternoon train that would enable me to spend an hour or so that evening in Ann Arbor with Remer and Hayden. I could then go into Detroit and get an overnight train to New York from there. I should like to have 1 day in Washington and this might be either on the 18th or the 21st or 22d, thus leaving the week end free for a possible meeting at Lee.

I should be glad if you would make some appointments for me in the New York office. The principal people I want to see are Shepherd, Yasuo, Grajdanzev, Ellen van Zyll de Jong, Rosinger, Porter, Farley, Austern, and Downing. In addition I should like to see Leaning, Greenberg, and Virginia Thompson, if she is well enough. At Columbia I should like 15 minutes each with Wittfogel, Peffer, Leonard, and Roth. Perhaps some of these can be arranged at the IPR office. Leonard can be reached through Jessup's office or through Catherine Porter. I'd also like to see Harry Price and, of course, Fred Field either in New York or Washington. I shall count on seeing Lockwood either in New York or at Lee. In Washington the principal people I want to see are Rupert Emerson in the Interior Department, Henry Deimel and Sydney Smith in the State Department, Ladejinsky and Rossiter in the Department of Agriculture and Johnstone, Tasca, and Merrill. I can arrange these appointments myself after I know the rest of my time table.

I'd also like to have an evening or an hour or two with Lattimore in Baltimore.

If time permits, I'd also like to have a word with Bisson, Yarnell, Jaffe, and Mitchell, but I expect these can be fitted in easily, perhaps at lunch. I'd also like a word with Shiman and Kay Greene.

Probably Matsuo had better come straight on to New York at fast as possible so that I could see him about the 23d. If possible I'd like to leave that night, but this can be kept flexible.

I take it from your letter that you have no particlar business that you want me to see Wilbur or Sproul or Mrs. McLaughlin about before I leave.

W. L. H.

Mr. MANDEL. Another letter referring to France is taken from the files of the Institute of Pacific Relations dated August 14, 1940, E. C. C. from K. M., presumably E. C. Carter from Kate Mitchell. I read the first sentence:

With regard to Rosinger's letter of August 9 it is of course up to Bill Holland to decide whether the research fund is willing to extend the time of the grant to August 1941.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like that to be introduced into evidence and marked as the next consecutive exhibit.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be inserted in the record.

(The document referred to was marked "Exhibit No. 125" and is as follows:)

EXHIBIT No. 125

AUGUST 14, 1940.

E. C. C. from K. M.

With regard to Rosinger's letter of August 9, it is, of course, up to Bill Holland to decide whether the Research Fund is willing to extend the time of the grant to August 1941. I should say that there was no objection inasmuch as Larry doesn't ask for any more money, and considering the fact that most of our research reports are received at least 10 months later than the specified date! Why don't you tell Larry that you approve in general, but that he should take the matter up with the Research Committee. As far as his inquiry project is concerned, I suppose we will have to be satisfied with a completed manuscript in November. Are we allowed to keep our unexpended printing fund balance for use after the first of the year?

With reference to the letter from Peffer of August 6, I haven't any special comments to offer as I have not seen a copy of the manuscript, therefore cannot pass judgment either on Holland's criticisms or Peffer's refusal to accept many of them. If there is a spare copy of the manuscript floating around anywhere, might I have a look at it over this week end?

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I also would like Mr. Mandel to introduce into the record or to reintroduce if it is necessary, the fact that in 1949 Lawrence Rosinger was called down to Washington by the Secretary of State to be a consultant on foreign policy to submit a memo far-eastern policy and to attend a 3-day conference in the capacity of a consultant.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you have an exhibit setting that up or are you referring to testimony already taken?

Mr. MORRIS. I think Mr. Mandel has an official announcement of that fact from the State Department that he will make reference to.

Mr. MANDEL. I quote from a release dated May 20, 1950, No. 289, Department of State. It says:

The 31 who submitted memoranda were—and included in that list are Lawrence Rosinger, New York, N. Y. Then describing further the memo says:

The following, including Mr. Lattimore and some others of the 31, attended the round table at the Department October 6, 7, and 8 (1949), to discuss Far East policy.

On that list we find Lawrence K. Rosinger, American Institute of Pacific Relations, New York, N. Y.

EXCERPT

The 31 who submitted memoranda were: Dr. Lawrence K. Rosinger, New York, N. Y. * * *

The following, including Mr. Lattimore and some others of the 31, attended the round table at the Department October 6, 7, and 8 (1949), to discuss Far East policy: Lawrence K. Rosinger, American Institute of Pacific Relations, New York, N. Y.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Mandel, you also introduced into the record the fact that the last publication that was supported by a grant of the Institute of Pacific Relations was edited by Lawrence K. Rosinger.

Mr. MANDEL. That is already in the record.

I have a letter here dated November 12, 1943, from the files of the Institute of Pacific Relations addressed to Mr. John Carter Vincent, UNRRA Conference, Hotel Claridge, Atlantic City, N. J., from T. A. Bisson.

DEAR MR. VINCENT: Knowing that you must be exceedingly busy at this time, I am sorry to bother you with a minor detail. We believe that the original copy of Mr. Lawrence Rosinger's manuscript on Wartime Politics in China was sent to you for criticism. With your new FEA responsibilities, there is no reason to burden you with this task of reading and review. However, we are anxious to have the manuscript copy itself returned here for the printer, if it is conveniently possible to have it sent back.

Hoping to see you in New York soon,

Sincerely yours,

T. A. BISSON.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like that introduced into the record.

The CHAIRMAN. It may be done.

DEAR MR. VINCENT: Knowing that you must be exceedingly busy at this time, I am sorry to bother you with a minor detail. We believe that the original copy of Mr. Lawrence Rosinger's manuscript on Wartime Politics in China was sent to you for criticism. With your new FEA responsibilities, there is no reason to burden you with this task of reading and review. However, we are anxious to have the manuscript copy itself returned here for the printer, if it is conveniently posible to have it sent back.

Hoping to see you in New York soon,

Sincerely yours,

T. A. BISSON.

Mr. MORRIS. The purpose of this long introduction of documents into the record is to show extensive activity on the part of Louis Rosinger, who has been identified here as a Communist in the Institute of Pacific Relations.

Mr. MANDEL. Another letter dated February 21, 1944, is addressed to Dr. John Fairbank, care of Mrs. Wilma Fairbank, Division of Cultural Relations, State Department, from W. L. Holland:

I enclose a manuscript by Larry Rosinger on China's Wartime Politics in the hope that you can find a few minutes in which to read it and give me your criticism. This was supposed to have been sent to you some weeks ago, but I have been waiting for some comment from people in the State Department. The comments, when they arrived, were not very enlightening, but you know how those things are. If you don't feel like reading the whole thing through, I wish you would concentrate on the last part from page 47 onward—and so forth.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like that introduced into the record and marked as the next consecutive exhibit. There are only a few more, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be so marked.

Dr. JOHN FAIRBANK,
Care of Mrs. Wilma Fairbank,
Division of Cultural Relations, State Department,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR JOHN: I enclose a manuscript by Larry Rosinger on China's wartime politics in the hope that you can find a few minutes in which to read it and give me your criticisms. This was supposed to have been sent to you some weeks ago, but I have been waiting for some comments from people in the State Department. The comments, when they arrived, were not very enlightening, but you know how those things are. If you don't feel like reading the whole thing through, I wish you would concentrate on the last part, from page 47 onward. The manuscript is unsatisfactory in several ways mainly because Rosinger had originally intended to write about twice as much but had to change his plans because of his illness and lack of time.

I shall be down in Washington next Friday and would like to see you then for a few minutes.

Yours,

W. L. HOLLAND.

P. S.—I have sent the books from Lowdermilk to Wilma.

Mr. MANDEL. This is a letter which comes in "care of Mr. Lauchlin Currie, the White House, February 28, 1944," signed "John" and typed initials, J. K. Fairbank.

The CHAIRMAN. Just a moment. You said signed "care of Lauchlin Currie." Just give us that again to clarify the record.

Mr. MANDEL. The return address is "care of Mr. Lauchlin Currie, The White House, Washington, D. C."

Mr. MORRIS. In other words, this is John K. Fairbank, and he uses as his return address, "care of Lauchlin Currie, The White House, Washington, D. C."

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

Mr. MANDEL. This is from the files of the Institute:

"Dear Mr. HOLLAND: I have referred to the latter part,"

and then in pencil "of Rosinger's ms on China."

"and it seems like a very good job indeed. Can't something be done to send Rosinger to China sometime? The Government will not be happy about this, but it is so well done that they can hardly call it propaganda. How can we expedite bringing our friend to California?

Sincerely,

J. K. FAIRBANK.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like that introduced into the record and marked as the next consecutive exhibit.

The CHAIRMAN. So marked and inserted in the record.

How can we expedite bringing our friend to California?

Sincerely,

Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, you noted that this was care of Lauchlin Currie. I am hoping that the committee can subpena Lauchlin Currie here to make an explanation of many of these matters that were going through his hands and his connection with the institute.

Mr. MORRIS. I would also like to call your attention to the fact, Mr. Chairman, that Fairbank says, "It is done so well that they can hardly call it propaganda."

Senator FERGUSON. This letter indicates that he ought to be called to make an explanation of these things.

The CHAIRMAN. I think, Senator, at the proper time in the hearings that will be accomplished.

Mr. MANDEL. The next is a letter dated January 5, 1942, from the files of the institute, addressed to G. E. Hubbard, Esq., Political Intelligence Department, Foreign Office, London, England. I read part of a paragraph:

In spite of the war or rather because of it, the IPR is busier than ever. We have had to let some of our staff go to various Government jobs, but have managed to fill all vacancies so that on balance both the American Council and the Pacific Council staffs are stronger than ever—and further down—

Rosinger is in the office of the India Government Trade Commissioner here in New York.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to introduce that into evidence and have it marked as the next consecutive exhibit.

The CHAIRMAN. So marked.

DEAR HUBBARD: It was delightful to get your letter. I am enclosing copies of two of the broadcasts in the series. Unfortunately no copies are available of the initial broadcast which Yarnell and I led off. This series has been an attempt by the American Council of the IPR to make more widely available the material which it is so carefully and laboriously assembling. I understand that the first eight broadcasts are appearing in pamphlet form in a week or two. I will see that a copy goes to you. I assume that you still see the Far Eastern Survey and Pacific Affairs.

In spite of the war, or rather because of it, the IPR is busier than ever. We have had to let some of our staff go to various Government jobs but have managed to fill all vacancies so that on balance both the American Council and the Pacific Council staffs are stronger than ever. Lattimore is of course an asset in Chungking, though he is not technically on the IPR staff. Michael Greenberg and Mrs. Dobbs are carrying on Pacific Affairs well within the Lattimore tradition. Ch'ao-ting Chi is secretary general of the ABC stabilizaton fund in China and is gaining experience that will ultimately be of the greatest value if and when he is able to return to the secretariat. Friedman, who did that very able book on British relations with China, is now in the Treasury in Washington. Rosinger is in the office of the India Government Trade Commissioner here in New York. Shiman has gone to the Tariff Commission, and Miss Ellen van Zyll de Jong, to Military Intelligence.

W. W. Lockwood has come back from Princeton and taken over the secretaryship of the American Council. For a time he had to work in Washington in the Office of Export Control, but he has managed to disentangle himself from Government service.

Lilienthal got out of Shanghai in time and is back on the American Council staff.

The Government has been after Barnett and me, but both of us have been able to persuade the United States authorities that we can render a bigger service to every department of the Government by continuing the staffs of the American and Pacific Councils intact rather than by scattering our energies through a dozen Government departments.

I wish you could write us more fully about your own work and views now that we are comrades in arms.

Sincerely yours,

EDWARD C. CARTER.

Mr. MANDEL. The final exhibit taken from the files of the Institute of Pacific Relations dated December 30, 1943, on the stationery of the Foreign Policy Association, addressed to William L. Holland and signed "Larry Rosinger." I read the first paragraph:

DEAR BILL: Thanks for the comments from Stewart. I disagreed with one or two of them, but I believe they will be very useful. I am looking forward to the suggestions from Fairbank and Hiss.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like that introduced into evidence and marked as the next consecutive exhibit.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be so marked and inserted in the record.

(The document referred to was marked "Exhibit No. 131" and is as follows:)

EXHIBIT No. 131

FOREIGN POLICY ASSOCIATION,
New York, December 30, 1943.

Mr. WILLIAM L. HOLLAND,
Institute of Pacific Relations,
New York 22, New York

DEAR BILL: Thanks for the comments from Stewart. I disagreed with one or two of them, but I believe they will be very useful. I am looking forward to the suggestions from Fairbank and Hiss.

I have taken care of your order for the two foreign policy reports, which I understand will be sent to you at a 20 percent discount. I think you will be interested to know that we will publish on February 1st another report of mine, tentatively titled "The Western Stake in Colonial Asia". I doubt that this will be available in print much before publication date, but if your conference is taking place before the end of the month, it may be possible to secure some copies. In any event, if you want me to, I will send you the proofs in about 2 weeks.

Yours,

LARRY ROSINGER.

Mr. MORRIS. Do any of the Senators have any questions on Mr. Rosinger?

Senator FERGUSON. I don't on Rosinger.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Canning, we had testimony recently that a man named Moses Finkelstein ran a Communist study group. Professor Wittfogel has testified that this Communist study group met in New York City. At least his contentions were that it met in New York City when he so testified. Did you know that Moses Finkelstein ran a study group in New York City?

Mr. CANNING. Yes. I knew Moses Finkelstein as both a teacher at City College in the evening session and as a graduate student at Columbia.

Mr. MORRIS. Was he a Communist?

Mr. CANNING. He was a member of the Communist unit at Columbia University.

Mr. MORRIS. Did you know that of your own knowledge?

Mr. CANNING. I did, and I did attend for some time a group that did meet at Moses Finkelstein's house, a Communist study group which met there about once a week for a period of several months.

Mr. MORRIS. You didn't know all members of the group, did you, Mr. Canning?

Mr. CANNING. There weren't very many in that group at the time, and I believe I knew all of them.

Senator FERGUSON. They met as Communists?

Mr. CANNING. That is right. One or two who were not members of the party would meet as well.

Senator FERGUSON. What was the purpose of having some come in like that?

Mr. CANNING. To interest them in communism.

Senator FERGUSON. To convert them to the idea?

Mr. CANNING. To Communist ideas.

Senator FERGUSON. Did he run any other study groups there that you know of?

Mr. CANNING. Not that I know of. That is the only one that I attended.

Senator FERGUSON. The only one that you attended.
Mr. CANNING. Yes.
Senator FERGUSON. Do you know that he ran any others?
Mr. CANNING. No, I don't of my own knowledge.
Senator FERGUSON. Have you heard that he ran others?
Mr. CANNING. No.
Mr. MORRIS. Did you know that a man named Daniel Thorner was a member of a study group there?
Mr. CANNING. Yes, he was one of the people who met in the study group that I referred to.
Mr. MORRIS. Was he a Communist?
Mr. CANNING. Yes.
Mr. MORRIS. How do you know that Daniel Thorner was a Communist?
Mr. CANNING. From his own statements to me that he belonged to the Columbia University unit.
Mr. MORRIS. Do we have anything indicating that Daniel Thorner was active in IPR affairs, Mr. Mandel?
Mr. MANDEL. Yes. I read from the files of the Institute of Pacific Relations dated June 2, 1942, a memo to ECC, presumably E. C. Carter, from CP presumably Catherine Porter, and I read a paragraph in which Daniel Thorner, who is in the COI, working under Brown's direction, is referred to:

> Brown has an extremely high regard for Thorner, and Beecroft thinks he is one of the most promising young men in the country. He does not know Thorner's background beyond the fact that he is a New York man, that he studied at Columbia and wrote his thesis on the history of Indian railways in relation to the progress of industrialization in India. Beecroft says that Thorner probably knows more about the transport problem in India than any other person in this country.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like that introduced into the record and have it marked as the next consecutive exhibit. I think that already has been introduced and is exhibit No. 77, Mr. Chairman.
Mr. MANDEL. I have here also as an exhibit previously introduced a list of research fellows and students of the Walter Hines Page School, 1940 to 1951, which is headed by Owen Lattimore, and among these students, research fellows, and so forth, is the name of Mr. Daniel Thorner.
Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, that already has been introduced into the record.
Mr. Canning, do you remember when Prof. Karl August Wittfogel was invited to address a study group at the home of Mr. Finkelstein?
Mr. CANNING. No; I don't know about that.
Mr. MORRIS. You don't know that particular session?
Mr. CANNING. Not during the time that I attended the study group, I don't recall any invitation to Mr. Wittfogel.
Mr. MORRIS. But you did know that at least one study group did meet at the home of Moses Finkelstein?
Mr. CANNING. That is right.
Mr. MORRIS. Where was that?
Mr. CANNING. In the neighborhood of Columbia.
Mr. MORRIS. In New York City?
Mr. CANNING. I think about One Hundred Fourteenth Street, in New York City.

Mr. MORRIS. Do you know what Mr. Finkelstein is doing today?

Mr. CANNING. I understand from the newspapers that he is teaching at Rutgers University, but under a different name. Finley, I believe his name is now.

Senator FERGUSON. What is his real name?

Mr. CANNING. Finkelstein; Moses Finkelstein.

The CHAIRMAN. Under what name is he going now?

Mr. CANNING. Finley, F-i-n-l-e-y.

The CHAIRMAN. He would take an Irishman's name, would he not? [Laughter.]

Senator WATKINS. How do you know that?

Mr. CANNING. I believe that was first called to my attention a year or so ago when I was questioned by an agent of the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

Senator WATKINS. Did you ever check to see that he was actually teaching at Rutgers?

Mr. CANNING. No; I didn't personally check. I was told that by this agent of the FBI who was questioning me.

Senator WATKINS. That is where you got your information?

Mr. CANNING. That is right, sir.

Mr. MORRIS. Is it public knowledge that Mr. Finkelstein was a member of the Communist Party, Mr. Canning, if you know?

Mr. CANNING. I testified to it previously.

Mr. MORRIS. In 1940?

Mr. CANNING. In 1940.

Mr. MORRIS. Was he tried by the board of higher education?

Mr. CANNING. I don't believe that he came up for a trial. I think he resigned, though I would have to check to be sure.

Mr. MORRIS. Do you know if the same gentleman has a grant from one of the foundations?

Senator FERGUSON. Who is that?

Mr. CANNING. Moses Finkelstein, formerly Moses Finkelstein.

Senator FERGUSON. What has he to do with this grant from the Ford Foundation?

Mr. CANNING. It is a grant apparently to improve the teaching standards of the university.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you ever hear, either publicly or privately, that he had withdrawn from the Communist Party?

Mr. CANNING. No, I have never heard that he has withdrawn from the party.

Senator FERGUSON. You do know that when you knew him back in New York he was a Communist?

Mr. CANNING. He was a Communist, and especially active in the Columbia University unit.

Senator FERGUSON. He was directly connected with IPR, but do you know any other Communist in your cells or that you knew up in these colleges that came down in the Government, the United States Government?

Mr. CANNING. There was one other who belonged to the same Columbia University unit, Theodore Geiger.

Senator FERGUSON. Was he a Communist?

Mr. CANNING. Yes; he was.

Senator FERGUSON. Any doubt about it?

Mr. CANNING. No doubt in my mind that he was.

Senator FERGUSON. Where did you know him?

Mr. CANNING. I knew him both at City College where he was a student, and later at Columbia University where he continued his graduate studies.

Senator FERGUSON. About when did he leave there?

Mr. CANNING. When did he leave Columbia? City College?

Senator FERGUSON. Or City College.

Mr. CANNING. I think he finished at City College, he received his bachelor's degree in 1935.

Senator FERGUSON. Where did he come in the Government?

Mr. CANNING. Into the Economic Cooperation Administration.

Senator FERGUSON. Do you know whether he is in Government now?

Mr. CANNING. No. I have been informed that he has resigned.

Senator FERGUSON. When?

Mr. CANNING. Not a very long time ago, several months ago.

Senator FERGUSON. Just months ago.

Mr. CANNING. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. What was his position in Government?

Mr. CANNING. He was, I believe, Deputy Administrator to the ECA, though I am not certain of his exact title.

Senator FERGUSON. That is the same man that you knew in Columbia as a Communist?

Mr. CANNING. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Was he active in communism?

Mr. CANNING. He was.

Senator FERGUSON. As active as you and Finkelstein?

Mr. CANNING. Not quite as active as Finkelstein, but perhaps as active as I was.

Senator FERGUSON. As you were?

Mr. CANNING. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Is there anybody else who came into Government?

Mr. CANNING. One further person——

Senator FERGUSON. By the way, did you ever hear that this man had ever left the Communist rank, either publicly or privately hear that he had left?

Mr. CANNING. No, sir; I never heard that he had resigned.

Senator FERGUSON. You never heard?

The CHAIRMAN. I want to say, Senator, that some time ago the "watchdog committee" of the Committee on Appropriations made a representation to ECA as to this individual and drew the attention of ECA to his past history and asked for an investigation, following which I think there was a resignation. That is my impression.

Senator FERGUSON. I hope that Geiger will be given an opportunity to rebut this or to answer this testimony.

Is there anybody else who came down here in Government?

Mr. CANNING. During the war I was surprised to read in the New York World-Telegram in 1945 that a certain Louis Balamuth had been associated in the atomic bomb project at the University of Chicago.

Senator FERGUSON. When was that?

Mr. CANNING. I believe it was 1945.

Senator FERGUSON. 1945. Was he—and are you certain about it—a Communist?

Mr. CANNING. Yes, sir; he was a member of the same cell at City College to which I belonged.

Senator FERGUSON. Was he active as a Communist in that cell?

Mr. CANNING. His main activity in the cell was editing—he was in charge of putting out this secret publication I spoke of, the Teacher Worker.

Senator FERGUSON. He was active then in the cell as a Communist?

Mr. CANNING. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. You learned that he went with the Atomic Energy Commission activity over in Chicago?

Mr. CANNING. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Had you ever learned that he either publicly or privately withdrew from the Communist Party?

Mr. CANNING. No; I never learned of any withdrawal from communism.

Senator FERGUSON. Do you know where he is now?

Mr. CANNING. No, I don't know where he is now, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. You gave his full name?

Mr. CANNING. Yes. Louis Balamuth.

The CHAIRMAN. How long did you know him to be a Communist in that cell to which you belonged?

Mr. CANNING. Throughout the entire period of my membership he was an active member of that unit.

The CHAIRMAN. That was for about what length of time in years?

Mr. CANNING. About 2½ years.

Senator FERGUSON. Is there anybody else who were Communists, that you knew to be Communists, who came in the Government?

Mr CANNING. No other persons that I can recall.

Senator FERGUSON. You had no doubt and you have no doubt now that these men at the time that you are talking about and knew them were actually Communists?

Mr. CANNING. I have no doubt whatsoever, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. I have just one question in addition to the questions propounded by Senator Ferguson. You knew them to be active participants in the Communist cause in this country?

Mr. CANNING. Yes, sir. All those persons named during the period of my membership were actively engaged in Communist work.

Senator SMITH. I would like to ask one question.

Mr. Canning, during the period that you were a member of either of those cells, did you from time to time make any memoranda about people who were making up those cells that would give us any light now on the membership?

Mr. CANNING. In the testimony which I gave some 11 years ago and in the subsequent hearings before the New York City Board of Higher Education, I gave a full account of the Communist activities at City College.

Senator SMITH. I mean did you include the names of parties who were members at that time?

Mr. CANNING. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. That is all in the record back there.

Mr. CANNING. All in the New York State Legislative Record.

Senator FERGUSON. Is that public?

Mr. CANNING. The hearings were both private and public.

Senator SMITH. Since that time have you run across any memoranda such as frequently one has, memos, diary notes, and what-not that would refresh your recollection and add any other names to that list?

Mr. CANNING. No, sir.

Senator SMITH. Was there any such thing as a roster of the membership of those cells that you may have had?

Mr. CANNING. The chairman of the unit no doubt kept records of that sort.

Senator SMITH. Who was the chairman?

Mr. CANNING. The chairman of this particular cell I have been speaking of was Louis Balamuth.

Senator SMITH. Who was the chairman of the other cells?

Mr. CANNING. Morris Schappes is a very important organizer of the City College unit. There was an Arthur Braunlich who was for a time the head of the entire City College unit. Some six or seven persons who were the principal leaders in the Communist cell there, the Communist unit.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to point out that the last part of this testimony does not relate to the Institute of Pacific Relations. It is a subject that has interested the Senators and the evidence has come out under that form.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORRIS. That is all I have with Mr. Canning, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. Any questions, Senators?

Senator FERGUSON. I think it ought to remain in this record because it is material to the question being studied by the whole committee as to Communists in government. It certainly ought to remain in the record.

The CHAIRMAN. It certainly will remain in the record. That is where it belongs. That is where it was made, and there is no reason for taking it from the record.

You may proceed, Mr. Morris, with the next witness. That is all, Mr. Canning, for this time. I thank you.

Senator FERGUSON. Thanks very much for coming in this morning.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chambers is the next witness.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Chambers, do you solemnly swear the testimony you are about to give before the Subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary of the United States Senate will be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, so help you God?

Mr. CHAMBERS. I do.

TESTIMONY OF JAY DAVID WHITTAKER CHAMBERS, WESTMINSTER, MD.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you give your name and address to the stenographer, Mr. Chambers.

Mr. CHAMBERS. Jay David Whittaker Chambers, Route 2, Wesminster, Md.

Mr. MORRIS. What is your present occupation, Mr. Chambers?

Mr. CHAMBERS. I am a writer and dairy farmer.

Mr. MORRIS. What was your last employment, Mr. Chambers?

Mr. CHAMBERS. My last employment was with Time magazine.

Mr. MORRIS. What year was that, Mr. Chambers?

Mr. CHAMBERS. The year 1948.

Mr. MORRIS. I wonder if you would tell the committee whether or not you ever belonged to the Communist Party?

Mr. CHAMBERS. I belonged to the Communist Party from the early part of 1925 until the middle of April 1938.

Mr. MORRIS. At what period of time did you belong to the underground Communist Party, Mr. Chambers?

Mr. CHAMBERS. I belonged to the underground Communist Party from about June of 1932 until the middle of April 1938.

Mr. MORRIS. Could you describe for us the method by which you transferred from the open party to the underground party?

The CHAIRMAN. First of all, I would like to ask what is meant by the underground Communist Party as distinguished from the Communist Party proper.

Mr. CHAMBERS. The Communist Party internationally has always been organized on two planes. There is the open Communist Party with which we are all almost or are almost all familiar now, and the underground Communist Party which is organized as secretly as possible.

The underground Communist Party a great deal of the time is actually the more important part of the Communist Party.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chambers, did you ever have any direct dealings with the Insitute of Pacific Relations?

Mr. CHAMBERS. No, I do not believe I did.

Mr. MORRIS. Did you ever know Frederick Vanderbilt Field?

Mr. CHAMBERS. Yes, I knew Frederick Vanderbilt Field.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you tell us of your experiences with Frederick Vanderbilt Field?

Mr. CHAMBERS. To do that I will have to go back of that subject a little way to describe my reasons for meeting Fred Field.

Mr. MORRIS. By all means, Mr. Chambers.

Mr. CHAMBERS. I met Fred Field in 1937. I met him in connection with Mr. Lawrence Duggan, the late Lawrence Duggan. Mr. Duggan was then in the State Department, and I think at that time in the Latin American Division. I was then in the Soviet apparatus in Washington, which was headed by Col. Boris Bykov. That apparatus worked very closely with the so-called Ware group, which had been organized in Washington by Harold Ware, who was a Communist. The group consisted of Communists and was a unit of the Communist Party and its members were all or chiefly Government employees. In that group—in fact its secretary-treasurer—was Henry Collins, who first worked, I believe, with the NRA and then in the Department of Agriculture and later in the military government in Germany. He is now head of the Russian-American Institute in New York, if my information is correct. That institute I think has been cited by the Attorney General.

Senator FERGUSON. You mean cited as Communist?

Mr. CHAMBERS. Cited as subversive. Mr. Collins had been a college friend of Lawrence Duggan, and from my earliest days in Washington in the Communist Party, which was the spring of 1934, I heard Lawrence Duggan's name mentioned as someone very sympathetic to the Communist Party. His name was first drawn to my attention, I believe, by one Webster Clay Powell, who was then an assistant to Harold Ware in a little Communist front called Farm Information, or some such name—Farm Research, I believe. Webster Clay Powell subsequently became an employee of the State Department and I think served in Australia in one of the legations. In any case Webster Powell first drew my attention to the name of Lawrence Duggan.

Henry Collins was equally sure that Lawrence Duggan was a man for the Communist Party to approach and particularly for the Soviet apparatus to approach. He voluntarily made at least two efforts to recruit Lawrence Duggan as a source in the State Department for the Soviet apparatus. Neither of those efforts was successful. Lawrence Duggan was approached obligingly in another way. At one point Alger Hiss, after he had entered the State Department, thought that he would be able to recruit Noel Field. Noel Field and Lawrence Duggan were very close friends and I believe lived in the same apartment house. As soon as Alger Hiss began to entertain the Fields, he also began to see the Duggans. A question arose early in that association between Hiss and Field about which Soviet apparatus Field should belong to, because Hiss discovered, much to his surprise, that there was a second Soviet apparatus operating in Washington. We now know that it was the apparatus headed here by Hede Gumperz, or Hede Massing, as she is now better known. Then Noel Field received an offer to work, if I remember correctly, in the International Labor Office in Geneva, Switzerland, for the League of Nations. He accepted that offer. Before he left——

The CHAIRMAN. Who is this?

Mr. CHAMBERS. This is Noel Field. I suppose everyone here is aware that Noel Field has disappeared into the Russian occupied territory.

Before Noel Field left for Geneva, Alger Hiss had a conversation with Field about Duggan, and he asked Field if Duggan would work for the Bykov apparatus. Field said that since he, Field, was leaving, Duggan would continue his work here for him. I heard nothing more of Duggan until the year 1937.

Senator SMITH. Mr. Chairman, may I ask Mr. Chambers how did he know about the conversation between Duggan, Hiss and Field. Were you present or did one of those people tell you?

Mr. CHAMBERS. What I know of that conversation is from what Alger Hiss told me at that time.

In the year 1927 Colonel Bykov decided that the apparatus should make an attempt, which was I suppose the fourth attempt——

Senator FERGUSON. The apparatus was an espionage apparatus.

Mr. CHAMBERS. That was the Soviet espionage apparatus in Washington, the head of which so far as I know was Boris Bykov.

Senator FERGUSON. Were you trying to get information out of the State Department? Is that why you wanted these people in your apparatus?

Mr. CHAMBERS. That is correct.

Senator FERGUSON. Go ahead.

Mr. CHAMBERS. To repeat, Colonel Bykov decided to make another attempt to recruit Lawrence Duggan for his apparatus. In pursuance of that effort I talked to J. Peters. J. Peters was the head of the underground section of the American Communist Party. Peters knew that Fred Vanderbilt Field and Lawrence Duggan were friends and told me so. I then asked Peters to introduce me to Fred Vanderbilt Field, and that Peters did in New York City close to Park Avenue and Thirty-fourth Street. I then had lunch with Fred Vanderbilt Field, but before I go into our conversation at lunch perhaps I should go a little further into what Peters told me about Fred Field in the course of a general casual conversation, in discussing Frederick Vanderbilt Field. Peters told me that Field was a member of an underground unit of the American Communist Party, which was meeting, if I remember correctly, in a house belonging to Mr. Field's mother somewhere in Central Park West, New York. In that unit were Frederick Vanderbilt Field and Joseph Barnes. Peters was considerably disturbed about the unit because some difficulty had arisen between the two men about their wives. I believe they subsequently divorced their wives and remarried each other's wives. I am not sure of the details.

Mr. MORRIS. I think, Mr. Chairman, we have had testimony that the present Mrs. Barnes was the former wife of Frederick V. Field.

The CHAIRMAN. That was earlier testimony before this committee.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Barnes has so testified.

Senator FERGUSON. How could that interfere with communism? [Laughter.] That you were frightened about it? What was wrong?

Mr. CHAMBERS. What was disturbing J. Peters was what would disturb any executive if he found such a situation among his personnel.

Senator FERGUSON. Just a little disturbing.

Mr. CHAMBERS. A disturbing factor.

I had, as I said, lunch with Frederick Vanderbilt Field, and I asked him to go to Washington and try to recruit for the Bykov apparatus Lawrence Duggan in the State Department. Field, as nearly as I can remember now, left either that day or the next day for Washington, and I saw him a day or two later. He told me that he had had a long conversation with Lawrence Duggan, and that Lawrence Duggan said that he could do nothing for the Bykov apparatus because he was already connected with another apparatus.

I think that is all.

Mr. MORRIS. What was the other apparatus, Mr. Chambers?

Mr. CHAMBERS. That was not defined. I can't answer that except as I assume it was the Hede Massing apparatus.

The CHAIRMAN. There were two apparatuses working here in Washington at that time?

Mr. CHAMBERS. There were at least two.

The CHAIRMAN. One was by Hede Massing?

Mr. CHAMBERS. One was headed by Hede Massing.

The CHAIRMAN. The other was headed by whom?

Mr. CHAMBERS. The other was headed by myself locally and by Colonel Bykov.

Senator FERGUSON. Just so the record may be clear, were these so divided that you were each trying and getting information out of the State Department and other departments unbeknown to the other?

Mr. CHAMBERS. That is right. That is what is called in the Communist Party the principle of parallel apparatuses. The apparatuses are set up so that neither in theory shall have any knowledge of the personnel or the activities of the other.

Senator FERGUSON. That is valuable to get information. It is not to check the other apparatus to see whether it is remaining honest?

Mr. CHAMBERS. I have reason to believe that there are still other apparatuses for that purpose.

Senator FERGUSON. Outside of that you have your counter espionage?

Mr. CHAMBERS. I believe so.

Senator FERGUSON. So, to get information they are set up parallel.

Mr. CHAMBERS. These two apparatuses, as I know now, were informational apparatuses. Unquestionably there are other counter-intelligence apparatuses, of which I have no direct knowledge.

Senator FERGUSON. You did not know how they checked the loyalty of the Communists?

Mr. CHAMBERS. The check on loyalty would be in the first instance an inner-organizational check. Everyone in any Communist organization is always vigilant about the loyalty of all other Communists.

Senator FERGUSON. You see, they object so strenuously to their loyalty being questioned when they are in Government. As I understand it, they have a very close check in their own organization as to loyalty.

Mr. CHAMBERS. There is a kind of invisible control which is self-operating, and self-starting. There are in addition other organizational controls, but of their nature I can't speak from direct knowledge.

Senator FERGUSON. But there is a loyalty check on them?

Mr. CHAMBERS. The loyalty subject preoccupies Communists a great deal for the obvious reason that the conspiracy must be tight or it will fail. In other words, I am sitting here. You can't have people like that in a conspiracy.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to point out that the purpose of this testimony at this time is to show that these three people who have been named so far, namely Frederick Vanderbilt Field, Joseph Barnes, and Lawrence Duggan, were active in the Institute of Pacific Relations and during that period were active members of the Communist organization. For instance, we have shown that Joseph Barnes was the secretary of the Institute of Pacific Relations from 1931 to 1934. Mr. Frederick V. Field was the secretary from 1934 to 1940 and remained on the executive committee until 1947. Mr. Duggan, we have had testimony, was the man used by the IPR when they gave consideration to founding a Latin-American division of the Institute of Pacific Relations. I would like to relate that as much as possible, Senator, to show that this does come within the scope of the inquiry into the Institute of Pacific Relations.

It may be that we are laboring this too much on Mr. Barnes, Mr. Chairman. Mr. Chambers is now the fourth witness who has identified Mr. Barnes as a member of some Communist unit and Communist organization, and yet I think it is necessary, Mr. Chairman, because Mr. Barnes continues to deny it.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well.

Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Chambers, did you ever contact Harry Dexter White, who was in the Treasury Department?

Mr. CHAMBERS. Yes; I knew Harry Dexter White rather well.

Senator FERGUSON. Was he in any apparatus?

Mr. CHAMBERS. Harry Dexter White was a source of the Soviet apparatus which I have mentioned.

The CHAIRMAN. Was a source? Give that again.

Mr. CHAMBERS. Was a source for material. He gave both original Government documents and a weekly or fortnightly written memo summarizing information which had come to him in the course of his activities. One specimen of that memo is I believe now in the custody of the Justice Department.

Senator FERGUSON. A memo that White gave?

Mr. CHAMBERS. That is right, in his handwriting.

Senator FERGUSON. In his own handwriting. Did you ever see any notes of Harry Dexter White in relation to the Far East, the Pacific, the Chinese, economic problems?

Mr. CHAMBERS. Yes, I did, and the specimen that I have referred to, the exhibit contains, as nearly as I recall, some information about Chinese finances. I am not familiar with the subject, and I have forgotten the exact matter.

Senator FERGUSON. Were those notes in your safety deposit box at one time?

Mr. CHAMBERS. No, I don't believe they were ever in my safety deposit box.

Senator FERGUSON. Do you know where they were obtained? Were they ever obtained by the Un-American Activities Committee?

Mr. CHAMBERS. I will have to think for a moment to remember what the chain of custody was. I believe that they were first given to the Federal Bureau of Investigation, but I am no longer quite sure.

Senator FERGUSON. Could you tell us the contents of those notes?

Mr. CHAMBERS. I am sorry, I have forgotten very largely what is in that exhibit. The exhibit exists.

Senator FERGUSON. If you can give the committee any information on where that exhibit may be now, the committee would appreciate it.

Mr. CHAMBERS. I should think counsel would know or could find very easily. For one thing, Senator Nixon, while he was Congressman, read them I believe into the Congressional Record.

Senator FERGUSON. He did?

Mr. CHAMBERS. I believe so. Shortly after the conviction of Alger Hiss.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you know, as a matter of fact, that they were in the handwriting of White, Harry Dexter White?

Mr. CHAMBERS. Without any question.

Senator FERGUSON. There is no question about that.

Mr. CHAMBERS. Moreover, the handwriting has been certified.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, we have introduced into the record documents showing Harry Dexter White's extensive association and activity within the Institute of Pacific Relations. I wonder, Mr. Chambers, if you would amplify on your knowledge of Harry Dexter White's association with the Communist organization.

Mr. CHAMBERS. Harry Dexter White was not a member of the Communist Party as near as I know, and I have reason to believe that is true because he was reluctant to accept any form of discipline. I had the impression that he was a man of such character that he very much enjoyed being of the Communist Party but not in the party and not subject to its discipline. In that relationship he was willing to go to great lengths to assist them.

Mr. MORRIS. Can you tell us about some of the lengths that he did go to assist?

Mr. CHAMBERS. I think I have already stated the two chief ones. He gave original and handwriting memo of his own containing Government information.

Mr. MORRIS. And the other one?

Mr. CHAMBERS. I meant that to include two.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chambers, did you know Solomon Adler?

Mr. CHAMBERS. No, I never have known and so far as I know, I never have seen Solomon Adler.

Mr. MORRIS. Did you know he was a member of the Communist organization?

Mr. CHAMBERS. I cannot testify definitely that he was. I can, however, tell you what I do know about him, which is this: That at some point, I presume in the year 1936 or 1937, J. Peters told me that one Schloma Adler——

Mr. MORRIS. Will you spell that please?

Mr. CHAMBERS. Well, I probably can't spell it any better than you can. I presume it is Schloma, S-c-h-l-o-m-a, and is a Jewish diminutive of the name Solomon. In any case, J. Peters told me that one Schloma Adler was supplying a weekly memo containing information about the United States Treasury to the Communist Party. I know nothing further about it.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, we have introduced documents into the record showing Solomon Adler's connection with the Institute of Pacific Relations, and we are going to have further testimony bearing on Mr. Adler's activity in the Far East and in the American Embassy in Nanking. That will come later. Mr. Chambers' testimony related to that fact.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chambers, did you know Len De Caux?

Mr. CHAMBERS. No; I never knew Len De Caux.

Mr. MORRIS. Did you know that he was a Communist?

Mr. CHAMBERS. Yes; I knew Len De Caux was a Communist and I knew he was in Washington, and I believe that he was here for the Federated Press roughly from 1934 through 1938.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Mandel, do you have anything at this time that we could introduce showing Len De Caux's association with the Institute of Pacific Relations?

Mr. MANDEL. I have a letter here, August 1, 1944, on the stationery of Columbia University, city of New York——

Senator FERGUSON. Prior to reading that, Mr. Chairman, I think he ought to state how you knew he was a Communist.

Mr. CHAMBERS. Again, my knowledge of his Communist is subject to a conversation with J. Peters, who at one point wanted me to meet Len De Caux, whom he thought might be helpful to the Soviet apparatus. For some reason which I have now forgotten it was never accomplished.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you ever find Peters, in these tops of the Communist organization, to be wrong on who were Communists and who were not, who could be trusted in the cause and who could not?

Mr. CHAMBERS. I have no recollection of any such occasion. It seems to me very unlikely that there would be.

Senator FERGUSON. So you always accept as truth that kind of statements by Peters and other tops?

Mr. CHAMBERS. I would have accepted any statement that Peters made about such a point.

The CHAIRMAN. I might state here at this point—I don't have to state to the Senators who are sitting here—that we are dealing with hearsay, but we are also dealing with a conspiracy, and the exception to the rule on the receipt of hearsay applies here.

Senator FERGUSON. After you establish the conspiracy, hearsay between the conspirators and statements are admissible even in a court of law.

The CHAIRMAN. That is right. Very well.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Mandel, do your records show Len De Caux's activity with the Institute of Pacific Relations?

Mr. MANDEL. Len De Caux is shown as a member of the Board of Trustees of the American Council on page 158 of a volume called Security in the Pacific, a preliminary report of the Ninth Conference of the IPR, Hot Springs, Va., January 6 to 17, 1945. I have here a letter dated August 1, 1944, from the files of the Institute of Pacific Relations on the stationery of Columbia University in the city of New York as addressed to Mr. Raymond Dennett, secretary, American Council, Institute of Pacific Relations, and signed by Philip C. Jessup. It is signed "Phil." This letter reads as follows in part:

DEAR RAY: In regard to the delegation at the conference, I am not sure what you have in mind about a secretariat for the delegation * * * the following are people whom I would include—

and among those suggested is the name of Len De Caux.

Mr. MORRIS. I would like that introduced into evidence and have it marked as the next consecutive exhibit.

The CHAIRMAN. It may be marked and inserted in the record.

(The document referred to was marked "Exhibit No. 132" and is as follows:)

EXHIBIT No. 132

COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY,
NAVAL SCHOOL OF MILITARY GOVERNMENT AND ADMINISTRATION,
August 1, 1944.

Mr. RAYMOND DENNETT,
Secretary, American Council, Institute of Pacific Relations,
New York 22, N. Y.

DEAR RAY: In regard to the delegation at the conference, I am not sure what you have in mind about a secretariat for the delegation. I do not recall that we have ever made the kind of distinction which you seem to have in mind for the American delegation. The Pacific Council provides a secretariat for the conference and some of our people have been taken by the Pacific Council for that purpose. Maybe I miss the point and if so I wish you would let me know.

The following are people whom I would include: Benjamin Kizer, Brayton Wilbur, Eric Johnston, Will Clayton, George A. Morison, Mansfield Freeman or J. A. MacKay, Lauchlin Currie, Dean Acheson, John Carter Vincent, Harry White, Rupert Emerson, Owen Lattimore, W. A. M. Burden, Abbot Low Moffat, Robert J. Watt, Len De Caux, Col. Carl Faymonville, Colonel Shoemaker, Virginius Dabney or R. E. Freeman, Walter Lippmann, Sumner Welles, Joseph Barnes, Frederick V. Field, Harold Sprout, Grayson Kirk, Ada Comstock Notestein.

In reply to yours of the 31st, I do not know Coons, but have no objection to him. I doubt if Wilson would add much but Alger Hiss would be fine.

I definitely would exclude Hunter on the ground that we have too much of the Kizer group; I would exclude Captain Pence because he is now out of the Occupied Areas Section. If either of them were available I would suggest Commodore Vanderbilt or Commodore Stassen.

I suppose we may need to invite General McCoy for organizational purposes. I do not know anything about General Bissell. Yarnell should certainly come as a vice chairman and not as a member of the American delegation. Apropos your statement below "Military" on page II, I would get away from the idea of California naming a delegate.

Personally I would exclude Swing and would add to your press people Waymack of Des Moines.

I would be careful that we do not get too stodgy a delegation but keep a balance. I think the above list is fairly good. Another Government man who would be new to us but very helpful because of his interest in native peoples and Pacific Island government is John Collier, head of the Indian service and a fine person. Let me know what you hear from the others and we will see how things add up.

Sincerely yours,

PHILIP C. JESSUP.

Frank Coe of FEA also good (penciled note).

Mr. MORRIS. Did you ever meet Mr. White in New Hampshire, Mr. Chambers?

Mr. CHAMBERS. Yes, I did.

Mr. MORRIS. Has your testimony covered that meeting with him?

Mr. CHAMBERS. At great length.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chambers, did you ever meet Edmund Clubb? I think before you answer that question, Mr. Chambers, would Mr. Mandel tell us who Edmund Clubb is.

Mr. MANDEL. The Biographical Register of the Department of State dated April 1, 1950, on page 98, lists Edmund Clubb in his most recent position as follows:

Consul General at Shanghang from May 29, 1949, at Peiping September 23, 1947. Class I, April 1949.

Senator FERGUSON. What is his present position?

Mr. MANDEL. Presumably that is his present position. I have no later data.

Mr. MORRIS. No, that is not his position. Mr. Clubb is the head of the Chinese desk, I believe.

Senator FERGUSON. In the State Department.

Mr. MORRIS. In the State Department.

The CHAIRMAN. I think that should be established by something more than that.

Senator FERGUSON. Yes. That is why I want to know what the official record shows.

Mr. MANDEL. The New York Times of July 13, 1951, refers to Oliver Edmund Clubb as director of the Office of Chinese Affairs.

Senator FERGUSON. Of the United States Department of State?

Mr. MANDEL. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. How is that spelled?

Mr. MANDEL. C-l-u-b-b.

Senator FERGUSON. Is that the same man you are talking about?

Mr. CHAMBERS. I believe it is.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chambers, did you ever meet Mr. Clubb?

Mr. CHAMBERS. Yes, I did.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you tell us the circumstances of your meeting Mr. Clubb?

Mr. CHAMBERS. Probably in June, in May or June of 1932, while I was editing the New Masses.

Mr. MORRIS. That is 1932.

Mr. CHAMBERS. 1932. While I was editing the New Masses, which is a Communist-controlled magazine, there came into my office a young man who asked to see Walt Carmon.

Mr. MORRIS. Who is Walt Carmon?

Mr. CHAMBERS. Walt Carmon had been in effect the managing editor of New Masses before I became editor.

Mr. MORRIS. Did he have any connection with the Communist underground?

Mr. CHAMBERS. Walt Carmon may or may not have had connection with the Communist underground. I don't know. He was a Communist.

This stranger seemed rather disturbed not to find Walt Carmon in the office where he expected him. Walt Carmon, in fact, wasn't any longer in the building, in the New Masses. The man, the stranger, told me his name was O. Edmund Clubb.

Senator FERGUSON. Would you recognize a picture of him?

Mr. CHAMBERS. I can no longer identify a picture of Clubb. If you realize that I spoke to him not more than 15 minutes in the year 1932, I think it is simply impossible to make a positive identification.

Senator FERGUSON. You cannot identify the picture.

Mr. CHAMBERS. I feel that other impressions bear on it, and I should not make an identification of him positively.

Senator FERGUSON. All right.

Mr. CHAMBERS. Nevertheless this man told me his name was O. Edmund Clubb, that he was a consular official of some kind at Hankow, I believe, that he was on leave of absence, and he had some kind of message which he wanted to deliver. The difficulty about my recollection of Edmund Clubb or Oliver Clubb is that I can no longer remember what that message was or even to whom it was to be delivered, but there has stayed in the back of my mind an impression which I will not testify to positively that the message was written and that it was for Grace Hutchins. Grace Hutchins is an open Communist, a member of the open Communist Party, has run on the Communist ticket in various elections, and is well known to be a Communist. But I cannot testify more positively to anything along those lines. Clubb then sat talking a little about China. Naturally I don't recall what our conversation was over that length of time, but I do remember that we talked about Hayang Arsenal. As you probably know, Hankow is one of three cities which lie close together—originally called the Wuhan cities where the Communists made their last stand when Chiang Kai-shek first swept them out. I have a further recollection, which I hesitate to make positive, that the message was from Agnes Smedley, but again I can't really testify to that positively.

Senator FERGUSON. This is your best judgment; is it?

Mr. CHAMBERS. I find it impossible, with the play of so many influences on my mind, because people are always asking me questions, bringing me information, and there are actually areas of my experience where I can no longer distinguish between what I once knew and what I have heard and learned in the course of testifying. I have given many thousands of words of testimony by now, as you know.

Mr. MORRIS. But there is no doubt about the fact that Clubb came into the New Masses office.

Mr. CHAMBERS. There is not the slightest doubt about it. He further told me that his parents lived in Minnesota and that he was going there to spend at least part of his leave with them.

Mr. MORRIS. Can you amplify any more about whether or not Clubb at that time was a member of the Communist organization?

Mr. CHAMBERS. I have no knowledge whatsoever.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Mandel, do you have anything to show that Mr. Clubb was assigned to Hankow at that particular time?

Mr. MANDEL. I read again from the State Department Register of April 1, 1950, which says that Oliver Edmund Clubb was born at South Park, Minn.; and, further, that he was vice consul at Hankow on March 12, 1931. That is obviously the date of appointment.

Mr. MORRIS. I would like to defer our introducing evidence showing Clubb's connection with the Institute of Pacific Relations.

The CHAIRMAN. I was going to ask you if you have that evidence.

Mr. MORRIS. There is that evidence; yes, sir. I would like to defer introducing that until the subject comes up the next time.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well.

Mr. MORRIS. This question is not very necessary, Mr. Chambers, but will you identify Alger Hiss to be a Communist?

Mr. CHAMBERS. Will I identify Alger Hiss to be a Communist?

Mr. MORRIS. Yes. It may not be necessary to your mind, but we are making a record here.

Mr. CHAMBERS. Yes; Alger Hiss is a Communist.

Mr. MORRIS. The reason I ask that is that we have introduced into the record in the past extensive documents showing Hiss' activity with the Institute of Pacific Relations. In fact, he was a member of the board of trustees; and, as I say, other documents show extensive activity on his part within the Institute of Pacific Relations.

Senator FERGUSON. Is there any doubt in your mind that Alger Hiss was a Communist?

Mr. CHAMBERS. None whatever.

Senator FERGUSON. You are positive of that?

Mr. CHAMBERS. Certainly.

Mr. MORRIS. I think this is all for the time being, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well. What about this afternoon?

Mr. MORRIS. We have nothing planned for this afternoon.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will rise at this time.

(Whereupon, at 2:15 p. m., the hearing recessed until 10 a. m. Wednesday, August 22, 1951.)

INSTITUTE OF PACIFIC RELATIONS

MONDAY, AUGUST 20, 1951

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE TO INVESTIGATE THE ADMINISTRATION OF THE INTERNAL SECURITY ACT AND OTHER INTERNAL SECURITY LAWS OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
Washington, D. C.

The subcommittee met at 4:30 p. m., pursuant to recess, in room 424, Senate Office Building, Senator Willis Smith presiding.

Present: Senators Willis Smith, Ferguson, and Watkins.

Also present: Mr. Robert Morris, subcommittee counsel.

Senator SMITH. The committee will come to order.

Will you take the oath, please? You solemnly swear that you will well and truly interpret unto the witness called to testify before this subcommittee of the Senate Judiciary Committee, the oath which shall be administered to him; and that you will well and truly interpret unto said witness the questions which shall be propounded him by counsel and by members of the committee and the testimony of said witness delivered before this committee, so help you God?

Mrs. TAKESHITA. I do.

Mr. KURODA. I do.

Senator SMITH. Will you take the oath, please, Mr. Yoshikawa. Do you solemnly swear that the evidence you shall give in this proceeding before the subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee of the United States Senate shall be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, so help you God?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. I do.

TESTIMONY OF MITSUSADA YOSHIKAWA, MUSASHIHO-SHI, TOKIO. DIRECTOR, SPECIAL INVESTIGATION BUREAU, ATTORNEY GENERAL'S OFFICE, JAPANESE GOVERNMENT, INTERPRETED BY MRS. KATSUYO TAKESHITA, WASHINGTON, D. C., AND REV. ANDREW Y. KURODA, WASHINGTON, D. C., OF JAPANESE SECTION, DIVISION OF ORIENTALIA, LIBRARY OF CONGRESS, WASHINGTON, D. C.

Mrs. TAKESHITA. Mitsusada Yoshikawa, who is presently the Director of the Special Bureau, Attorney General's Office, of the Japanese Government.

Mr. MORRIS. I will address the questions to you.

Mr. Yoshikawa, what is your present occupation?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. Director of the Special Investigation Bureau, Attorney General's Office.

Mr. MORRIS. Do you work for the Japanese Government officially?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. What was your position in Japan at the trial and prosecution of Richard Sorge and his associates in the Sorge espionage ring?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. I was connected with the Tokyo Criminal Court as a procurator at the time and was connected with the Tokyo Criminal District Court Procuration Bureau.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you describe your functions in that case?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. At the time of the Sorge case a group of procurators was formed to investigate the Sorge case, and I was one of them.

Senator FERGUSON. Was he a Japanese Government official?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. They were all procurators.

Senator FERGUSON. That is a Government official position?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. Were you in over-all charge of the case?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. No. There was one chief procurator assigned to the case. He was the chief of a division of the criminal affairs bureau.

Mr. MORRIS. What in particular was your function?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. There were two assistant procurators assigned to the case under the chief procurator, and one of them was I.

Mr. MORRIS. What did you do as opposed to what the other man did?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. I was appointed to carry on the investigation of the foreigners in this group.

Mr. MORRIS. Did the other man carry out the investigation of the native Japanese?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. In that capacity, did you examine Richard Sorge?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. On how many occasions?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. I believe that the arrest of Sorge took place in the latter part of November 1941, and from that day on until May 1942 the investigation of Sorge was carried on every day.

Mr. MORRIS. Did you examine him every day?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. Yes. I gave special orders to the police to carry on the investigation of Sorge in the morning, while in the afternoon I personally conducted the examination of Sorge myself. However, in the first week I carried on the investigation by myself entirely.

Mr. MORRIS. Did Sorge freely and willingly speak?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. During the first week he denied all the charges.

Mr. MORRIS. Why did he confess after 1 week?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. I believe that there are four reasons for his confession. The first reason that might be given for his confession is that much material evidence was unearthed with the arrest of these persons. In the material evidence that was discovered in the Klaussen home was a wireless apparatus for sending messages and the German Statistical Yearbook, which was used as a part of the code, and had coded messages, and also the original code. The second reason for Sorge's confession could be laid to the fact that, with the arrest of these members, practically all members of the ring were apprehended at one time. The third reason that might be given is that all the other members of the ring had given their confessions before Sorge. For instance, we had received a confession from Klaussen that he belonged to the fourth section of the Red army headquarters. Furthermore, Brando de Boukelitz was a member of the French Communists, and was in Japan as a correspondent for the Havas newspaper. It is one of the very famous news agencies in France.

Mr. MORRIS. How many reasons have you given now?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. Three reasons. I spoke to Sorge about the discovery of the material in evidence and the confessions of the other persons. It is my belief that Sorge felt much relieved that he had just about completed all the work that he had set out to do since his arrival in Japan in 1933. That is the fourth reason.

I discovered this after Sorge had made his confession. About a week before Sorge's arrest, I learned that Sorge and Klaussen and de Boukelitz gathered together in Sorge's home and met together, and they spoke this: "It seems that we have lost contact with the Japanese lately. I wonder what the reason for that is. We have just about completed all the intelligence work which we had started out to do in Japan, and we have learned what Japan is to do it this critical time. Since Germany has begun her attack on Russia, let us leave Japan and go to Germany to carry on our work, and let us do intelligence work in Germany for Moscow."

This is the sort of conversation that was carried on at the time. Sorge and his group in a sense enjoyed a feeling of relief, but they felt that they had completed a very important piece of work in Japan and had completed their mission successfully.

Senator FERGUSON. Did they say what the mission was?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. They have confessed to that in detail.

Senator FERGUSON. What was the substance of their mission?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. The important question at the time was whether Japan, after her long war in China, would send or direct her military activities to the north or to the south.

Senator FERGUSON. So, it was not only to obtain intelligence—that is, information—but they were to penetrate for the purpose of getting Japan to strike to the south rather than to strike Russia, which meant that they were to strike America and Britain rather than Russia; is that correct.

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. That was the second motive in Sorge's mission in Japan. The first was to gain objective information.

Senator FERGUSON. The second was to have this take place, though, of attacking to the south rather than attacking Russia?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. Yes.

Senator FERGUSON. How could a German like Sorge accomplish that task? Did he have some Japanese on his side?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. Sorge was not only very intimate with the German Ambassador Ott, but he was also intimate with many of the military general staff. Furthermore, a man with whom Sorge had very close connections, Ozaki, was one of the "brain trust" group in the Konoye Cabinet, and he belonged to this group which had great influence in the policy making of the Cabinet.

Furthermore, Ozaki was a top-notch newspaperman.

Senator FERGUSON. How long after the attack at Pearl Harbor was Sorge arrested? Or was it before?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. It was before Pearl Harbor.

Senator FERGUSON. How long before?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. The latter part of November 1941.

Senator FERGUSON. The attack took place on the 7th of December.

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. It was the 8th in Japan.

Senator FERGUSON. How long before that was Sorge and his group arrested?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. About 2 or 3 weeks before.

Senator FERGUSON. Did Sorge relate anything about a modus videndi between Japan and America?

Mrs. TAKESHITA. Would you explain modus vivendi?

Senator FERGUSON. An agreement or stay of proceedings, as it were, when they were negotiating prior to the attack at Pearl Harbor. A 90-day truce, as it were, in their negotiations.

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. No. Sorge's sources of information were not just the Konoye Cabinet, but also from the top officers in the military clan.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you ever hear of a proposed modus vivendi between America and Japan prior to the 8th, as you say, of December?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. No; I do not remember. Sorge considered the negotiations taking place between America and Japan as of very high importance, and he paid very, very close attention to the negotiations that were going on at the time.

Senator FERGUSON. Then Sorge did say that he was watching negotiations between America and Japan prior to the attack?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. Did Sorge confess to you more than you felt that he knew?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. Yes; almost all of it was so. All the information.

Mr. MORRIS. Did he confess more than you felt that he knew about?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. I think you have the wrong answer. Did Sorge confess to more facts than you felt that he knew?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. Yes, most of what Sorge told me was more than I knew. May I explain. The character of the Sorge group in the beginning was a great question, and if it were connected with Moscow, how did they receive instructions. All those questions were very important at the time.

Mr. MORRIS. You don't understand the question. Was Sorge a Communist when he died?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. Of course.

Mr. MORRIS. Did he freely confess to Mr. Yoshikawa secrets that Mr. Yoshikawa could never have learned otherwise?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. In part the things that I learned were entirely from Sorge's confessions and that part was a very important part.

Mr. MORRIS. If Sorge knew that another ring was operating, another spy ring was operating, does Mr. Yoshikawa think he would have confessed about that, too?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. It is my private opinion, but I don't believe that he would.

Mr. MORRIS. It is your private opinion that you don't think that he would?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. I don't think Sorge would.

Mr. MORRIS. Why not?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. If another group had been active in Japan at the time.

Mr. MORRIS. Were any coercive methods used in obtaining the confessions?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. No coercive methods were used.

Mr. MORRIS. Was there any pressure put on the prosecutors on the part of the Japanese Government?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. There was.

Mr. MORRIS. Would you explain?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. The first man in this group who was arrested was Ozaki. Ozaki was a man held in very high esteem in the Konoye Cabinet, and it was expected that the arrest of Ozaki would have a very bad political effect on the Konoye Cabinet, but Ozaki immediately upon his arrest made the confession to me that he was an international Communist. Because of that, Konoye was not able to ignore that confession and put pressure on the procurators. Furthermore, after the arrest of Ozaki, because of other political reasons, the Konoye Cabinet resigned, and it was succeeded by the Tojo Cabinet. Therefore, we did not have any political pressure put on us in the case of Ozaki, but when Sorge was arrested some pressure was put on us.

Senator FERGUSON. Was the pressure to stop prosecution, or was it to press it and carry through the prosecution?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. It was not a pressure that was strong.

Senator FERGUSON. But whatever pressure there was, which way was it?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. It was just a matter of arrest at the time. The matter of prosecution had not come up yet.

Senator FERGUSON. About getting a confession, what was the pressure?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. When Sorge was arrested, Ambassador Ott and his wife became highly indignant. The Ambassador, through the Tojo Cabinet, requested that they be allowed to see Sorge and to have a report of the case immediately.

Senator FERGUSON. As I understand it, Ott was Ambassador to Japan?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. Yes.

Seantor FERGUSON. And Sorge had some connection with the Ambassador, with the German Embassy, is that right?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. As I remember, Ott was a military attaché to the German Embassy at Nagoya at the time of the ambassadorship of Von Dirkson. From that, Sorge had become intimate with Ott from that time that he was a military attaché.

Senator FERGUSON. Did Sorge hold any positions with the Germans?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. Sorge did not have any official position, but he was considered one of the closest friends of Ott and was regarded as one of his highest advisers. Therefore Sorge had access to all the German military and political secrets, and consulted him on many matters concerning such matters. At times when the German high officials connected with the army or the Government came to Japan, out of respect for Sorge's position they would divulge many of the confidential matters to Sorge, and he would go practically every day to the German Embassy and was connected with the newspaper in the Embassy.

Senator FERGUSON. Was he a public-relations officer?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. Not in the way of liaison; no. He was just connected with a news service or a press release.

Mr. MORRIS. For the Embassy?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. Yes, for the Embassy. At one time Ott said to Sorge that he would very much like to have him attached officially to the Embassy. Although this was a very high position for Sorge, he declined. The reason for his declination was that there would be an investigation of his past and he wanted to avoid that.

Mr. MORRIS. Was the principal purpose of this ring to collect information for the Soviet Union?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. Did they carry on another function?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. As I said before, Ozaki and Sorge, working together, tried as much as possible to influence Japanese military news to the south.

Mr. MORRIS. What was their second function?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. To influence——

Mr. MORRIS. Will you give us the details of this endeavor to influence the foreign policy of Japan?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. Although his position was unofficial, he enjoyed a very high standing in the Germany Embassy, and he was also a member of the Nazi Party, and as a correspondent for the Frankfurter Zeitung he had many friends among the Japanese and the foreigners in Japan. He also knew many persons in the high military command. Ozaki also had a very important position as one of the brain trust group in the Konoye Cabinet. He also had a good reputation as a topnotch newspaperman. Through consultation between themselves they initiated this political strategy. Moscow had forbidden that they take any part in political matters, to do anything that might connect them with the Japanese Communist Party. Sorge asked Moscow whether it would be permissible for him to engage in this political maneuvering. There was no answer from Moscow to that question. Sorge took it for granted that Moscow had given silent consent and, together with Ozaki, engaged in activities that would influence Japanese foreign policies as they wished. One of their methods was of course to speak to many people about what political policy Japan should take, and also to write articles on the subject. The main points in their propaganda were as follows: The first reason was that the Reds were militarily very strong and that their social set-up was also very powerful. If Japan should go to the north, it would be very unlikely that she would be the victor.

Mr. MORRIS. When you say "go to the north," you mean attack the Soviet Union?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. Yes.

Even though Japan should send her armies into Siberia, she would find very little there that she could use, and she would probably meet with greater difficulties than she had encountered in her war with China, and historically speaking, Japan has always failed in any military missions to the north.

Moreover, should Japan send her forces to the south, she would find many resources in that area which she needs and could use.

Mr. MORRIS. When you testify that Japan should move to the south, you mean Japan should attack Great Britain, the United States and the Dutch?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. French Indochina, America, England, and the Dutch.

Mr. MORRIS. Whenever in your testimony you refer to moving to the south you mean attacking all those countries?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. Yes. I mean the dispatching of military forces to the south. By "resources" I mean great amounts of oil and rubber and other resources. For these reasons, then, it would be more advisable for Japan to go south rather than to the north.

I would like to add a few explanations as to the political position of Ozaki.

Senator FERGUSON. Ozaki is the man who was directly connected with Sorge in this espionage ring?

Mr. MORRIS. What was Mr. Ozaki's first name?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. It probably is Hozumi, but in the group which investigated him he was called Hidemi. There are many readings of Japanese characters. Although Ozaki was a Communist, his position was somewhat different from the Communist Party in Japan. The aim of the Japanese Communist Party was to work within the framework of the Japanese Communist Party in Japan, and to instigate a revolution and win political power in Japan. However, Ozaki's position differed from the Communist Party in Japan. Ozaki's position was that Japan should be Communized through the cooperative efforts of Russia, China, and Japan, and that Japan should become a satellite under the leadership of Moscow. In the many conversations with Sorge we formulated the strategy which I have described.

Senator FERGUSON. Did the Institute of Pacific Relations' name ever come into the investigation?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. Yes.

Senator FERGUSON. In what way?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. Ozaki had as one of the sources of information a person by the name of Saionji.

Mr. MORRIS. What is his first name?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. Kimikazu. The acquaintance of Ozaki and Saionji began with their attendance at a meeting at an American-Pacific conference in America.

Mr. MORRIS. That is the Institute of Pacific Relations conference, isn't it?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. Do you know in what year?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. I do not remember distinctly but I believe it was about 1937.

Senator FERGUSON. How else, if it did, did the name come into these hearings, the Institute of Pacific Relations?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. Other than that which I have just told you about, I don't remember.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like the record to show that by previous exhibits we have identified Mr. Saionji as the secretary of the Japanese Council of the Institute of Pacific Relations.

Senator SMITH. The record will so show.

Mr. MORRIS. Would you explain to us the relationship that existed between Ozaki and Saionji?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. The intimacy between Ozaki and Saionji increased with their return to Japan, and both of these men were members of the group closely connected with the Konoye Cabinet, and they were very good personal friends also.

Mr. Morris. Was Saionji arrested with the other members of the ring?

Mr. Yoshikawa. Saionji's arrest came very much later. I believe it was in the spring of 1942.

Mr. Morris. Did he give important secrets to Ozaki?

Mr. Yoshikawa. Yes, regretably, but Saionji did give many of the important state secrets to Ozaki.

Mr. Morris. Was Gunther Stein implicated in this spy ring?

Mr. Yoshikawa. He was an indirect member of the group.

Mr. Morris. Did he consciously work for the group?

Mr. Yoshikawa. Yes; he did.

Mr. Morris. Will you describe some of his activities?

Mr. Yoshikawa. According to Sorge's confession, Gunther Stein was a man well versed in economics and a man of great activity. Gunther Stein, knowing that Sorge was a member of the group connected with Moscow, cooperated with him freely. Sorge valued Gunther Stein's cooperation very highly, and it was Sorge's wish for Gunther Stein to become a direct member of the group. He proposed that to Moscow. By a "direct member" I mean a person who is registered in Moscow and receives money from Moscow, and furthermore is protected by the Moscow network.

Mr. Morris. Mr. Chairman, I would like the record to show that we introduced at a recent hearing records that Gunther Stein was the representative of the IPR in 1937 and we also introduced into the record extensive articles that he wrote for the Institute of Pacific Relations. I think the number is 21, Mr. Chairman.

Senator Smith. The record will so show.

Mr. Morris. Was Agnes Smedley a member of this spy ring?

Mr. Yoshikawa. Yes.

Mr. Morris. Were there any other Americans involved in this spy ring?

Mr. Yoshikawa. Yes. It would be a very general statement. I would not be able to give definite facts.

Senator Ferguson. How many?

Mr. Yoshikawa. Several. When Sorge was carrying on his work in Shanghai there were more than three, including Agnes Smedley.

Mr. Morris. In what year was that?

Mr. Yoshikawa. As I remember, it was about from January 1931 to December 1932.

Mr. Morris. Who were the other members in addition to Agnes Smedley who operated in the spy ring in Shanghai during that period of time?

Mr. Yoshikawa. One was an American by the name of Jacob, a newspaper correspondent.

Mr. Morris. Was Jacob his true name?

Mr. Yoshikawa. I do not believe that it was his true name.

Mr. Morris. Did you ask Sorge for his true name?

Mr. Yoshikawa. I asked him.

Mr. Morris. Did he refuse to tell you?

Mr. Yoshikawa. He smiled but did not answer me.

Mr. Morris. Did he give you a description of Jacob?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. I asked him that also but he did not give that information to me.

Mr. MORRIS. Was there any other American in the spy ring in Shanghai during that period?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. Yes; there were.

Mr. MORRIS. Who was it?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. It was a young official connected with the American consulate in Shanghai.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you get the name?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. I asked the name but Sorge did not give it to me.

Mr. MORRIS. Did he give you a description?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. I asked him that also but he would not give that information to me.

Senator FERGUSON. Did he ever give the name of Agnes Smedley?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. Yes.

Senator FERGUSON. But he wouldn't give you these other names?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. No; he did not.

Senator FERGUSON. Would not? Did you try to get the names?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. He would not give them to me, even though I asked him.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you try to get the names?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. I did not try to compel him to give the names.

Senator FERGUSON. Is that because they were in Shanghai rather than Japan?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. That was one of the reasons, yes; because we wouldn't have any jurisdiction over them in the other country.

Mr. MORRIS. Did part of the spy ring operate in Harbin, in Manchuria?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. Sorge used another group in Harbin as a mail box.

Senator FERGUSON. A mail drop?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. As a message center.

Mr. MORRIS. Did this message center deal directly with the Soviet fourth division?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. It was an intelligence group connected with the fourth section of the Red army.

Mr. MORRIS. And they operated directly under Sorge?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. No.

Mr. MORRIS. How did it operate?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. Under instructions from Moscow, this Harbin center would act as a courier, which would relay messages or wireless messages for Sorge to Moscow.

Mr. MORRIS. Did you have any reason to believe that there were Americans associated with that set-up?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. It was not I who investigated this case, but it was through one of my subordinates who investigated Max Klaussen that I obtained this. The fact that this Harbin group was used as a message center is in the statement that Sorge made to me. Although Klaussen was working under Sorge in Shanghai under the instructions from Moscow, Klaussen was attached to the Harbin group for a while. According to the procurator who investigated Klaussen, I was told that there was a wireless apparatus set up in the American consulate in Harbin.

Senator FERGUSON. Who was Klaussen? Was he a German?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. Yes; he was a German.

Senator FERGUSON. Was he the man who sent the radio messages?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. Yes; he was a wireless operator.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you ever find the wireless in the American Embassy?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. This was information which I got from the report of the procurator who investigated Klaussen.

Senator FERGUSON. But Klaussen must have then stated to the procurator that the place where he had the wireless was in the American Embassy. Is that correct?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. Klaussen stated that the wireless was in the American consulate.

Mr. MORRIS. This was a wireless of the spy ring, was it not?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. It was not an apparatus belonging to the American consulate. It was an apparatus belonging to the spy ring.

Mr. MORRIS. And they used the American consulate general's office as a headquarters?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. Yes; surprisingly it was so.

Mr. MORRIS. In what year was that?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. Around 1931 and 1932.

Mr. MORRIS. Just approximately the same time as the American operators in Shanghai?

Senator FERGUSON. 1931 and 1932?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. Yes.

Senator FERGUSON. Was this in China or Japan where the apparatus was in the Embassy?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. It was in Harbin, Manchuria.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Yoshikawa, we had testimony before this committee that Sorge relayed to his superiors the message that the German Army was going to attack the Soviet Union in the spring of 1941. Do you have any information that would confirm that?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you explain it?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. Before war had been declared between Russia and Germany, many members of the German high command came to Japan and visited the German Embassy. According to their reports, although I do not remember whether it was 150 divisions or 1,500,000 men, it was their report that this large number of the German military were massed on the Soviet-Russian border, and that they would be able to attack and accomplish the fall of Petrograd within 2 months. That was the plan of the German military. There were some differences of opinion among the Germans at the time. However, it was already decided that this plan would be put under way and that the attack would be launched. This information was not only related to Sorge by the German military officials, but also by Ambassador Ott. When Sorge heard this he was amazed at the plan and he took measures to confirm the information, and then to relay the information to Moscow.

Senator FERGUSON. Did this spy ring ever learn that there was to be an attack on America?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. In a broad sense; yes.

Senator FERGUSON. Tell us what you know about it.

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. In July, after the outbreak of the war between the Germans and the Russians, there was a mobilization of 1,300,000 men in Japan. This was a very, very large mobilization and a highly important one. Whether this large force would be deployed to the north or to the south was a question of great military importance in Japan. Along with this, the Kwantung army in Manchuria, under the pretense of special army maneuvers, mobilized the rolling force of the South Manchurian railway. Sorge was very zealous in this investigation as to whether this army would be deployed to the north or the south, and he tried to obtain this information through Ozaki.

Senator FERGUSON. Did he obtain the information that it would be used against the American, British, French, and Dutch?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. As a result of his information activities he learned that this force would be sent to the south.

Senator FERGUSON. Which meant that it would be an attack on America, the British, the Dutch, and the French, rather than upon Russia. Is that right?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. It is a question as to whether that meant it would be actual warfare to the south, but even at that time many of the Japanese forces were being sent into French Indochina. Sorge was engaged in a detailed study of the negotiations, which were taking place between America and Japan at the time. Not only was he interested in what the government was planning, but also what the military had in mind.

Senator FERGUSON. Did Sorge tell you that he learned that Japan was going to attack America?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. In October or November 1941 Sorge arrived at the conclusion that Japan would send her forces south, and sent that information to Moscow.

Senator FERGUSON. How do you reconcile that testimony with what you said before the Un-American Activities Committee that was reported in the press recently?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. I was shown a wireless message which was sent by Klaussen, carrying a message to that effect.

Senator FERGUSON. You were shown a message that had been sent by Klaussen, who was one of the spy ring, to Russia, advising Russia that it was the intention of the Japanese military forces to move south and not against Russia, is that right?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. This message also contained the sentence that Japan would attack.

Senator FERGUSON. Attack what?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. Attack the south.

Senator FERGUSON. What was the date of that message?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. I do not remember the date, but I saw the message and it brought back the fact that I had seen that. Sorge also confessed to the message.

Senator FERGUSON. Was America's name used in that message?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. I do not believe that America was mentioned as America.

Senator FERGUSON. How did you interpret the message that they would attack in the south? The Japanese were already fighting in China and in Indochina.

22848—52—pt. 2——11

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. In the attack, other places such as Java and Singapore would be included.

Senator FERGUSON. That was Dutch. Singapore was British and Java was Dutch.

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. Yes.

Senator FERGUSON. Then your language should not be interpreted either here or before the Un-American Activities Committee that the Sorge ring knew that Japan was going to attack America. Is that correct?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. Sorge stated that of necessity attacking to the south would mean going to war with America.

Senator FERGUSON. Then Sorge did tell you the name "America" in relation to the attack of Japan, is that right?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. Sorge said so.

Senator FERGUSON. Sorge said that?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. Sorge mentioned America.

Senator FERGUSON. So that as I understand it now, your testimony here under oath is that Sorge said to you that he had learned from the Japanese Government prior to the time of his arrest, which was prior to the Pearl Harbor attack on the 8th your time, the 7th our time, that he learned that an attack by the Japanese would be made upon America?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. Sorge stated so.

Senator FERGUSON. The answer is yes, that he did state so, is that correct?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. Did Sorge visit any American Communist en route to Japan?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. He stated so; yes. But on the details of that matter, I had the police make the investigation.

Mr. MORRIS. What was the result of the investigation?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. After his stay in China, Sorge went to Moscow and then he left for Japan from Moscow by way of America. At the time he made arrangements to have a Japanese Communist in America join him in his activities in Japan. I do not know definitely just whom he met and where he met them.

Mr. MORRIS. Who was the American Communist? What was the American Communist's name?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. I had given instructions to the procurator, the policeman Okashi, to investigate the matter, but I do not believe that Sorge disclosed the man's name.

Mr. MORRIS. Do you know whether Ushiba was ever a Japanese Communist?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. I do not believe that he was a member of the Communist Party.

Mr. MORRIS. Do you know that Tsuru was ever a Japanese Communist Party?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. I had never heard that he was a member of the Communist Party.

Mr. MORRIS. Was he active in Communist activities?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. While I was investigating this case I did not hear anything of that nature.

Mr. MORRIS. Do you know of any instance whereby the American Communists aided the Japanese Communists in Japan?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. Yes, I do.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you explain it to us, please?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. It was before the arrest of Sorge, and I believe it was in either 1937 or 1938. It was a period in which the Japanese Communist Party has been greatly weakened and was in a state of disorganization. It was a very important matter to the Japanese Communists that the party be reorganized. However, that was not possible at the time with their own strength alone, and unless they received help from Moscow they would not be able to attain that end. We had the instance that at this time the Japanese branch of the Communist Party in America gave aid to the Japanese Communists in Japan.

Mr. MORRIS. You mean those Japanese and Japanese-Americans in the American Communist Party?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. Not only the Japanese. Although the group was made up of Japanese, there were also other Americans who participated in this aid. The methods which they employed were as follows: They put out a very good publication by the name of International Correspondence or Kokusai Tsuhin. The contents of this publication were directed toward propaganda in Japan, taking up the current problems of that time within Japan, and gave instructions as to what steps should be taken by the Japanese Communists and it was also a very radical magazine. Another publication which was put out was the Taiheiyo Rodo-sha, which in translation means the Pacific Worker. It was a magazine put out by an organization which endeavored to bring into close relations the various radical trade unions of the various countries bordering on the Pacific. This office published this publication. This publication was published in Japanese also, and it took up practical problems such as what the Japanese Communists should do within the labor organizations in Japan. This publication was sent by mail to all the right, center, and left labor front organizations and labor organizations in Japan.

Mr. MORRIS. Is it Mr. Yoshikawa's testimony that these publications were put out by American Communists in aid of the Japanese Communist Party because its ranks had been depleted by the Reds in Japan?

Mr. YOSHIKAWA. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. I haven't any other questions.

Senator SMITH. I want to thank you very much for your participation and testimony here.

The committee stands adjourned.

(Whereupon, at 6:26 p. m. the committee was recessed subject to the call of the Chair.)

INSTITUTE OF PACIFIC RELATIONS

WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 22, 1951

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE TO INVESTIGATE THE ADMINISTRATION OF THE INTERNAL SECURITY ACT AND OTHER INTERNAL SECURITY LAWS OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
Washington, D. C.

The subcommittee met at 10 a.m., pursuant to call, in room 424 Senate Office Building, Senator Pat McCarran (chairman), presiding.

Present: Senators McCarran, O'Conor, Smith, Ferguson, and Watkins.

Also present: Senator Welker; J. G. Sourwine, committee counsel; Robert Morris, subcommittee counsel; Benjamin Mandel, research director.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will come to order.

Mr. Budenz, will you be sworn? You do solemnly swear that the testimony that you are about to give before the Judiciary Committee of the United States Senate will be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, so help you God?

Mr. BUDENZ. I do.

The CHAIMAN. Proceed, Mr. Morris.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Budenz, will you give your name and address to the reporter, please.

TESTIMONY OF LOUIS FRANCIS BUDENZ, CRESTWOOD, N. Y.

Mr. BUDENZ. Louis Francis Budenz, Crestwood, N. Y.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Budenz, where were you born?

Mr. BUDENZ. Indianapolis, Ind.

Mr. MORRIS. What is your present occupation?

Mr. BUDENZ. Assistant professor of economics at Fordham University.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Budenz, were you ever a member of the Communist Party?

Mr. BUDENZ. Yes, sir, I was a member of the Communist Party and of its national committee.

Mr. MORRIS. For how long were you a member of the Communist Party?

Mr. BUDENZ. For 10 years.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you tell us what positions you held in the Communist Party?

Mr. BUDENZ. I held quite a few positions, and I will give some of them.

Mr. MORRIS. Yes, give the more notable ones, Mr. Budenz.

Mr. BUDENZ. That is right. I was labor editor of the Daily Worker, editor of the Midwest Daily Record—that was a Communist paper in Chicago—managing editor of the Daily Worker and president of the corporation publishing that paper, a member of the national committee of the Communist Party, as I have stated, chairman of the Commission on Publications, penetrating various publications for the Communist Party, and a member of the radio commission, penetrating the radio industry. There were other assignments.

Mr. MORRIS. For how long were you a member of the national committee of the Communist Party?

Mr. BUDENZ. Nine years, six of them public, three of them secret.

Mr. MORRIS. And when did you break with the Communist Party, Mr. Budenz?

Mr. BUDENZ. October 11, 1945.

Mr. MORRIS. Now, since that time, Mr. Budenz, have you cooperated with Government agencies in trying to eliminate Communists from positions of power?

Mr. BUDENZ. Yes, to the best of my ability, that is, working with the Federal Bureau of Investigation upon their request, and also always on subpena.

Mr. MORRIS. Well, could you just give us a general idea to what extent, say in hours contributed to the Federal Bureau of Investigation?

Mr. BUDENZ. During the last 5 years I have contributed 3,000 hours, approximately, to the Federal Bureau of Investigation in questions directed to me and in the research required by those questions.

Mr. MORRIS. Were you a witness at the trial of the 11 Communists?

Mr. BUDENZ. I was the first witness at the trial of the 11 Communists, and I might say that I was on the witness stand 10 days at that time.

Mr. MORRIS. Could you tell us if you were also a witness at the Santo and Peters proceedings, the deportation proceedings against Santo and J. Peters?

Mr. BUDENZ. I was a witness for the Government against Santo and J. Peters, Soviet agents, and as a matter of fact I might say I was the chief witness against J. Peters, who was one of the chief Soviet espionage agents in this country. After my testimony, both of these men agreed to go to Europe voluntarily.

Mr. MORRIS. And were you responsible for the exposure of Gerhard Eisler?

Mr. BUDENZ. In 1936, I stated publicly that Gerhard Eisler was a representative of the Communist International. That was confirmed thereafter. And I was a witness at one of his trials.

Mr. MORRIS. What trial was that, Mr. Budenz?

Mr. BUDENZ. That was the trial down here in Washington, in which he was convicted.

Mr. MORRIS. Convicted of what?

Mr. BUDENZ. Well, I am not sure.

Senator FERGUSON. Perjury, was it not, on the passport?

Mr. BUDENZ. I think that was it.

Mr. MORRIS. And then there were other contributions that you have made to various Government agencies, were there not, Mr. Budenz?

Mr. BUDENZ. Yes, sir, I have appeared many times before the House Committee on Un-American Activities. I think it is 14 times. And before the House Labor Committee, before the Senate committee which was chaired by Senator Ferguson, and before the committee under the chairmanship of Senator Tydings. Just recently, I appeared for the New York Board of Education in the educational situation there as an expert on Marxism and Leninism, and most recently the State of New York subpenaed me in the case of the International Workers Order, which now by court order has been declared to be dissolved.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Budenz, this committee is conducting an inquiry into the Institute of Pacific Relations. We are going to ask you a series of questions, all of which will be related, either directly or indirectly, to the Institute of Pacific Relations. And we are going to ask you, to the best of your ability, to answer all these questions.

At the outset, Mr. Budenz, were you in a position in the Communist Party where you would have access to more secrets, to the identity of more people, than the ordinary Communist?

Mr. BUDENZ. Most decidedly. Indeed, more than the normal member of the national committee.

Mr. MORRIS. Why is that, Mr. Budenz?

Mr. BUDENZ. As managing editor of the Daily Worker, it was essential that I know the various delicate turns and twists of the line; not only of the line but of the emphasis of the line in the particular period of time.

The CHAIRMAN. When you say "line" in that respect, what do you mean, Mr. Budenz?

Mr. BUDENZ. I mean the Communist viewpoint at that particular moment, the Communist objective. This has nothing to do fundamentally with the Communist philosophy, except that it is an expression of it in action during a period of time. And that had to be emphasized in the Daily Worker, not merely as to what the line was but as to its various delicate nuances, if I may use that term. The Daily Worker is not a daily paper in the normal sense of the word. It is the telegraph agency of the conspiracy giving directives to the conspirators.

Mr. MORRIS. On individuals?

Mr. BUDENZ. On individuals likewise. It was a matter of political life and death to have a correct viewpoint of the various individuals who were dealt with by the Daily Worker.

Senator FERGUSON. Is it the same today as it was in your day?

Mr. BUDENZ. What is that?

Senator FERGUSON. Is the Daily Worker now a telegraph agency for the men in the conspiracy?

Mr. BUDENZ. Well, I can't testify of my own first-hand knowledge.

Senator FERGUSON. But as to what you see in it?

Mr. BUDENZ. Yes, sir. It is the telegraph agency of the conspiracy. That is its sole function. It parades under the guise of a daily paper in order to protect itself through the cry of freedom of the press, but it is not concerned primarily with how much circulation it has. The circulation sometimes has gone down to 8,000 a day. Its concern is to get out every day to the Communists throughout the country, the active ones, the instructions upon which they are to act. It is used in that way, by the way.

Mr. MORRIS. Now, Mr. Budenz, from the eyes of the then editor of the Daily Worker and a member of the national committee of the Communist Party, what was your opinion of the Institute of Pacific Relations? What did you know of the Institute of Pacific Relations?

Mr. BUDENZ. What I know is perhaps the better way to put it, because I was at Politburo meetings and in consultation with members of the Politburo constantly. As a matter of fact, day by day I was in consultation. And frequently I was at Politburo meetings because of my position. The Politburo in these discussions declared the Institute of Pacific Relations repeatedly to be a captive organization, completely under control of the Communist Party.

Mr. MORRIS. You say the Institute of Pacific Relations was a captive organization?

Mr. BUDENZ. That is correct.

Mr. MORRIS. Completely under the control of the Communist Party?

Mr. BUDENZ. That is correct.

Senator FERGUSON. When was that, Mr. Budenz?

Mr. BUDENZ. This was during the entire period of my membership in the Communist Party.

Senator FERGUSON. That would be from 1935 to 1945?

Mr. BUDENZ. 1935 to 1945.

We have to distinguish according to the Communist parlance between captive organizations and fronts. Communist fronts are those created by the Communist Party itself. Captive organizations are those penetrated successfully and taken over. That is to say, the policies are under control of the party, although not necessarily all the personnel is.

The United Electrical, Radio, and Machine Workers Union is a very splendid example of that in the trade-union field. That was an organization that was certainly not Communist. The overwhelming majority of its members were not Communists. But it was completely controlled by the Communists. And the Institute of Pacific Relations was viewed in the same light.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Budenz, you mentioned the Politburo. Would you dwell on that somewhat, so that we may know exactly what you mean by that, for the record?

Mr. BUDENZ. Yes, Mr. Chairman. The Politburo is the name used by the Communists for the political bureau of the Communist Party, whose name has now been changed to the National Board. Many of these Communist organs undergo many changes of name, either for conspiratorial reasons, to avoid legal identification later, or for some other purpose. The term "Politburo" though, was the original name. That is to say, it was modeled after the Politburo in Moscow, and on the same leadership principle.

It is the governing body insofar as there can be one, in America, of the Communist Party, although it receives its instructions from the Communist International representatives.

The CHAIRMAN. You say it is called what, now?

Mr. BUDENZ. The National Board of the Communist Party.

Senator FERGUSON. You are talking about the American section, which is tied directly to the Moscow section; is that correct?

Mr. BUDENZ. That is correct. The Moscow directing body, that is, the political body of the Soviet Union, is called the Politburo. But that is the Moscow Politburo. I am speaking about the American Politburo.

Senator FERGUSON. I understood.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Budenz, would you say there was a cell, a Communist cell, operating within the Institute of Pacific Relations?

Mr. BUDENZ. Yes, sir. As a matter of fact, Alexander Trachtenberg, in these political bureau discussions, emphasizing the importance of the work of this cell, described the Institute of Pacific Relations as "The little red schoolhouse for teaching certain people in Washington how to think with the Soviet Union in the Far East."

Mr. MORRIS. I wonder if you would tell us who Alexander Trachtenberg is, Mr. Budenz?

Mr. BUDENZ. Alexander Trachtenberg is one of the most important members of the Communist conspiracy in this country. He is the cultural commissar of the Communists in this country. He has published all the authorized works of Marx, Engels, Lenin, and Stalin, and all other works authorized by the Marx-Engels-Lenin Institute in Moscow. Through his hands these works have to go. He is technically the head of International Publishers, but he is vested with much more authority, with reference to the Daily Worker. He is in charge of the whole cultural work of the party, or at least he was when I was in the party.

Mr. MORRIS. And is it your testimony that the Communists use the Institute of Pacific Relations to influence foreign policy?

Mr. BUDENZ. That is right.

Senator FERGUSON. Is there any doubt in your mind, Mr. Budenz, that when a man like Trachtenberg is speaking about this being an educational process, this IPR, here in Washington—and I take it that is what is meant by the "little red schoolhouse"—that that was an actual fact, that he knew what he was talking about, because of his tie-in in the whole Communist activity?

Mr. BUDENZ. Yes, sir; and because he knew it through the reports which were received from the Communists within the Institute of Pacific Relations, largely through Frederick Vanderbilt Field.

Senator FERGUSON. And when he was giving this information, you being the managing editor of the Daily Worker, these were instructions to you as part of the party line here in America?

Mr. BUDENZ. It was an observation in the Politburo, a political observation, a conclusion.

Senator FERGUSON. So that it was information that you might be able to operate on in the future if necessity required?

Mr. BUDENZ. Absolutely.

Senator FERGUSON. And therefore had to be accurate?

Mr. BUDENZ. Every Communist judgment has to be carried in some form into action.

Senator FERGUSON. And it had to be accurate for you to carry on; is that correct?

Mr. BUDENZ. Communist information among themselves is absolutely accurate. It must be. It is the foundation of their work.

Senator FERGUSON. You see, we hear a lot said about so much evidence in this conspiracy being hearsay. And I am trying to get at the point as to what weight this committee can give to hearsay of this nature. Are you able to tell the committee now that in your opinion this is, let us say, a hearsay that deserves consideration by a committee?

Mr. BUDENZ. This is an official communication between leaders of the conspiracy.

Senator FERGUSON. Among themselves?

Mr. BUDENZ. That is right. An estimate of their work among themselves, borne out, however, by other corroborating facts. The fact that Mr. Frederick Vanderbilt Field was secretary of the American council, among other acts and other incidents of that sort which we cannot go into now in detail, support this judgment.

Senator FERGUSON. In other words, there is so much supporting evidence around this hearsay that you feel absolutely certain this morning when you are giving this testimony that this was a fact?

Mr. BUDENZ. Oh, I could not be more certain if I had heard this said within the Institute of Pacific Relations itself.

Senator FERGUSON. I wanted to get your idea on this question.

Mr. BUDENZ. It was based on reports by Frederick Vanderbilt Field, an official of the Institute of Pacific Relations.

Senator FERGUSON. He was really the man who reported to your agency?

Mr. BUDENZ. That is correct.

Senator FERGUSON. So that it was coming from the Institute of Pacific Relations among the coconspirators and giving it to all of them, so that they may operate and act upon it?

Mr. BUDENZ. That is correct.

Senator WATKINS. May I ask: Could it be possible that Mr. Field was mistaken, that he just thought they were acting that way; that he really did not have members of the party in their sufficiently strong to influence it?

Mr. BUDENZ. Well, I believe that he was not. In fact, I have knowledge that there were a considerable number of Communists within the Institute of Pacific Relations.

Senator WATKINS. Have you given the committee the names of those that you say you have no knowledge were members?

Mr. BUDENZ. I have.

Senator WATKINS. That will come out later, I suppose.

Mr. MORRIS. No; that hasn't come out yet, Senator.

Mr. Budenz, will you tell us how this cell operated in connection with the Politburo, this cell that operated within the Institute of Pacific Relations? Will you tell us structurally how it was connected to the Politburo of the Communist Party of the United States?

Mr. BUDENZ. Of course, this cell, as all Communist cells, changed from time to time in personnel. It was largely, though, linked up with Amerasia and was a joint cell with Amerasia, and it operated by Frederick Vanderbilt Field, an officer of the Institute of Pacific Relations, reporting to the Politburo on the activities of the cell within the Institute of Pacific Relations, and the results of these activities.

Mr. MORRIS. Now, could you tell us, Mr. Budenz, approximately how many times you were present at meetings of the National Committee or the Politburo of the Communist Party, at which Field, as secretary of the Institute of Pacific Relations, reported on the activities of the cell in the Institute of Pacific Relations, approximately?

Mr. BUDENZ. Well, that would be very hard to state. The meetings were irregular. I should say four or five times a year.

Mr. MORRIS. Four or five times a year, or for a period of 10 years?

Mr. BUDENZ. That is right. With the exception of my being in Chicago, although even then Field did report to the Politburo in my presence when I was in from Chicago.

Mr. MORRIS. And when you say that he reported to the Politburo, did he at the same time receive instructions from the Politburo to carry on his work?

Mr. BUDENZ. Most definitely. That was the purpose of his report.

Mr. MORRIS. So there were two purposes then: to report in on the activities of the institute and at the same time receive directives from higher authorities in the Communist organization?

Mr. BUDENZ. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. Right at that point, Senator Ferguson's observation a few minutes ago dwelling on the subject of hearsay testimony brings my attention back to a remark that I heard over the radio the following morning from the date on which the chairman made reference to the fact that hearsay testimony may be received on certain conditions. The authorities are unanimous that hearsay testimony is not ordinarily to be received. One of the exceptions is in the establishment of a conspiracy. All of the authorities are unanimous that where a conspiracy is being established or has been established, then hearsay testimony under an exception to the rule may be received. The remark made over the radio was to the effect that this was testimony of a nature which would never be received in any court of justice. The gentleman who made the remark might stand corrected by reading Wigmore on Evidence or any one of the other standard works on evidence.

Senator FERGUSON. Yes. I think I ought to put in the record the same idea that I have. And I do not wish to accuse any newspaper of misquoting what we said here, because I know the difficulty of giving accuracy on legal matters. As to those of us who are trained in the law, it is an easy matter for us, but sometimes we feel that there are misquotations. I felt there was a misquotation on the radio and in the press on this question of hearsay. I want it understood that I have said as a lawyer, and I say it now, that after a conspiracy has been established statements between coconspirators are always admissible in evidence.

The CHAIRMAN. As an exception to the rule.

Senator FERGUSON. As an exception to the hearsay rule. And that applies in criminal cases. As a former member of the bench, I applied the rule. It has been affirmed in Michigan decisions in conspiracy cases and in cases that I tried on the bench.

So I feel that I have made a study of it and there is no question about it. But it has to be applied, that when the conspiracy has been established then the statements among the coconspirators, as we find here in this case, are admissible in evidence even in courts of law.

That is the reason I was asking my questions on what you felt about this hearsay, how it was, and what weight you were giving it. Because we, as members of this committee, must weigh all of the evidence.

The CHAIRMAN. You may continue, Mr. Morris. I am sorry to interrupt.

Senator WATKINS. May I observe that this is not a court, and nobody is actually being tried here. It is an investigation, and it is not bound by the same rules that a court of law would be bound by.

The CHAIRMAN. No; you are entirely right, Senator. But it has been the desire of the chairman to follow what he deems to be orderly procedure under what he understands to be and knows to be court procedure as nearly as we can, so as not to get off into a wild field where there is no limitation.

Senator WATKINS. I greatly appreciate the chairman's statement on that, and I have admired his conduct of this hearing and the adherence to these rules of evidence, even though we are not required in this type of an investigation to observe them. I think it is being conducted on a very high plane. I say that as a former judge who has tried conspiracy cases and is acquainted with the rule just referred to by the chairman and Senator Ferguson.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you, Senator.

Mr. MORRIS. May I point out, Mr. Chairman, lest anyone have the wrong impression here, that the overwhelming bulk of Mr. Budenz's testimony here today will be events that he experienced.

The CHAIRMAN. The only reason that the chairman brought it up is that I was reminded of the remark by a well-meaning commentator who evidently did not catch the real meaning of my expression.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Budenz, will you describe a few of those many meetings of the Politburo that you attended and heard Frederick Field report and receive directives with respect to the Politburo? Will you take a few of those meetings, some of the more notable ones, and describe exactly what happened as you recall it from your own personal experience?

Mr. BUDENZ. Necessarily, many of these meetings will not be recalled with any great clarity as such. However, the first meeting, necessarily, at which I met Mr. Field, impressed itself on me. That was in 1937, when he was introduced to me by J. Peters as Comrade Frederick Spencer. This was a meeting called of certain members of the Politburo and of others interested in China work—Harry Gannes, foreign editor of the Daily Worker, J. Peters, Ferruci Marini, whose name was also Fred Brown in the Communist Party—to receive a report of Browder.

Mr. MORRIS. Now, are they important Communists, Mr. Budenz?

Mr. BUDENZ. Oh, yes. These are representatives of the Communist International, to whom I have referred.

Mr. MORRIS. Are they leaders of the Communist underground movement?

Mr. BUDENZ. They were at that time.

Mr. MORRIS. Just develop a little bit of their importance. Most of their names this committee is not acquainted with.

Mr. BUDENZ. J. Peters should be known by now. He was the chief espionage agent for the Communist International apparatus. He was the link or liaison officer between the Communist International apparatus in this country and the Soviet secret police. That is on record in my testimony against him in his deportation proceeding. His other activities have been aired in other investigations.

Mr. MORRIS. How about Mr. Gannes?

Mr. BUDENZ. Well, he is now dead. He was then foreign editor of the Daily Worker. Every foreign editor of the Daily Worker is knee deep in the conspiratorial apparatus, particularly in regard to international communications. And this was true of Harry Gannes, who had been to China and had many very close connections with many underground groups and individuals in connection with China.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you describe who Brown was?

Mr. BUDENZ. Brown was the man who was in charge of the organization and the preparation of the party for, I should say, violent operations. He had charge of the organizational work for the Communist International of the Communist Party. There were other members of the political bureau there, but I just cannot recall them, because they changed from time to time.

Mr. MORRIS. You say Browder was present, Mr. Budenz?

Mr. BUDENZ. Oh, yes. He made the report that day.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you describe what happened at that meeting as you recall it from your own personal experience?

Mr. BUDENZ. At that meeting Earl Brower declared that we had to end the business of speaking so loudly about the Chinese Communists as being champions of Soviet conditions as in Russia. Although we had begun to taper off on that, we had to emphasize their democratic character. And he described them as being represented as North Dakota nonpartisan leaguers. He likewise said that we should bring out the full democratic content of the Communist movement and particularly the fact that they represented Asia for the Asiatics against white imperialism, and were for the complete independence and democratization of Asia.

Mr. MORRIS. Up to that time, how were you treating the Chinese Communists?

Mr. BUDENZ. Up until that time largely we had treated them very extremely, as champions of a Soviet China completely. In fact, the Communist propaganda used to talk about Soviet China in those provinces under Red rule. I say during the time when the transition was taking place, however, there had been a tapering off of that, but there had not been any sharp decision upon the matter.

Mr. MORRIS. And that is as much as you can reall about that particular meeting at this time, Mr. Budenz?

Mr. BUDENZ. There is more about the meeting if you wish me to go into it.

Mr. MORRIS. Yes, I wish you would, Mr. Budenz.

Mr. BUDENZ. Because at that meeting it was decided that Owen J. Lattimore, because of his position, should more or less initiate or supervise the matter of having writers and authors and people in public opinion take up this attitude.

Mr. MORRIS. And when you said "because of his position," what did you mean by that, Mr. Budenz?

Mr. BUDENZ. Because of his being in a position where he was not —For instance, Field's connections with the Communist Party were very close at that time, even, and were fairly well known in quite a circle. And then in addition to that, Lattimore was supposed to have quite an influence in the publishing world.

Mr. MORRIS. Now, was Lattimore discussed as a Communist?

Mr. BUDENZ. Instructions were given to him as a member of the Communist cell, yes, sir. That is, through Field; not in person.

Mr. MORRIS. And you say instructions were given by the Politburo to Lattimore through Field that he should do some work in connection with the change of policy?

Mr. BUDENZ. That is correct.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you explain what he was supposed to do in connection with that?

Mr. BUDENZ. The details were not worked out. As a matter of fact, that is a common Communist procedure, that the details are not worked up. They are left to the initiative of the individual. They are checked on later. And his success or failure is commented upon.

Senator O'CONOR. Mr. Chairman, could I ask a question right there?

Mr. Budenz, you of course have demonstrated clearly your close association with the operations and your knowledge of the men who were taking an active and an influential part. I would like to ask you just a question or two concerning Owen Lattimore.

Mr. BUDENZ. Yes, sir.

Senator O'CONOR. The question suggests itself as to whether his name might just have been used loosely, or whether in fact, from your knowledge of everything, he was identified actively and knowingly with the Communist movement?

Mr. BUDENZ. He was specifically mentioned as a member of the Communist cell under instructions. There was no loose mention of his name.

Senator O'CONOR. Do you recall just what position he held at that time, if any, with either IPR or with any other movement, either as a captive organization or as a front?

Mr. BUDENZ. I don't specifically. It is my impression that he was the editor of their publication. As a matter of fact, there was reference to the fact that he was—yes, he was the editor of their publication.

The CHAIRMAN. Whose publication? You say "their publication."

Mr. BUDENZ. This was Pacific Affairs, if I remember correctly. They had two.

Senator O'CONOR. I was wondering whether in their operations there was any possible code designation that might either have attached to him or in any way might have identified him if he were actually an active member.

Mr. BUDENZ. Yes, sir. Later on; not in connection with this meeting.

Senator O'CONOR. No, I said that because you have mentioned his name in connection with the meeting.

Mr. BUDENZ. During the course of time the Politburo issued for a number of years, from the time when I first entered the party, in 1935, or rather from the time I became a member of the national committee, in 1936, to all members of the national committee, an onionskin report of all their proceedings in great detail. However, people in key or delicate positions were designated either by blanks, when they were easily described by the circumstances, or by initials. Now, Lattimore was described as L or XL in these onionskins.

The CHAIRMAN. What do you mean by an onionskin?

Mr. BUDENZ. I mean onionskin paper, these light papers sent around. They were sent around to every member of the national committee up until 1940 and 1941. During the Hitler-Stalin pacts they were ended, through fear that the onionskins would be used against the Communist Party.

Senator O'CONOR. And was that done frequently? That is to say, was his designation indicated on frequent occasions?

Mr. BUDENZ. Well, rather frequent. I can't designate the number.

Senator O'CONOR. From it all, Mr. Budenz, would you say as to his connection with the movement whether his position in the entire movement was an important one or an unimportant one?

Mr. BUDENZ. His position from the viewpoint of the Communist Party was a very important one. It was particularly stressed in the political bureau that his great value lay in the fact that he could bring the emphasis in support of Soviet policy in language which was non-Soviet. And they consider that a very valuable asset. I could give you many quotations on that. It was discussed more than once.

Senator FERGUSON. What was Field's designation?

Mr. BUDENZ. Field was Secretary——

Senator FERGUSON. No. In this onionskin paper.

Mr. BUDENZ. Well, he first was designated under the name of Spencer. Where they had false names like that, they used "Spencer." And for quite a while he went under the name of Spencer and then he went under his initial of F.

Senator FERGUSON. Just under F?

Mr. BUDENZ. That is right.

Senator FERGUSON. Then when XL, who was Owen Lattimore, you say—is that right?

Mr. BUDENZ. That is correct.

Senator FERGUSON. Were you in high authority given the interpretation of what these initials were on these onionskins, so that when you would read them you would know who would make the statement and who was designated?

Mr. BUDENZ. Only upon inquiry. And I had to inquire, since I was editor of the paper in Chicago, the Midwest Daily Record.

Senator FERGUSON. Over what period, would you say, was Lattimore described in these onionskin sheets of paper? Over what period of time?

Mr. BUDENZ. I should say about 4 years. It ended in 1940 or 1941.

Senator FERGUSON. About 4 years?

Mr. BUDENZ. That is right.

Senator FERGUSON. And part of this plan was to change the thinking here in Washington and in America on the Communist activities in China and its relation to the Soviet Union. Was that correct?

Mr. BUDENZ. That is correct; not only on China, but on the whole Far East, to advance the Soviet objectives in the Far East.

Senator FERGUSON. Was it ever discussed in these meetings that Owen Lattimore was a man who could put out propaganda and conceal the Communist activity, but still have it carry out the policy of the Communists?

Mr. BUDENZ. That was precisely the estimate given, that the weight of his discussions was always along the lines of the Soviet policy, but that they were expressed in that language, which was non-Soviet in character.

Senator FERGUSON. And therefore terms that designated that it was coming out of Russia were avoided; is that correct?

Mr. BUDENZ. That is correct.

Senator FERGUSON. But still carrying out the Communist line?

Mr. BUDENZ. That is correct.

Senator O'Conor. If I might just ask a question there: Mr. Budenz, did I understand you to say that Owen Lattimore was designated for the purpose of exerting influence on the Japanese as well as the China policy?

Mr. Budenz. That was later on, to my knowledge.

But during this period we are speaking of, most of the emphasis was on China.

Senator O'Conor. On China. I understand. I did not want to anticipate what you might come to later, but just so that we can get the connection, it did happen that subsequently he was referred to as exerting an influence on the Japanese policy as well as on China?

Mr. Budenz. That is correct.

Senator O'Conor. And continuously over 4 years, you would say, these matters continued, in relation to which he was supposed to exercise an influence on the China policy as well?

Mr. Budenz. Yes. There may have been some gaps.

Senator O'Conor. But it, however, started from a time and did not end until 4 years thereafter.

Mr. Budenz. That is in regard to that particular incident. However, there were other references.

The Chairman. You used the term "during this period," Mr. Budenz. I wonder if you would, just for the record, and for clarification, state what the period was, what years?

Mr. Budenz. Well, that was the years 1937 or 1936, to 1940 and 1941. That is the years of the onionskin papers. We are only discussing them at the present moment, as I understand it.

Senator O'Conor. That is right.

Mr. Morris. Mr. Budenz, we were discussing this 1937 meeting of the politburo, and Mr. Lattimore's name came up, and we had this series of questions.

Senator Ferguson. Before you take that up, I would like, along the line of the thinking that we were carrying out, to have you read two paragraphs in a letter that is already in evidence, dated July 10, 1938. I will mark those two paragraphs.

The Chairman. What is that exhibit, Senator?

Senator Ferguson. I will try and find it.

Mr. Morris. It is exhibit No. 4, Senator.

Senator Ferguson. Will you read them aloud, so that they will go in the record?

The Chairman. Gentlemen, I wanted an executive meeting before we commenced this hearing this morning, but members of the committee were not present. I would like to take about 5 or 10 minutes now in recess, if the members of the committee would come with me to the rear room for just a minute, please.

(A short recess was taken.)

The Chairman. The committee will come to order.

Senator Ferguson. Mr. Budenz, getting back to that memorandum, that exhibit 4 that I gave you to read, what do you have to say about the language in that? Is that in your opinion carrying out what was expressed about Owen Lattimore?

Mr. Budenz. I think it is a splendid example; yes, sir.

Senator Ferguson. That he was telling the IPR in effect that the policy of the Communists in Russia was to be carried out, but it was to be carried out, how, as he says?

The CHAIRMAN. I think the whole excerpt should be read, Senator.

Senator FERGUSON. Yes. And then comment on it as you go along, explaining how it does carry out the purpose for which Lattimore was to be used by the Communist Party.

Mr. BUDENZ (reading):

I think that you are pretty cagey in turning over so much of the China section of the inquiry to Asiaticus, Han-seng, and Chi. They will bring out the absolutely essential radical aspects, but can be depended on to do it with the right touch.

For the general purposes of this inquiry it seems to me that the good scoring position, for the IPR, differs with different countries. For China, my hunch is that it will pay to keep behind the official Chinese Communist position—far enough not to be covered by the same label—but enough ahead of the active Chinese liberals to be noticeable.

That is a typical Lattimore method which was approved by the Politburo. That is, to not appear to be a Communist, but to forward the burden, as I have said, of the Communist line, to throw the weight into Communist support.

Senator FERGUSON. To carry it out, but not let it appear that in carrying it out you, the man who is advocating it, is a Communist.

Mr. BUDENZ. That is correct.

And as a matter of fact, beyond that, to influence people who are non-Communists by appearing even to present it in non-Communist approaches and in non-Communist language:

For Japan, on the other hand, hang back as not to be inconveniently ahead of the Japanese liberals, who cannot keep up, whereas the Chinese liberals can. So the chief thing is to oppose the military wing of Japanese aggression in China, counting on a check there to take care of both the military and the civilian components of aggression in Japan.

Well, there is a lot about the British here, and the French.

Senator FERGUSON. I wish you would go to the Russian part.

Mr. BUDENZ (reading):

For the U. S. S. R.—back their international policy in general, but without using their slogans and above all without giving them or anybody else an impression of "subservience."

That, again, is indicative of the method of expression to which I have referred. This was to throw the weight of support to the U. S. S. R., not to American policy, but to the U. S. S. R.

Senator FERGUSON. And to do it in such a way that the American people and the other people would not feel that it was being advocated by a Communist.

Mr. BUDENZ. By anyone subservient, namely, by a Communist; that is correct.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, coming back to the question: Is that the position that you say Lattimore, Owen Lattimore, was described in this meeting as having the capacity to take, to carry out the policy of the Communists?

Mr. BUDENZ. Yes, sir; in that meeting, and on a number of other occasions.

Mr. MORRIS. Senator Ferguson, the witness is prepared today to testify to five episodes concerning Owen Lattimore, and we are going to come to those later.

Senator FERGUSON. That will probably cover this.

But I did at this time, when he brought up this question of Owen Lattimore's position with the party, want to ask him his opinion as in this letter written by Mr. Lattimore to Mr. Carter, exhibit 4, as to whether this did in his opinion carry out that policy.

And your answer is——

Mr. BUDENZ. That is a very fine example of the expression of Mr. Lattimore to which reference was made with approval.

Senator O'CONOR. Before you leave that, you made mention in answer to a question by Senator Ferguson that this was a typical Lattimore method, or words to that effect.

Would you say that he continued to operate in that manner? Or did he change after it?

Could you say whether or not he has until recent times continued in that line?

Mr. BUDENZ. I, of course, am confining myself to such information as I obtained officially within the Politburo, and I am stating that it was their conclusion time after time that he was very serviceable because of this peculiar facility of his in this matter.

Senator O'CONOR. Would you say that the reference to the Japanese situation would confirm your previous contention that he did have influence on the Japanese policy questions on China?

Mr. BUDENZ. Yes, Senator, except that later this became more pronounced.

The CHAIRMAN. Any question, Senator Smith?

Senator Watkins?

All right. Proceed, Mr. Morris.

Mr. MORRIS. We were discussing the meeting of the Politburo in 1937, and you had gotten as far as the mention of the name of Owen Lattimore, and then you had some questions amplifying that point.

Have you finished testifying about that 1937 meeting, Mr. Budenz?

Mr. BUDENZ. No, sir.

I would like to state, in regard to Frederick Vanderbilt Field, that it was specifically mentioned there that he was to be the political representative of the cell, or was the political representative of the cell, for the party.

Further than that, likewise, at the conclusion of the discussion, J. Peters having explained to me that Frederick Spencer was actually Frederick Vanderbilt Field, that I would know that later, that I would see his pictures, and the like, Frederick Vanderbilt Field, Harry Gannes, and J. Peters, at the conclusion of this political bureau meeting, in my presence discussed the matter of couriers to Washington on underground work in regard to the Far East.

The details of that work, naturally, I am unfamiliar with.

Mr. MORRIS. Is there anything else about that 1937 meeting that you are prepared to tell us about now, Mr. Budenz?

Mr. BUDENZ. That seems to exhaust it, so far as my memory goes.

Mr. MORRIS. Now, could you think of one or two other meetings that you have testified about that you can describe to us in detail?

Mr. BUDENZ. There was the meeting in 1943.

The CHAIRMAN. This other meeting was when, this one to which you referred?

Mr. BUDENZ. 1937.

However, in regard to Frederick Vanderbilt Field, if you will permit, I would like to refer to the meetings in 1940.

There were a series of meetings of the political bureau in 1940, which, to some degree are more or less blurred in my memory, because they had to be held at second-hand. Many of the members of the political bureau were already in hiding at that time, since the party had come to the conclusion that it was about to turn the imperialist war into civil war. They expected instructions along that line during the Hitler-Stalen pact period.

The discussions, though, with the politburo by Mr. Field arose over whether he should leave the Institute of Pacific Relations as secretary of the American Council and go to the American Peace Mobilization as its head. The politburo had decided quite early that he should, because they wanted a national organization. They already had a localized organization, but they wanted a national one.

And they held a convention in Chicago, I think in that summer, at which Mr. Field was chosen.

The CHAIRMAN. What summer was that?

Mr. BUDENZ. 1940.

In the course of this discussion, Mr. Field declared that Dr. Philip Jessup, who was an official, in fact, one of the responsible officials of the Institute of Pacific Relations, had impressed upon Mr. Field that he thought that Mr. Field could be of more service in the I. P. R. than he could in the American Peace Mobilization.

Mr. SOURWINE. Service to whom, or to what?

Mr. BUDENZ. That was never very clear, at least so far as my memory is concerned. I thought to the cause of humanitarianism. But that would be only my interpretation.

The Politburo, however, in a number of zig-zag meetings, because some of them had to be conducted, as I say, for instance, by conference with Jack Stachel from under cover and the like, decided Mr. Field then should go to the American Peace Mobilization for two reasons:

First, that it was necessary to create a very strong reserve of the party eventually, if the party should become illegal completely, and that Mr. Field would qualify splendidly as a leader of that reserve, being a man of wealth, not having any technical difficulties, as the Communists call it, that is, not having any false passports, and having a position in society which would lead to a reluctance on the part of the Government to take action against him.

The second reason given was he need not end his relations with the IPR, but could eventually even increase them, though maybe not under the guise of being secretary.

But the first reason was the compelling one, because most of the party leaders were going under cover at that time, and they needed a structure which could serve for the party openly, and the American Peace Mobilization was, I should say, the chief one chosen for that purpose.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, our exhibit No. 14, which we introduced into the record on July 26, duplicates the testimony given by Mr. Budenz here, and I think I would like this reread at this particular time, to show how the two tie in, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MANDEL (reading):

EXHIBIT 14

MINUTES OF A MEETING OF THE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE, AMERICAN COUNCIL OF THE INSTITUTE OF PACIFIC RELATIONS, HELD AT 5 P. M., THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 18, 1940

Present: Philip C. Jessup, chairman, Philo W. Parker, Francis E. Harmon, Edward C. Carter.

The second paragraph of these minutes is as follows:

The chairman read a long telegram which he had received from Mr. Frederick V. Field in Chicago on September 1, in which Mr. Field indicated that he had been called to the secretaryship of a new society which was being created to strengthen the forces of democracy during the coming critical years. He had a deep conviction that he was obligated to accept this new responsibility, because the election of officers was taking place at that time. He felt it was necessary to accept despite his obvious personal preference to postpone the decision pending consultation with Dr. Jessup and others. As he anticipated criticism and misunderstanding, his continued deep interest in the welfare of the Institute of Pacific Relations demanded, he felt, the affirmation of his immediate resignation from all I. P. R. responsibilities. Dr. Jessup explained that he had subsequently talked at length with Mr. Field, who explained in detail the reasons that had led him to accept the new position. Mr. Parker voiced the feelings of all present when he inquired whether Dr. Jessup felt that Mr. Field could not be persuaded to resume the secretaryship of the American Council. Dr. Jessup replied that he thought Mr. Field's decision was final. Under the circumstances it was moved that a minute be drafted indicating the committee's acceptance of the resignation with great regret. The minute should include an appropriate appreciation of the distinguished service which Mr. Field had rendered during 11 years of service with the American Council. The hope was to be expressed that when his new task was completed, it would be possible for him to resume active leadership in the work of the American Council.

Senator FERGUSON. This democracy that is explained in this letter was Communist, was it not?

Mr. BUDENZ. That was the organization devised to help Hitler. It picketed the White House. It assailed President Roosevelt and his "war and hunger program." And it was designed to step up the tempo of opposition to any defense efforts on the part of the United States.

Senator FERGUSON. But it was really the Communist line.

Mr. BUDENZ. It was completely controlled by the Communists from beginning to end. That was a Communist front, not a captive organization.

Senator O'CONOR. Obviously it was a Communist front and it was so known and its actions indicated that it was inherently Communist. Have you ever heard of any repudiation by Mr. Jessup of that laudatory expression concerning Field, who, of course, has been proven to be one of the greatest traitors in this country.

Mr. BUDENZ. No, I have not, sir.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Budenz, can you tell us of another meeting you attended which Mr. Field reported for the IPR?

Mr. BUDENZ. That was a meeting of 1943 which I began to anticipate and then thought of the 1940 series of meetings. At this meeting of the political bureau at which Earl Browder I know definitely was present, and I believe Robert William Weiner. His name strikes me because he was not always present at these meetings, and other members of the Politburo who were not generally there, including Trachtenberg. At this meeting Mr. Field stated that he had received word from Mr. Lattimore. It is my impression that he had seen Mr. Lattimore personally just a day or two before, but I may be mistaken there. . It was a communication either personally or in some other way. Mr. Field just returned from a trip and I get the impression that he had talked to Mr. Lattimore personally, and Mr. Lattimore stated that information coming to him from the international Communist apparatus where he was located indicated that there was to be a change of line very sharply on Chiang Kai-shek, that is to say, that the negative opposition to Chiang Kai-shek was to change to a positive opposition and that more stress was to be put upon attacking Chiang Kai-shek.

Mr. MORRIS. Did the Communist Party line change at that time?

Mr. BUDENZ. The Communists took action to discover the accuracy of this. They were advised that there was in the course of preparation an article by Vladimir Rogoff, the Tass correspondent, written at Moscow's request on this question which would attack the appeasers in China and Chiang Kai-shek.

The CHAIRMAN. The Tass correspondent, you say.

Mr. BUDENZ. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Can you explain what Tass was?

Mr. BUDENZ. Tass was the official Soviet news agency in this country and so far as I know still is, but I knew it then quite definitely.

Mr. MORRIS. Was this article subsequently communicated to the Daily Worker?

Mr. BUDENZ. This article was communicated to the Daily Worker. The first message was received throught Grace Granich who had been in charge of Intercontinent News, a Soviet agency, which had been put out of business by the Department of Justice, but who continued to maintain her relations with the Soviet Embassy, Consulate, and other sources of information, including communications to Moscow and we were advised of the coming of this article and then we received it.

Mr. MORRIS. And was the Communist line actually changed as a result of these steps that were taken?

Mr. BUDENZ. The Politburo suggested that someone, and the name of T. A. Bisson was mentioned in that connection, be enlisted to write an article in connection with the Institute of Pacific Affairs publication on this matter explaining the democratic character of the Chinese Communists and indicating that Chiang Kai-shek and his group represented antidemocracy.

Mr. SOURWINE. Pardon me, Mr. Budenz, but you mentioned the Institute of Pacific Affairs. You were referring to the Institute of Pacific Relations and its publication Pacific Affairs?

Mr. BUDENZ. That is correct. I sort of got the two together.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to introduce into the record at this time the article refered to by Mr. Budenz, not as it appeared originally in War and the Working Class, but as it was reprinted in the Daily Worker. I would like to offer this into evidence.

The CHAIRMAN. Please lay the foundation for it.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Mandel, can you testify to the authenticity of it?

Mr. MANDEL. This is an article taken from the Daily Worker of August 12, 1943, page 8, and is headed "Soviet expert warns of appeasers in China," by Vladimir Rogoff, reprinted from the Soviet Trade Union periodical the War and the Working Class.

Mr. MORRIS. Does it appear, Mr. Mandel, what date this appeared in the War and the Working Class?

Mr. MANDEL. It does not.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Budenz, I offer you the article described by Mr. Mandel and ask you if you can recall the existence of such an article in the Daily Worker?

The CHAIRMAN. Let the record show that the witness is being shown a photostatic copy of the article.

Mr. BUDENZ. Yes, sir, this is the article.

Mr. MORRIS. Is there any particular passage in the article that you think the committee should be interested in?

Mr. BUDENZ. Yes, sir. This article attacks the appeasers of Japan in China. You will note in so doing it attacks the whole governmental policy, that is to say, it says that 3 years have passed since Chiang Kai-shek gave certain orders in regard to reforms. Now, I will quote:

> Three years have passed since then. The reforms in the army with the aim of training new cadres, reorganizing control and strengthening discipline were not completed, and the task of the creation of their own war economic base was not accomplished. The main reason for this is the diverse work of the "appeasers," the defeatist and capitulators.

There is more to this line, but this is, I should think, a key expression.

Mr. MORRIS. Were you an editor of the Daily Worker when this appeared?

Mr. BUDENZ. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORRIS. What was your purpose in putting this in the Daily Worker?

Mr. BUDENZ. This was our understanding that we were to begin, under the guise of attacking the appeasers of Japan, to have an onslaught against Chiang Kai-shek.

The CHAIRMAN. The appeasers of whom?

Mr. BUDENZ. Of Japan, that is, in China.

Mr. MORRIS. Up to that time what was your official Communist policy with respect to the situation?

Mr. BUDENZ. The official Communist policy was very critical of Chiang Kai-shek, and that will lead us to other episodes——

Mr. MORRIS. Up to that time what had been the policy?

Mr. BUDENZ. The policy had been critical of Chiang Kai-shek, but the policy now was, as we understood it, that we were to prepare for an all-out attack on Chiang Kai-shek, which was entirely different. However, if I may continue this, what the Soviet Government was trying to tell us was that this should be done under the cover of coalition government. Later on Rogoff had to explain and in fact apologize for his article, and Harriet Lucy Moore had to write an article, if I remember correctly, in Soviet Russia Today. It may have been in one of the organs of the Institute of Pacific Relations also explaining that Rogoff's article had been misinterpreted, but the purpose of this whole thing was to put the skids, if I may use that phrase, under Chiang Kai-shek under a gradual developing campaign for coalition government.

Mr. MORRIS. And that is what you meant by the sharp change in policy that you testified to earlier?

Mr. BUDENZ. That is right. Moscow has difficulty every once in a while in letting the Communists know the difference between how they should emphasize things and the general presentation of the subject. We could not have such a sharp attack on Chiang Kai-shek if at the same time we were to advocate coalition government, but the purpose of the coalition government was to destroy him.

Mr. MORRIS. And is it your testimony that this conference that you testified about today took place prior to the publication of this article in the Daily Worker?

Mr. BUDENZ. Yes, sir, that is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. I think the article should go in the record.

Mr. MORRIS. I move that it be introduced into the record and made an exhibit.

The CHAIRMAN. It shall be made a part of the record and appropriately marked.

EXHIBIT No. 133

[From the Daily Worker, August 12, 1943, p. 8]

SOVIET EXPERT WARNS OF APPEASERS IN CHINA

(By Vladimir Rogov)

[Reprinted from the Soviet Trade Union periodical the War and the Working Class]

Moscow, August 11 (by wireless to Inter-Continent News).—During the 6 years of war the Chinese command, at the cost of considerable territorial losses, succeeded in saving the troops from defeat. Despite the numerous odds the Chinese Army preserved its capacity for resistance.

The Japanese militarists failed in their plan for a rapid conquest of China. The Japanese proved incapable of breaking the resistance of the Chinese people and bringing them to their knees. The war against China became clearly drawn out, threatening Japan with ever-growing complications.

In defensive battles on an extremely long front the Chinese Army, weakening the Japanese troops, gained the necessary time for reorganizing its troops and strengthening their fighting capacity. Soon after the fall of Wuhan (Hankow) in October 1938 Chang Kai-shek outlined a program for the reorganization of the country's armed forces, whose principal points were as follows:

Firstly, China's national policy must become the policy of a long, defensive war.

Secondly, the necessity to develop the guerrilla movement.

Thirdly, for conducting a general counteroffensive it is necessary to create a new, many-millions-strong army, trained in the use of the most up-to-date war equipment.

COVERT OPPOSITION

However, from the outset the intentions of the commander-in-chief of the Chinese Army, Chiang Kai-shek, met with covert resistance. Three years have passed since then. The reforms in the army with the aim of training new cadres, reorganizing control and strengthening discipline were not completed, and the task of the creation of their own war economic base was not accomplished. The main reason for this is the diverse work of the "appeaser," the defeatists and capitulators.

The war economy resources of National China (Free China) are tremendous and afford an adequate base for the rearmament and supply of the massed army. On its territory National China has all the strategic raw materials necessary for the conduct of a prolonged war.

Nevertheless, large-scale construction has not been undertaken since the industrial and financial circles prefer to engage in profiteering rather than invest their capital in the armaments industry.

The unrestrained profiteers advance the "theories" that the people are weary of war and that it is primarily necessary to satisfy the demand of the population for goods, etc.

This situation leads to the weakening of the army's fighting capacity and greater dependence on the supply of armaments from the United States and Great Britain, which however has encountered serious difficulties since the beginning of the Japanese war against the United States and Great Britain. The elements favoring capitulation have sabotaged the measures for mobilizing the internal resources with the object of creating their own war economy base, as well as the measures for extending economic warfare against the Japanese invaders.

China has no lack of human reserves, but the Chinese Army nevertheless receives no regular reinforcements. There are insufficient trained reserves. There is not even an organized military registration of the population. To this day the law on universal military service is not fully carried out. The army receives a large percentage of men unfit for service.

The main defect of the Chinese Army is the shortage of trained commanding personnel. All foreign military observers who have visited the Chinese Army agree that the Chinese soldier is tenacious and enduring in the field and is unpretentious as far as food and uniforms are concerned; whereas the commanding personnel is extremely weak and backward in military and technical training.

The army's equipment is still at low level. The organization and control of troops are far from perfect. One of the defects of the Chinese Army is the lack of an effective united command and of coordinated operations on the separate fronts. The internal friction and suspicion among the generals could not but affect the fighting capacity of the troops and their discipline.

In Chungking, of course, there are no open advocates of surrender, but this does not mean that there is a lack of capitulators and defeatists there.

The capitulators and defeatists who occupy important positions in the Kuomintang weaken the strength of China by their harmful political intrigues and constitute a serious danger at present.

Since December 1941 the Japanese have centered their attention on the war in the Pacific. The war in China has receded to the background. This has led to the appearance among Chinese military and political leaders of a certain complacency of which the Japanese imperialists took advantage to intensify their peace offensive.

JAPANESE MACHINATIONS

The Japanese conquerors are now concentrating on deepening and sharpening the internal contraditions in China and are trying in every way to utilize these contradictions to weaken China and strengthen their positions in the struggle against China.

These Japanese plans profit from the maneuvers of the Chinese appeasers, who provoke conflicts and incidents up to armed clashes, do their utmost to undermine the military collaborations of Kuomintang circles with the Communist Party and incite the persecution and rout of the eighth and fourth armies, which as units of China's united national army have inscribed many heroic pages in the history of the resistance of the Chinese people to the Japanese invaders.

These armies consist of the most progressive, tenacious, and selfless people of China. They are led by the Chinese Communist Party which enjoys merited prestige among the broad masses of the working people as the organizer of their struggle for national freedom and independence.

Today by direct military pressure new attempts are being made to bring about the dissolution of the Chinese Communist Party and the liquidation of the eighth and fourth armies. The Chinese command has transferred new divisions to the districts where these armies are stationed, with tremendous supplies of munitions and food, obviously to preparation for an attack on the eighth and fourth armies with the aim of liquidating them even at the price of unleashing civil war.

Such an attack of the Chungking generals on the eighth and fourth armies which, moreover, is completely unprovoked by these armies, would be a treacherous stabbing in the back of the Chinese people and play into the hands of the Japanese imperialists who could hope for nothing better.

A number of outstanding Kuomintang leaders oppose such treacherous activities of all sorts of appeasers, capitulators, and provocateurs. The Chinese Government, nevertheless, does not exert firmness in overcoming the activities of the capitulators designed to undermine national unity and weaken China's resistance against Japanese aggression.

EYEWITNESS ACCOUNT

In the last few years I have had occasion to visit more than 15 provinces of China. Both on the front and in the deep rear, in occupied Shanghai and Manchukuo, representatives of various circles of China watch with grave concern the criminal activity of the traitors, turncoats, defeatists, and saboteurs. Nevertheless they are unanimous in their confidence that all the plans to provoke civil war are doomed to failure since National China, in hard fighting, has accumulated much strength and will not permit the great national liberation cause of the Chinese people to die.

With inexhaustible strategic raw material resources and tremendous manpower reserves at its disposal, China has every possibility for victory over the enemy. The necessary conditions for this victory are the realization of radical measures for reorganizing the entire economy on a war footing, subordinating all economic life to the needs of the front and strengthening the armed forces against capitulation and defeatist moods, and most important, the genuine unity of all national forces in the struggle for freedom and national independence.

On the extent to which Chiang Kai-shek and the Chungking leading circles will understand the importance of this principal condition and succeed in averting the danger of internal struggle in China, tortured by the enemies of the Chinese people—the inevitable consequence of which would be measures directed against the eighth and fourth armies and the Communist Party—rests whether the exhausting war forced upon the Chinese people by Japanese imperialism will be brought to a successful conclusion in the interests of the whole Chinese people.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, Mr. Budenz has testified that Mr. T. A. Bisson figured in the discussions at this time. I would like to introduce into the record, after identification by Mr. Mandel and authenticity affirmed by him, excerpts from an article written by T. A. Bisson in the Far Eastern Survey which was a publication of the American Council of the Institute of Pacific Relations.

Mr. MANDEL. This is from an article, China's Part in a Coalition War, from the Far Eastern Survey, published by the American Council of the Institute of Pacific Relations, in its issue of July 1943, and I will read the following excerpts:

However, these are only party labels. To be more descriptive, the one might be called feudal China; the other, democratic China. These terms express the actualities as they exist today, the real institutional distinctions between the two Chinas.

Then I go further:

DEMOCRATIC CHINA

The key to the successful mobilization of the war potential of so-called Communist China lies in the extent to which its leaders have thrown off the feudal incubus which has weighed China down for centuries. No single measure can be pointed to as the open sesame which has increasingly achieved this objective. Economic reforms have been intertwined with political reforms, the one supporting the other. Basic to the whole program has been the land reform which has freed the peasant—the primary producers in these areas, and, indeed, over most of China—from the crushing weight of rent, taxes, and usurious interest charges as levied by a feudal economy.

And further down:

The term "feudal," as here used, is intended to define a society in which the landlord-peasant relationship is dominant and autocracy in government centers around this relationship.

Mr. MORRIS. Are the other paragraphs on this page, Mr. Mandel, excerpts from the article which you have been reading?

Mr. MANDEL. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have those other excerpts inserted in the record.

The CHAIRMAN. They may be inserted in the record.

CHINA'S PART IN A COALITION WAR

However, these are only party labels. To be more descriptive, the one might be called feudal China; the other, democratic China. (6) These terms express the actualities as they exist today, the real institutional distinctions between the two Chinas.

* * * * * *

DEMOCRATIC CHINA

The key to the successful mobilization of the war potential of so-called Communist China lies in the extent to which its leaders have thrown off the feudal incubus which has weighed China down for centuries. No single measure can be pointed to as the open sesame which has increasingly achieved this objective. Economic reforms have been intertwined with political reforms, the one supporting the other. Basic to the whole program has been the land reform which has freed the peasant—the primary producer in these areas, and, indeed, over most of China—from the crushing weight of rent, taxes and usurious interest charges as levied by a feudal economy.

But the ingenuity of this reform, without which it could hardly be made to work, is that the newly introduced procedures of local democracy serve as the final sanction. The landlord and entrepreneur are not excluded from this process, but neither are they permitted to dominate it. Tax assessment committees, for example, are controlled by a majority of local members and exercise a strictly local jurisdiction. Farmers know well what their neighbors own.

Over wide areas of this new China, elected councils—village, town, and district—and elected executive officials have completely supplanted the old autocratic system of feudal[1] agrarian China. These councils and officials are either unpaid or receive mere pittances which leave them no better off economically than their fellow citizens.

It is this democratic process, finally, which permits a large measure of free competition to operate over the whole of the economy. Bureaucratic price controls are not attempted. They are as unnecessary in this society as they would be in a New England town meeting. No landlord or merchant, with the watchful eyes of his neighbors upon him, can engage in hoarding or speculation. Within limits set mainly by local democratic checks, the individual landlord or entrepreneur is free, and is even encouraged, to expand his operations, and many are doing so.

By no stretch of the imagination can this be termed "communism"; it is, in fact, the essence of bourgeois democracy, applied mainly to agrarian conditions. The leaders in Yenan see in this program more than the answer to China's immediate problem of efficiently mobilizing her resources for the war against Japan. They see in it also the means of throwing off China's feudal shackles, the transition to modern nationhood.

The term "feudal," as here used, is intended to define a society in which the landlord-peasant relationship is dominant and autocracy in government centers around this relationship.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Budenz, you made reference to T. A. Bisson. Was the reference to Bisson to him as a member of the Communist Party?

Mr. BUDENZ. Yes, sir.

[1] The term "feudal," as here used, is intended to define a society in which the landlord-peasant relationship is dominant and autocracy in government centers around this relationship.

Mr. MORRIS. And it was your knowledge that T. A. Bisson was a Communist?

Mr. BUDENZ. My official knowledge. I have not met Mr. Bisson, but I have repeatedly heard him referred to officially and have been so advised he is a member of the Communist Party.

The CHAIRMAN. Will you elaborate on that just a little bit when you say "officially"? Officially by whom?

Mr. BUDENZ. Officially in Politburo discussions such as this in 1943 by Earl Browder, who was general secretary of the party, and then again on several occasions subsequent to that by Jack Stachel, who was the official representative of the Politburo to the Daily Worker.

The CHAIRMAN. As to the T. A. Bisson, can you tie that in individually by an expression that you know of? Could there be other T. A. Bissons?

Mr. BUDENZ. No, sir; this was definitely the T. A. Bisson who was the so-called far eastern expert in connection with the Institute of Pacific Relations. His activities were discussed, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MORRIS. That particular article of T. A. Bisson was the subject of considerable controversy and I think at the expense of a few minutes we should introduce elements of that controvery on the record to see how important an article this particular one was.

Mr. Mandel, do you have anything from the institute files bearing on this subject?

Mr. MANDEL. This is a letter dated August 3 from the Chinese News Service marked "confidential," addressed to Mr. Edward C. Carter.

It is signed by C. L. Hsia, representing the Chinese News Service. I read a paragraph from this letter:

> I believe I said to you at Princeton that I could not agree with you or Mr. Tarr about the reason given for your declining to disown Mr. Bisson's article. Freedom of speech does not warrant any of us making attacks on the government of a friendly nation or making misrepresentations as to facts. To label the National Government of China as "feudal" is an open attack on my Government, and to say that certain casualty figures emanating from sources other than the Chinese Government or Chinese "official reports" is a misrepresentation. You are free to tell Mr. Tarr that I cannot accept his interpretation of the right of free speech.

Then another letter from the same gentleman is dated July 17, 1943, addressed to Mr. William Holland.

The CHAIRMAN. From whom?

Mr. MANDEL. From C. L. Hsia, director of the Chinese News Service. He says:

> When I telephoned yesterday, I thought it would be polite for me to come and see you and Mr. Carter to exchange views on the article written by Mr. Bisson. Since I more or less said to you what I had to say on the subject, I don't know whether there is any point in my coming to see you on Monday. I find that I won't be able to get back to town on Monday until after half past 11, so if you and Mr. Carter still wish to have a talk with me, I think I can make it around about 12 noon.
> What I said to you yesterday was purely my personal reaction and as a friend and member of the IPR I cannot speak for the China Council, nor in my official capacity. Personally I am deeply solicitous for the interests of the IPR, but the principles, objectives, and functions of the IPR may be defeated through the pursuit of this kind of activity, namely, an open, deliberate attack on one of its members, because I know how the Chinese members of the IPR feel about it, even among the most "democratic and liberal" and the most pro-IPR group. If Mr. Bisson tries to divide China into "federal and democratic," then I can't think of anybody in the Chinese IPR who can be said to be on the "democratic" side. I imagine nothing can be done about it—I mean Mr. Bisson or the American Council or the international secretarial are not prepared to do anything in the way of retraction or amendment—so I don't see what useful service can be served by my coming to see you and Mr. Carter—et cetera.

I have here a statement by Hollington K. Tong, who has been an official of the Chinese National Government, and whose biography can be found in the China Handbook on page 777, and here is his full comment on the whole Bisson incident, which I would like to introduce into the record.

Mr. MORRIS. I would like two more paragraphs read in the record, Mr. Chairman. This is a point that has been disputed by Mr. Carter, and I think we should elaborate on it just a bit.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well.

Mr. MANDEL. I will read:

We took a serious view of the Bisson thrust for two reasons. In the first place, the Far Eastern Survey is not a magazine of private American opinion. It is an official publication of an organization of which there is an active China branch, and Mr. Bisson is a member of the board of directors of that organization. Therefore, an article attacking China, published in the Far Eastern Survey, would appear to have the sanction of the institute, including its China branch. In the second place, in the middle of war, such an attack seemed nothing less than a boost to the enemy's propaganda.

My first action in the matter was to notify Guenther Stein, Chungking correspondent of the IPR, that his privilege of sending his weekly messages to the IPR free of charge through Chinese Government radio facilities would be withdrawn until Bisson's article was satisfactorily explained. This caused alarm at the Press Hotel, and I was visited by a delegation from the Foreign Correspondents' Club. Did my action imply that the Government's policy in the future would be to deny transmission facilities to them if articles deemed unfavorable to China were found to have been published by their principals at home, they asked. I pointed out that I was only withdrawing free Chinese Government facilities from the IPR correspondent pending an explanation from IPR.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like that whole letter introduced into the record and marked as the next consecutive exhibit.

The CHAIRMAN. I think it has been identified as having been taken from the files of the Institute of Pacific Relations; is that correct?

Mr. MORRIS. That is correct.

First, I would like to introduce into the record the previous letters referred to, dated August 3, 1943, and July 17, 1943, from C. L. Hsia, the letter of August 3 to Mr. Edward C. Carter as the first, and the letter of July 17, to Mr. William Holland as the second, and have them marked as the next consecutive exhibits.

The CHAIRMAN. They may be so filed.

(The documents referred to were marked "Exhibit No. 135" and "Exhibit No. 136," and are as follows:)

EXHIBIT No. 135

CHINESE NEWS SERVICE,
New York, N. Y., August 3, 1943.

Confidential.

Mr. EDWARD C. CARTER,
Institute of Pacific Relations, New York, N. Y.

DEAR MR. CARTER: Many thanks for your note of July 31, which was purely for my private information. I greatly appreciate your sending me a copy of your confidential memorandum to Miss Porter.

I believe I said to you at Princeton that I could not agree with you or Mr. Tarr about the reason given for your declining to disown Mr. Bisson's article. Freedom of speech does not warrant any of us making attacks on the government of a friendly nation or making misrepresentations as to facts. To label the National Government of China as "feudal" is an open attack on my government, and to say that certain casualty figures emanating from sources other than the Chinese Government are Chinese "official reports" is a misrepresentation. You are free to tell Mr. Tarr that I cannot accept his interpretation of the right of free speech.

I hope very much that what you wrote Miss Porter can be made public or in some other way you can make clear that Mr. Bisson's article does not reflect the viewpoint either of the American Council or of the Pacific Council.

Furthermore, I wish to advise you quite sincerely and frankly that the policy or attitude represented by your telegram to Liu Yu-wan will greatly embarrass him and his colleagues in Chungking. Knowing the situation as I do, a matter like this may make it impossible for some members of the China group to participate in the next IPR conference. I wish to make it quite clear that I am speaking as a personal friend and a member of IPR and not delivering an ultimatum, as I am not an officer and cannot speak for the China Council.

In my other capacity, I am duty bound to report to Dr. T. V. Soong what are the reactions of the Pacific Council and the American Council to my request that they publicly dissociate themselves from Mr. Bisson's article where he attacked the National Government of China. I do not know what he will do. He may think it is too small a matter to bother about and let it drop. On the other hand, he may wish to inform the China Council of his dissatisfaction. So far, the only course open to me is to report to him to the effect that neither the Pacific Council nor the American Council is willing to disown any part of the article written by Mr. Bisson.

The suggestion that Mr. Bisson write a second article does not appear to me to be any solution of the difficulties with which we are confronted. As I said to you the other day, no writer will ever admit that he was wrong. If he says he made a slight mistake, probably he will give half a dozen reasons for that slight mistake and those reasons will put him more "right" than ever. My frank advice is that he had better keep quiet for a time and let other people have a go at it.

I will try to get in touch with Miss Porter as soon as possible and I hope she will publish our comments on Mr. Bisson's article. In this connection may I repeat what I have said before, that it has been insisted that whatever comments we may make will have the same privilege of being circularized as a special release as did the summary of Mr. Bisson's article.

Sincerely yours,

C. L. Hsia, Director.

New York, N. Y.

Dear Mr. Holland: When I telephoned yesterday I thought it would be polite for me to come and see you and Mr. Carter to exchange views on the article written by Mr. Bisson. Since I more or less said to you what I had to say on the subject, I don't know whether there is any point in my coming to see you on Monday. I find that I won't be able to get back to town on Monday until after half past 11, so if you and Mr. Carter still wish to have a talk with me I think I can make it around about 12 noon. (Will you please telephone my secretary, Mrs. Chen?)

What I said to you yesterday was purely my personal reaction and as a friend and member of the IPR. I cannot speak for the China Council, nor in my official capacity. Personally I am deeply solicitious for the interests of the IPR but the principles, objectives, and functions of the IPR may be defeated through the pursuit of this kind of activity, namely, an open, deliberate attack on one of its members, because I know how the Chinese members of the IPR feel about it, even among the most "democratic and liberal" and the most pro-IPR group. If Mr. Bisson tries to divide China into "feudal and democratic," then I can't think of anybody in the Chinese IPR who can be said to be on the "democratic" side. I imagine nothing can be done about it—I mean Mr. Bisson or the American Council or the International Secretariat are not prepared to do anything in the way of retraction or amendment—so I don't see what useful purpose can be served by my coming to see you and Mr. Carter. But I thought as an old friend you would not mind my calling your attention to what I consider to be a highly regrettable incident.

Very sincerely yours,

C. L. Hsia, Director.

Mr. Mandel. This is an excerpt from a book called Dateline: China, by Hollington K. Tong, from pages 204, 206, and 208, published in 1950 by the Rockport Press.

Mr. Morris. I would like to introduce the statement into the record.

The Chairman. It may be inserted in the record.

(The document referred to was marked "Exhibit No. 137" and is as follows:)

Exhibit No. 137

Excerpts From the Book, Dateline: China, by Hollington K. Tong

[Pages 204, 206, and 208—Published by the Rockport Press, Inc., New York, 1950]

A note of incongruity was given to the whole attack by the fact that it was the Institute of Pacific Relations which fired the shot. The institute had been established, ostensibly, to promote good will among the peoples living in the Pacific area. Even though we knew that leftist influence had long been strong in its secretariat, it hurt us to see a blow coming from such a quarter.

In June 1943, Mr. T. A. Bisson, of the international secretariat of the institute, wrote the following in an issue of the Far Eastern Survey:

"The early promise held out by the war for the broadening and deepening of Chinese unity through the achievement of liberal political and economic reforms has not been fulfilled. Two Chinas have emerged, each with its own government, military forces, political and economic institutions. One is generally called Kuomintang China, and the other Communist China. But the terms 'feudal China' and 'democratic China' more accurately express the actualities as they exist today."

This seemed to us an unwarranted and unfriendly attack upon China and the Chinse Government, since Mr. Bisson's "Kuomintang" or "feudal" China was the National Government of China.

We made an issue of it.

We took a serious view of the Bisson thrust for two reasons. In the first place, the Far Eastern Survey is not a magazine of private American opinion. It is an official publication of an organization of which there is an active China branch, and Mr. Bisson is a member of the board of directors of that organization. Therefore, an article attacking China, published in the Far Eastern Survey, would appear to have the sanction of the institute, including its China branch. In the second place, in the middle of war, such an attack seemed nothing less than a boost to the enemy's propaganda.

My first action in the matter was to notify Guenther Stein, Chungking correspondent of the IPR, that his privilege of sending his weekly messages to the IPR free of charge through Chinese Government radio facilities would be withdrawn until Bisson's article was satisfactorily explained. This caused alarm at the Press Hotel, and I was visited by a delegation from the Foreign Correspondents' Club. Did my action imply that the Government's policy in the future would be to deny transmission facilities to them if articles deemed unfavorable to China were found to have been published by their principals at home, they asked. I pointed out that I was only withdrawing free Chinese Government facilities from the IPR correspondent pending an explanation from IPR. To give free Government facilities to an organization which maliciously attacked the Government seemed to me foolish in the extreme. I also pointed out the different status of the IPR as compared to other independent, non-organization papers and magazines.

Meanwhile, a spirited interchange of letters and rejoinders was taking place with the IPR. Dr. C. L. Hsia, of our New York office, presented our point of view in a letter to the institute which was published with an introductory editorial note stating that "Bisson's article expressed a point of view seriously held by many sincere American friends of China."

Also, in the same issue, Mr. Bisson contributed a rebuttal to Dr. Hsia's letter. Although both Mr. Bisson and Mr. Edward C. Carter, the secretary general of the IPR, who, incidentally, was also national president of the American Society for Russian Relief, stated that Mr. Bisson's article expressed ideas which were entirely his own and did not come officially from the organization as a whole, it seemed to us that the editorial note appended to Dr. Hsia's letter confirmed our feeling that the editorial board of the Far Eastern Survey was backing Bisson's point of view. They were setting a precedent which would make it possible for prejudiced writers and commentators in the United States to issue any sort of libel against China with impunity under cloak of being "sincere American friends of China."

The question of the Bisson article was further discussed a month later (August 1943) when Mr. Carter himself, accompanied by Mr. W. L. Holland, research secretary of the IPR, came out to China for a 3-week visit. Dr. Monlin Chiang, president of the National Peking University and chairman of the China branch of the IPR, discussed the matter with Mr. Carter. The members of the China branch of the IPR were as disturbed by the article as I had been, and the China branch finally lodged a formal protest. As a result, the president of the Institute of Pacific Relations issued a statement publicly dissociating the institute from the views expressed by Mr. Bisson, and we considered the matter closed. Guenther Stein's privilege to make use of our free facilities was restored to him.

During the controversy, the Institute of Pacific Relations came very close to losing its China branch altogether, which would have left it a predominantly American rather than an international organization. The China branch, whose members are by no means all Government officials, is a liberal-minded organization. But its members rebelled at the thought of being made a party to an international organization which openly attacked their Government.

During this period an article appeared in Moscow's War and the Working Class, written by V. N. Rogoff, who had been a Tass correspondent in China, and a personal friend of mine. This article was cabled by the United Press correspondent in Moscow both to England and the United States and appeared in hundreds of American and British papers. Mr. Rogoff stated that the Chinese Government was facing serious internal difficulties that could result either in civil war or a victory for Japan. He claimed that "appeasers" and "defeatists" in China were seeking to provoke trouble by urging the dissolution of the Communist units of the Chinese Army and that the alleged "intriguers" were undermining the Chinese war efforts and "have evolved the theory of an honorable peace with Japan or the futility of fighting." He insinuated that no serious attempt was being made by China to prosecute the war to a successful conclusion.

Mr. MORRIS. Is there anything more about that particular meeting you would like to tell us about?

Do you have any comment on the Bisson article as it was read today?

Mr. BUDENZ. Nothing. It shows that the Politburo's views were carried out in this article and that Communist China was held forth as the democratic China.

Mr. MORRIS. And it is also an example—is it not—that the Institute of Pacific Relations was used as an instrument for carrying out that policy?

Mr. BUDENZ. It is a very splendid example, splendid from the Communist viewpoint.

Mr. MORRIS. Before we leave the subject of Frederick V. Field, I offer you a pamphlet which was put out in his name and ask you if you can recall that particular pamphlet.

Mr. BUDENZ. Yes, sir. We were instructed by the Politburo to emphasize this pamphlet. The Daily Worker did so, and throughout the party it was emphasized and pushed, as the party does those things.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you identify for us that pamphlet?

Mr. BUDENZ. This is entitled "China's Greatest Crisis," by Frederick V. Field, published by New Century Publishers, Inc., of 832 Broadway, New York, in January 1945.

The New Century Publishers, may I say, are official publishers for the Communist Party.

Mr. MORRIS. You knew that from your own experience?

Mr. BUDENZ. Very definitely. The head of it was Robert William Weiner, the head of the secret conspiratorial fund of the Communist Party and former treasurer of the Communist Party, and also former president of the International Workers Order, but it was also under control of Trachtenberg, to whom I have referred before.

Mr. MORRIS. Do you recall that particular pamphlet?

Mr. BUDENZ. From first-hand knowledge, having been many times in the offices of this publication, conferring with Mr. Weiner, and with other officials of that Communist-created organization.

Mr. MORRIS. Do you recall that particular pamphlet, Mr. Budenz?

Mr. BUDENZ. Yes. This pamphlet was, as I say, pushed by the Communist Party.

Mr. MORRIS. Is there anything significant about that pamphlet that we should know in carrying on an investigation of the Institute of Pacific Relations?

Mr. BUDENZ. Yes, sir.

In the very introduction of the pamphlet it gives an explanation of the author. This is called "About the Author."

> Frederick V. Field, the author of this pamphlet, is a member of the executive committee of the American Council, Institute of Pacific Relations, and an authority on far-eastern problems. He is also executive vice president of the Council for Pan-American Democracy, and a member of the editorial board of New Masses.

Mr. MORRIS. Was that reference to the Institute of Pacific Relations made with any significance?

Mr. BUDENZ. Yes, sir. That was in order that the name of the Institute of Pacific Relations would be an entering wedge into many civic organizations, to ministers, to professors, to others who were circularized with this pamphlet; that is, either it was sent to them, or their interest was solicited.

Mr. MORRIS. This is to show in this particular pamphlet that it was a new Communist publication?

Mr. BUDENZ. No, sir.

Mr. MORRIS. But that is a subject of common knowledge?

Mr. BUDENZ. It is not.

Mr. MORRIS. So, it is your idea with reference to this description of Mr. Field and your testimony is that it was done to confuse? Is that it?

Mr. BUDENZ. It was done specifically, to my knowledge. I was in meetings in which this was discussed, the necessity for publishing this pamphlet among wide groups of people who were not yet familiar with China from the Soviet viewpoint, in order to get their interest and attention.

In order to get their interest and attention it was printed in this fashion.

Mr. MORRIS. And the name of the Institute of Pacific Relations was so used for that purpose?

Mr. BUDENZ. Specifically used for that purpose.

Mr. MORRIS. And the material in that pamphlet is Communist propaganda?

Mr. BUDENZ. It was decisively. It was approved by the Politburo.

Senator WATKINS. I thought you referred to some fund that the Communists had in connection with this.

The CHAIRMAN. I believe he referred to an individual who had charge of the fund.

Senator WATKINS. Maybe that was it, but at any rate, I wanted a further explanation, if you could give one.

Mr. BUDENZ. I think that would take us quite far afield, to go into this fund, but I can say that Robert William Weiner, to my personal knowledge, was the head of the conspiratorial fund of the Communist International apparatus in this country which doled out thousands of dollars in cash for many purposes; that is to say, if a Communist would take a trip abroad which is illegal, he couldn't put that on the books of the Communist Party. Earl Browder, if he had taken an illegal trip to the Orient or to Moscow, he was given this expense in cash and this was quite a large business.

Robert William Weiner's assistant incidentally was Lem Harris, who springs from the Wall Street brokerage house, although he is not in that business. He merely comes from that family.

Senator WATKINS. Would you know whether any of that fund was used to finance that pamphlet just as you have described it?

Mr. BUDENZ. That I would not know.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Budenz, what was the date of this pamphlet?

Senator O'CONOR. 1945.

Mr. BUDENZ. 1945.

Senator O'CONOR. Mr. Chairman, I do think it is pertinent at this point to observe that this is the very pamphlet about which we interrogated Mr. Field and he declined to answer on the grounds it would incriminate him.

Mr. MORRIS. It is, incidentally, introduced in the record as exhibit 10.

Senator O'CONOR. That is right.

Mr. MORRIS. The secretary of the Institute of Pacific Relations before Mr. Frederick V. Field was Mr. Joseph Barnes, who, according to documents, was secretary from 1931 to 1934.

Did you know that Joseph Barnes was a member of the Communist Party?

Mr. BUDENZ. I did not know Mr. Barnes during this period to which you refer.

Mr. MORRIS. I am not asking you that. I am asking you if you knew Mr. Barnes was a member of the Communist Party.

Mr. BUDENZ. I did know Mr. Barnes was a member of the Communist Party.

Mr. MORRIS. Did you know that from personal encounters, as well as from official conferences of the Communist Party leaders?

Mr. BUDENZ. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you describe to us any personal encounter you had with Joseph Barnes in connection with Communist Party work?

Mr. BUDENZ. I had one personal encounter.

Mr. MORRIS. What was that?

Mr. BUDENZ. I would——

The CHAIRMAN. Before you go into that, the name "Joe Barnes" or "Joseph Barnes" is not an uncommon one. I would like some way to identify the Joe Barnes to which you have reference.

Mr. MORRIS. I think, Mr. Chairman, Mr. Budenz, if he continues with his testimony, will bring that out, and I will make it a point to tie up the two names.

Mr. BUDENZ. The Joseph Barnes I have reference to was the foreign correspondent for some time of the New York Herald Tribune and later on, not to my personal knowledge, but in the public print, took over a part ownership of PM.

The CHAIRMAN. PM was a newspaper regularly published in New York for some time?

Mr. BUDENZ. It was a daily paper. Its name was changed to something like the New York Star.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well.

Mr. BUDENZ. In the 1936 period it is my impression that the 1936 convention of the Communist Party—my very sharp impression—a few newspapermen who were Communists were admitted into the convention or into a national committee meeting. I say that on that I am not quite clear; it was either a convention or national committee meeting, and I am practically certain it was the convention of the Communist Party of 1936.

The purpose of introducing these Communist newspapermen into the convention or national committee meeting, which broke all the rules of the party up to that time since those were always executive sessions, was to have them go out and represent the party as an American institution under the new idea that was developed later by Browder so fully in saying communism is Twentieth Century Americanism, and in the hall where these people met, a small room attached to this meeting of the Communists, were several newspapermen, among whom was Joseph Barnes.

I was introduced to him by Si Gerson in the presence of J. Peters.

Mr. MORRIS. Why does the name stand out? Why does the name stand out since many years have passed and why does it stand out that you recall meeting him at this particular time?

Mr. BUDENZ. This incident which is so clear in my memory that I have reported it a long time ago to other agencies stands out in my memory because Joe Barnes was so emphasized as having been of service to the party from the very moment I came into it.

Mr. MORRIS. Prior to that time you had heard the name of Joseph Barnes?

Mr. BUDENZ. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORRIS. Mentioned in connection with the activity of the Communist organization?

Mr. BUDENZ. That is correct.

Mr. MORRIS. On many occasions?

Mr. BUDENZ. Oh, a number of occasions, so much so that it became quite a personality with me without me knowing him.

Mr. MORRIS. And it is your testimony that these people you met on this occasion, which you think was 1936, were all Communists?

Mr. BUDENZ. I know it was the 1936 period. The only thing I am uncertain of, though my uncertainty is not very great, is whether it was the convention or national committee meeting.

Mr. SOURWINE. I would like to have one matter brought out clearly for the record.

Are you stating that you know Mr. Barnes to have been a Communist because he was one of these newspapermen who was admitted, or are you stating that you knew him to be a Communist and that he was in this group which was admitted? In other words, does your statement that he was a Communist rest on the fact that he was one of the group which was admitted?

Mr. BUDENZ. Partly, although it also rests on official reports in the Politburo to the effect that Barnes had been of great service to the party as a Communist; secondly, to the fact that he was introduced as Comrade Barnes to me by Si Gerson.

Mr. SOURWINE. That was on this particular occasion?

Mr. BUDENZ. That is correct.

Mr. SOURWINE. Would the situation be this: That you knew prior to this occasion, and had known for some time prior to this occasion, that there was a Joseph Barnes who was a Communist and who had been of great service to the party?

Mr. BUDENZ. Yes, sir.

Mr. SOURWINE. And on this occasion you met a Joseph Barnes who was identified to you and in your mind as the same Joseph Barnes who was a Communist and who had been of service to the party?

Mr. BUDENZ. Yes, sir.

Mr. SOURWINE. And that is the Joseph Barnes that you have already identified here?

Mr. BUDENZ. Yes, sir. The Joseph Barnes presented to me was presented in such a vivid color as of aid to the party that he was supposed to be outstanding.

Mr. SOURWINE. And he was introduced by J. Peters?

Mr. BUDENZ. By Si Gerson.

The CHAIRMAN. You may proceed, Mr. Morris.

Mr. MORRIS. Do you have, or did you have, any experience subsequent to that experience which you believe took place in 1936, that could confirm your understanding that Joseph Barnes was a member of the Communist organization?

Mr. BUDENZ. Yes, sir.

I had a number of references to Barnes in the Politburo as a Communist, and also statements by Jack Stachel to me officially advising me of that fact. In about 1941 Earl Browder told me, though I don't know positively that he acted on what he said, that he was to take a certain newspaper with him to the Atlanta prison, he being privileged to only subscribe to one paper, because of the great influence of Joe Barnes in that paper and the contributions he had made.

The CHAIRMAN. Gentlemen, the chairman of this committee must be on the floor very shortly. I am going to ask Senator O'Conor if you would kindly take over. I may not be able to be here this afternoon, Senator. Do you want to continue with the hearing this afternoon?

Mr. MORRIS. I think we will have to get some more testimony in. We are just really getting into this testimony.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator, can you preside this afternoon?

Senator O'CONOR. Yes, I can.

Senator O'CONOR (presiding). The hearing will please be in order.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Budenz, I offer you an article written by Joseph Barnes entitled "American Dream," which appeared in the Atlantic Monthly, pages 111 to 116, in January 1937. I offer you this article and ask you when you first saw that article?

Mr. BUDENZ. Yesterday.

Mr. MORRIS. When did you first communicate to the committee your testimony about your meeting with Joseph Barnes?

Mr. BUDENZ. Last spring, and I communicated to other agencies before that, but I communicated to the committee specifically last spring.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you look at that article and tell us what that purports to be?

Mr. BUDENZ. This article is a review of the Communist Party convention of 1936 and also a review of the Communist tendency developing out of that convention. It presents the Communists as being Americanized.

Mr. MORRIS. And does that description of the Communist Party convention conform in every way with your understanding of the party purpose in allowing newspapermen to cover the convention?

Mr. BUDENZ. Yes, sir; it may not be always expressed in Communist phraseology, but naturally the Atlantic Monthly, although I could talk about the Atlantic Monthly too, in that it wouldn't appear in that form.

However, this does express the purpose of the newspapermen being admitted, those who were.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to offer this into the record in its entirety and have it marked as the next consecutive exhibit.

Senator O'CONOR. Has it been identified?

Mr. MORRIS. I have described it.

Mr. Mandel, did you authenticate that document?

Mr. MANDEL. This is a photostat of an article appearing in the Atlantic Monthly in January 1937, pages 111 to 116, entitled "American Dream," by Joseph Barnes.

Senator O'CONOR. It will be admitted and marked in evidence.

(The document referred to was marked "Exhibit No. 138" and is as follows:)

EXHIBIT No. 138

[From the Atlantic Monthly, January 1937, pp. 111–116]

AMERICAN DREAM

(By Joseph Barnes)

I

The Communist Party of the United States, assembled in convention in New York City last summer, nominated its candidate for President as "the new John Brown of Osawatomie." This leather-faced Kansan, with a prairie twang in his voice, conducted a campaign which was patently not planned from Moscow. Over national radio networks, on the platforms of union meeting halls, and from a cell in the Terre Haute, Ind., jail, he insisted on the legitimate and historical right of his followers to the title of sons and daughters of the American Revolution, and defenders of American liberty.

"John Brown's Body" blared from the party's bands in alternation with the "Internationale." The American flag festooned the rafters of the party's meeting places. Mr. Browder's zeal for American democracy, which led him to single out the Republican Party as the tool of big business interests, to be defeated at all costs, made his party's campaign for the first time a factor in national political discussion.

This borrowing of American symbols was more than a political strategam, or a knavish trick of Communist expropriation. The seventh world congress of the Communist International in Moscow a year ago had bent the party line more sharply in this direction. But in its membership, its growing press, and its special language of exhortation, the Communist Party had for several years been naturalizing itself in the American scene.

Mr. Albert Jay Nock has properly rebuked, in the October issue of the Atlantic, the word-mongers who foist "imposter terms" upon a gullible public, twisting their meanings to serve new ends. But the true study of semantics is more than invective against philological jugglery; it is the attempt to learn the reasons for real changes in the meaning of words. The success or failure which the Communists may have in adopting the slogans of 1776 and 1861, and infusing them with new life, will show how far and why these terms have changed their meanings.

Many of them, coined or borrowed in a simpler time, when words and slogans could be held in the mouth until even their taste was fixed, have inevitably changed since they first set the pattern of American speech. Since then, the rich have compounded their riches and the poor their poverty. Mr. Browder can find ample evidence in the reports of college deans, relief administrators, or industrial-relations experts, that freedom, liberty, revolution, the American dream, are being given, in many American minds, new definitions not to be found in McGuffey's Eclectic Readers.

Every crackpot third party may appropriate for its own purposes the word "American," and the song "The Battle Hymn of the Republic." But in Mr. Browder's campaign some of the fighting words were not mere borrowings; they were already a part of the Communist vocabulary. Even in the maze of Marxist rhetoric these words may be made for many Americans to sing with something of an older throbbing rhythm. They lose the bitter, anxious note given them in so many latter-day speeches or in Mr. Hearst's editorials, the flatted pitch betraying fear that our liberties may be something less imperishable than the rocks and rills which cradled them. They can carry confidence and faith to millions of Americans for whom the old American dream has not yet curdled.

II

That dream itself was largely one of freedom. It was born in the hearts of men who wanted freedom enough to fight the wilderness for it. And for the greater number of them, from Daniel Boone who wanted room enough "to rassle b'ars in" to the Polish immigrant who wanted a loom and a less crowded ghetto and no more pogroms, the wilderness and its simple, natural freedom were forthcoming.

Sir Charles Lyell, English geologist, traveled through the eastern seaboard of the United States in 1841, as open-mouthed as any Englishman of his time could be at its geological wealth and at the freedom of its people. When he asked the keeper of his inn at Corning, N. Y., to find his coachman for him, that free-born Yankee called into the barroom: "Where is the gentleman that brought this man here?" It was, Sir Charles concluded, the young country's chief blessing.

"I am also aware that the blessing alluded to," he wrote in his diary, "and many others which they enjoy, belong to a progressive, as contrasted with a stationary, state of society; that they characterize the new colony, where there is abundance of unoccupied land, and a ready outlet to a redundant laboring class. They are not the result of a democratic, as compared with a monarchical or aristocratic, constitution, nor the fruits of an absolute equality of religious sects, still less of universal suffrage."

Karl Marx paraphrased Sir Charles on this point a few years later, but the identification of freedom with political liberty was already frozen in American thinking. Twenty years later, at the beginning of the Civil War, more than half the entire area of the United States, over a billion acres, still belonging to the Government. The opening of the West had hardly started. So long as a man could move, and stretch his arms, and "rassle" new bears, he was not far wrong in thinking himself free. And if he thanked the Constitution or his right to vote for this blessing of freedom, it was an error which history and the inviting, empty prairies overlooked.

Today the sons and grandsons of these searchers for freedom have reached a full stop in the expansive pressure of a young people into its promised land. For a few hundred farmers, crowded from the soil by the relentless growth of tenancy—which has claimbed in Iowa until 60 percent of the State's 222,000 farms are tenant-operated in 1936, and 80 percent are mortgaged—there is the Matanuska Valley in Alaska. For a few hundred textile workers in New York City, whose very looms have been transported to the cheaper-labor cities of the South, there is Mr. Tugwell's Hightstown, N. J., resettlement project. Both were designed as symbols to revive the old American confidence in the invincibility of the pioneer. But both serve today to remind Americans that there is no longer an open geographical frontier offering freedom to large numbers of those who seek it.

There are still drought and grasshoppers and business depressions and tax-collecting politicians, it is true. But without unoccupied land for a redundant laboring class the older pioneer virtues of individual strength and character have been seen for nearly 7 years to falter badly against even these old adversaries. You can't "rassle," many Americans have learned, a public utility or the United States Steel Corp.

Instead, a few have learned, you can organize. It is among these few that Mr. Browder still numbers most of his 51,000 enrolled supporters. But his party's campaign to become a mass revolutionary party has been planned in larger figures. Only an embittered class of industrial workers can be won by talk of dialectics, proletarian dictatorship, and "Hands Off China." Besides them, the black-browed Marxist has slowly but carefully learned, he must win the support of millions of Americans who still feel themselves the sons of pioneers and who dream the great American dream.

For most of these, he argues, property has become an empty word, a memory, like stone walls and rail fences to an Iowa farmer. Where the title deeds and gilt-printed certificates have survived, the cold, enlacing grip of finance capital on management has wrenched both profit and the sense of ownership from the shell of property to which the middle class has clung. The old controversy of Marxist scholars as to the relative rates of growth of the so-called middle and working classes has been forgotten. It has been dwarfed by the blunt, unpleasant fact that every year, growing by geometrical progression through prosperity and depression, there are more men and women dependent for a living on a job, the surplus value of their labor taken from them, the specter of unemployment staring them in the face.

The interests of these Americans, Mr. Browder and his board of strategy have seen, lie with those of the working class. Only their loyalties, the accumulated pressure of a strong tradition, keep them befuddled by a Liberty League which works for liberty only for the rich. The Communists have set out this year to change these loyalties.

They have premised their plans on the assumption that the new allegiance of these millions need not be to Moscow, but to Bunker Hill and Harper's Ferry. They have found in the American dream issues which are fresh and vital today. By a policy of "united front" with other groups which recognize these issues, and by working on social and economic problems which have replaced the geographical frontier, they propose to use the American dream in a new search for freedom.

III

The primary purpose of the Yankees moving westward across the American Continent, and of the later Americans who came as immigrants to a country already settled, was to make a living. A better living has been the first promise they have demanded of those who wished to change their homes or their ways of thinking. In recent years the depression, unemployment, and increasing fear of an accelerating spiral of boom and panic leading to some undefined disaster have prepared many Americans to listen to tales of greener pastures.

This the Communists have recognized, and their appeal for new support rests squarely on a promise of abundance. To support the promise, they can point with powerful effect to the constricting scope of human life and enterprise in the middle-class nations of the modern world. With much less effect as yet, at least for Americans, they can cite the rising standard of living and the widening world of the Soviet Union. But while they wait for these two converging lines to meet in inevitable revolution, there are other elements of the American dream which they can shape to their own purposes.

The first of these is the desire of security. The depression has been blamed perhaps too much, for the rising clamor which has enlisted even the Republican Party in support of the principles of social insurance. The true cause may have been rather the prosperity of postwar years, which sucked farmers to the cities and undermined the independence of the small merchant and producer. Merger and monopoly were the order of the day, and the economics of self-sufficiency were relegated to the textbooks, unlearned and unpracticed.

How far this change has already gone may be seen in the increasing repudiation by large numbers of citizens, not all of them on relief rolls, of the venerable American maxim that insecurity is a necessary incentive to hard work. What would make men work, we used to ask, if it were not for the wolf at the door?

How can they work, many now ask instead, if they have no access to the tools with which to work? These are no longer the ax and flintlock with which Daniel Boone made insecurity his blessing of freedom. Today they are jobs, for corporations, banks, and railroads, work to be done with hand or brain for someone else, and a wage at the end of the week. Even the farmers, caught in the spider web of mortgages and closing markets, have begun to learn that the incentive of fear, when independence has dried up with the free land, is small defense against the wolf.

Another traditional element of the American dream, according to the Communist analysis, is the revolt against injustice. To a nation familiar with abolitionists, quakers, and pacifists, this is nothing new. Even its most recent forms have only put into the conversation of increasing numbers of Americans what Ruskin knew about himself 65 years ago.

"For my own part," he wrote, "I will put up with this state of things, passively, not an hour longer. I simply cannot paint, nor read, nor look at minerals, nor do anything else that I like, and the very light of the morning sky has become hateful to me, because of the misery that I know of, and see signs of where I know it not, which no imagination can interpret too bitterly. Therefore, as I have said, I will endure it no longer quietly."

I once knew a missionary in China, a man of fine, explosive moral indignation. His ancestors had been Connecticut Yankees, whose tombstones in the cemeteries of Litchfield County, the Western Reserve, Iowa, and California marked one of the trails of American history. Its last expansive thrust sent him into China, equipped with little but his Bible and the American dream. The misery he saw around him made him rage and quiver.

A few days ago I met his son, organizing unemployed workers in New Jersey. With him one of the driving forces of American life had come full circle. The religious character of the older emotional protest had changed. But no one who has seen a Yankee agitator, like this missionary's son, forced by the misery he sees to break his silence, can doubt that his accents are those of his father, and of Emerson and of Thoreau.

Much of the same ethical basis underlies still another of the elements in modern American thinking, especially that of a younger generation, on which the Communists have based their strategy and shaped their language. This is the desire for a world of ideas that makes sense. It is the belief that the values and the esthetics of a civilized people, like its economics and its social mores, are not predestined to perpetual confusion and debasement.

It is this half-inarticulate conviction that has enlisted so many younger writers in the United States under the banner of a still-nascent proletarian literature. The treason of the intellectuals has become a series of mass desertions from the standards of a business society. The present confusion of many of these younger writers belies their avowed desire for synthesis and order. Yet large numbers of them have joined the chorus of revolt, apparently for some personal satisfaction they derive from looking at the still dim outlines of an integral world.

It may be that the attraction to them of the Marxist world is nothing more than the ageless appeal of any church to any believer. It may be simply a rock on which to rest a weary head. But there are few such syntheses left with equally compelling vitality inside the world of middle-class culture and ideas, according to the Communists; and they claim to be embarrassed by the number of their recruits who come to them for faith alone.

All these things, it may be argued, are not new, by the very token of the ease with which the Communists can find American words with which to fit them. We have sought freedom and security before, and rebelled against injustice, and looked with patience for integration in a world that moves too fast for any simple hypothesis to hold it. Those who have failed have become cynical, but have gone on living, and there has been little change.

Some young Americans have found two new and ponderable changes, which have made the whole equation new. The first is Soviet Russia. To the imagination of a Montana wheat grower or a Detroit mechanic, hard empiricists in their American dream, the scale of 5-year plans and their tough and palpable reality may make them compelling visions. Americans know of their own experience that steel and wheat and machines rank high among the things for which men live.

The second is Marxism. It is not the party line of any orthodox or schismatic group, but the tool for understanding which a few scholars, and fewer leaders, have learned to use. To the English world it is still fresh and untested; and it has the plausible ring in many ears that only those doctrines have which promise the millennium—in this case, a society without classes and without poverty, where men may be really free.

"The objective, external forces which have hitherto dominated history," Engels promised, and the promise still holds good, "will then pass under the control of men themselves. It is only from this point that men, with full consciousness, will fashion their own history; it is only from this point that the social causes set in motion by men wil have, predominantly and in constantly increasing measure, the effects willed by men. It is humanity's leap from the realm of necessity into the realm of freedom."

IV

For some years it has been easy to dismiss the Communists as foreigners in the fatal sense of that term, alien to our people and to our land, speaking a language few men understood. Only out of our own soil, it was cheerfully repeated, could roots spring that would fulfill what Herbert Croly called the "promise of American life."

In one sense the Communists have admitted the validity of this claim in their adoption of Thomas Paine, Samuel Adams, and John Brown for their political iconology, and their campaign to capture the American dream. In another, they have repudiated it, in their steadfast insistence that there is no exception to the rules of capitalist decay.

The continent is no longer virgin, they insist. Its people count their ancestors in all the corners of the world. They make their living and sell their labor as in any other industrial country. The exceptional scale and speed of American life serve only to telescope the inexorable changes inherent in all industrial civilization. The specter that was haunting Europe in 1848 has appeared mysteriously lurking in the shadows of America.

This specter may not be conjured away so easily in the years to come as in the last decade. In Gary, Ind., along the Monongahela River, on the San Francisco docks, and in the rayon mills of North Carolina, it is reported, the Communists have found new men, speaking the American tongue, unhampered by doctrinaire orders from Moscow, to spread their naturalized doctrine.

William Z. Foster, the party's elder statesman and three times candidate for President, is the son of a Taunton, Mass., carriage washer, who learned his economics not from Karl Marx but from Lester F. Ward. On a platform he chews gum with the slow, deliberate rhythm of a baseball fan. Robert Minor, a Communist candidate in November for Governor of New York State, is a grandson of a first cousin to Gen. Sam Houston, first president of Texas. At the 1936 convention he nominated, as "an average American," Earl Browder, former bookkeeper and Standard Oil employee, who wears a gold wedding ring and lives in Yonkers, speaks with the slow, dry irony of a Kansas farmer, and writes in a style that suggests a little of Daniel Webster mixed with much of "Sockless Jerry" Simpson.

These men spoke at Communist meetings during the campaign to shirt-sleeved mechanics and miners, organizers from Alabama textile mills, sailors and stevedores from three American coasts. Most of their lieutenants appeared to be young. Few were women. A surprising majority had Scotch or Irish names and Yankee cheekbones. On these men, more than on Browder, or Foster, depends the success of this new experiment with the American dream.

Even more will it depend, perhaps, on the competition they encounter. It would be comforting to think that there was a reasonable body of ideas being shaped by liberals or conservatives to bring the old American dream into line with new realities in American life.

The depression has uprooted many families and with them many loyalties and ways of thinking. When they settle again, it will inevitably be in new patterns.

In the short run, most of these appear to be of two kinds. On the one hand, conservatives hold out the nostalgic hope of a return to the older agrarian virtues, confused themselves between the liassez-faire spirit of independence they preach and the controlled monopoly they practice. On the other hand there is a fumbling effort to trim and cut the American dream by endless compromise, a liberal muddling-through which promises only scarcity to the sons of men who wanted abundance and freedom.

Given time, either of these sets of ideas might bend the tradition of Daniel Boone and the American pioneer to the new and imperious demands that daily living makes on millions of confused Americans. But there may well be no time. In a world where war and fascism are bacteria in the air we breathe, the few who see the danger and prepare to struggle against it may win the title they have claimed—spiritual inheritors of the founding fathers.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Budenz, we have had testimony here previously that Harriet Lucy Moore was a Communist, and in addition, we have introduced extensive records showing that she was a very active person in the Institute of Pacific Relations.

Will you tell us if you knew that Harriet Lucy Moore was a Communist?

Mr. BUDENZ. Yes, sir; I knew Harriet Lucy Moore was a Communist.

Mr. MORRIS. Did you meet her personally?

Mr. BUDENZ. Yes, sir; she attended several meetings of the national committee, the enlarged national committee, and I believe, Mr. Chairman, that should be explained.

The national committee is generally composed of 60 members, though it can go up and down according to Communist exigencies, but that is not the national committee meeting to which I refer.

The national committee meeting to which I refer is the enlarged national committee which takes place about four times a year and in which from 300 to 400 Communist leaders throughout the country are invited to attend. A very strict security surveillance is kept on the meeting by the Communists and it is very secret. It generally took place up in the forties in New York in a large hall there which the Communists had rented off and on.

Now, there at that meeting, occasionally in the forties—the exact time I couldn't say just at the moment—but Harriet Lucy Moore was present. Only Communists were admitted to these meetings.

Mr. MORRIS. Was Harriet Lucy Moore a member of the cell that operated in the Institute of Pacific Relations?

Mr. BUDENZ. She was, both according to my knowledge gained in national meetings and in the reports of the Politburo.

Mr. MORRIS. Do you know anything else about Harriet Lucy Moore's activities, Mr. Budenz?

Mr. BUDENZ. Well, they were called so much to my attention that I am really at a loss how to express them; that is to say, she wrote articles which were passed on by the Politburo and she was specifically praised for a review of Owen Lattimore's book which she presented, I think, to Soviet Russia Today, though it may have been another magazine. I remember the incident. It was brought up as a sample of good Communist work.

Mr. MORRIS. Was she active in Russian war relief, as well?

Mr. BUDENZ. Yes, sir; she was.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, we have previously indicated that Harriet Lucy Moore was the acting secretary of the Institute of Pacific Relations, as well as at one time chairman of the nominating committee of the institute.

Mr. Budenz, we would like some testimony from you on the subject of whether or not Owen Lattimore was a member of the Communist organization. Can you relate the episodes that indicated to you that Owen Lattimore was a member of the Communist organization?

Mr. BUDENZ. These episodes which I have brought to your attention?

Mr. MORRIS. Yes. You have called to our attention five or six episodes.

Mr. BUDENZ. That is correct.

Mr. MORRIS. Would you explain these in detail, stressing at all times in your relating of them the fact of Owen Lattimore's association with the Communist organization?

Mr. BUDENZ. These episodes indicate within the conspiracy the importance of Lattimore as a sort of an advance guard for the Communist Party out in the land of the heathens, so to speak, as he was not exactly described; but as he was described, and his active and prominent part from the Communist viewpoint, such as his being assigned to prepare the ground, at least for this campaign of agrarian reformers and Asia for the Asiatic, his being conversant with changes in the line, which actually did take place, and after information we found the correct way in which to carry them out, his being likewise stated by Mr. Jack Stachel when he went with Henry Wallace to Soviet Siberia and to China——

Mr. MORRIS. Will you relate them in chronological order?

Mr. BUDENZ. You want me to go over them again? I was trying to save time.

Mr. MORRIS. You did get into some of them when we were talking about Frederick Field. I wish you would rerelate them, stressing on each occasion the role that Lattimore had on these particular episodes.

Senator O'CONOR. I think it would be informative to us all if he would enumerate the episodes first, and then possibly go into detail in confirmation.

Mr. BUDENZ. 1937, that was the episode in regard to Browder's bringing forward the idea that the Communists should be represented as democratic, as agrarian reformers, as Asians for the Asiatics.

There Lattimore's important role is indicated by his being given an assignment by the Politburo.

Mr. MORRIS. And what was the assignment in general?

Mr. BUDENZ. The assignment was to be responsible for seeing that there was produced in the American publication market articles and books which would carry forward this point of view.

Mr. MORRIS. Did his role in Pacific Affairs come up at that time?

Mr. BUDENZ. Yes, sir; at that time it was stressed by Earl Browder specifically as leader of the party, that Lattimore was performing a very great service for the party in Pacific Affairs by more and more bringing in Communist authors.

Browder said: "We appreciate that every writer for Pacific Affairs can't be a Communist," that, however, the number must be increased and that Lattimore had shown a willingness and readiness to do so.

Mr. MORRIS. Subsequent to that time, did you follow the publication Pacific Affairs?

Mr. BUDENZ. Yes; although, of course, today that is not all fresh in my memory.

Mr. MORRIS. Is it your testimony that all of the people writing for Pacific Affairs were Communists?

Mr. BUDENZ. No, sir; it is not. I said that Mr. Browder stated that it was not understood that everyone who wrote for Pacific Affairs was a Communist; quite the contrary.

The very function of Pacific Affairs or the Institute of Pacific Relations was to have a non-Communist appearance and a non-Communist approach, but carrying the burden of the Communist viewpoint always.

Now, the fact is that some of the writers for Pacific Affairs undoubtedly were non-Communists. That was stated by Browder, and, I think I can say that from him in other discussions this was intended to be so.

As a matter of fact, it was even said that people of outstanding position would undoubtedly be attracted to the Institute of Pacific Relations as they had been in the past and that would be a gain to the Communists because their names would be used and very frequently they would not know anything about what was happening, they being busy people, so the emphasis on Lattimore was that he was getting more and more Communists, however, to give the proper weight to the publications of the Institute of Pacific Relations.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, we will, at a subsequent time, during Mr. Budenz' testimony, put into the record the Communist writers who did contribute to Pacific Affairs, but at this time I would like to proceed with Mr. Budenz' narrating the episodes and indicating to him from his own experience that Lattimore was a Communist.

Mr. BUDENZ. 1943 was the report by Frederick Vanderbilt Field, as I say, my understanding being that he had just seen Lattimore and that Lattimore told him there was to be a change in regard to Chiang Kai-shek, that the negative criticism was to be changed to positive criticism. In other words, into an effort eventually to destroy Chiang Kai-shek as the leader of the Nationalist government in China. That, of course, was borne out by the fact that we immediately received verification of that, the only difficulty being that we interpreted it somewhat incorrectly, as it happens every once in a while.

This is not only a difficulty of the Communists here; it is a difficulty that Moscow has in getting over their viewpoints, where they have a double-talking viewpoint. We had that situation on a number of other occasions to which I could refer, but I think I better not or we go far afield, but that is not a new experience in the Communist policy.

The Politburo wishes really to smash those with whom they are coalescing, but that has to be the property or knowledge of the Communists, whereas the coalition has to be the property or knowledge of the non-Communists.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Budenz, is it your testimony at that time that Mr. Field had received an official Communist communication from Lattimore?

Mr. BUDENZ. That is correct.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you tell us of any other episodes?

Mr. BUDENZ. 1944, the trip of Vice President Henry Wallace. I don't know whether I can emphasize the importance of this trip to the Communists as much as it should be. It received a very great attention from the Politburo and it was constantly brought to my attention by Jack Stachel as the representative of the Politburo as a very important mission which would redound to the benefit of the Communist cause in the Far East.

In that respect a great deal of dependence was placed on Owen Lattimore, whom I was told by Mr. Stachel at that time to consider a Communist——

Mr. MORRIS. What do you mean, "consider a Communist"? Is that a technical word you are using?

Mr. BUDENZ. That was a technical term we used which meant he was an authority from the Communist viewpoint. He was a Marxist authority.

Mr. MORRIS. Was that warning given to you by anyone else at that time?

Mr. BUDENZ. Well, there were many other references of similar character. I remember specifically Stachel's because my relations with him were very close and he was constantly giving me these instructions.

I do know that similar statements were made within the Politburo itself by other members in connection with Wallace's trip.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you tell us the significance of that? Was that a note of warning to you by Stachel, or was it an admonition, or what?

Mr. BUDENZ. No, I should say an underscoring of Lattimore's position, that we should be on the alert for anything that Lattimore might say or do. That was really carrying out the Communist line.

If I may explain that for just a moment, there isn't just the line to carry out, but you must know at any particular moment how the line is to be emphasized. You might talk about united fronts, but you might be emphasizing one particular element in the united fronts, or something like that, or, in the case of Italy, where we were taken by surprise, you might attack Badoglio one day and find you should be with him the next day, according to Moscow's policy.

That was within all one line of procedure with regard to Italy, but Badoglio suddenly changed in that line.

Now, in order to be advised of such things as that, we were to rely on anything Lattimore might say or do that we would be aware of.

Mr. MORRIS. Were you also to handle the name of Lattimore in any particular way?

Mr. BUDENZ. Well, with consideration; yes, sir. As a matter of fact, it has been handled with great consideration.

Mr. MORRIS. And you handled it with consideration?

Mr. BUDENZ. That's right.

Mr. MORRIS. Could Stachel possibly be giving you misinformation under those circumstances?

Mr. BUDENZ. That is utterly impossible. The Communist Party is an army and the whole strength of its invasion of the country, which is what it is doing, is being advised correctly through the whole organization insofar as it is necessary for a person to be advised of the facts in a situation, but when someone is designated as a Communist that is utterly impossible to be false, because if that were so then the whole thing would fall into chaos.

Senator O'Conor. Just before you leave that episode, the one in 1944, and with specific reference to the conversation with Stachel, do you place any significance on the fact that he told you to consider Lattimore as a Communist; that is to say, were those words used, "to consider him as"?

Mr. Budenz. Yes, sir.

Now, you understand that some of these discussions and considerations had to be carried on under pressure. As a matter of fact many offices have arranged their walls so that you can't hear through them for various business reasons, but ours were arranged that way so that the staff of the Daily Worker couldn't hear what was being said by the leadership because many confidential and secret messages were brought there.

Now, the thing is that because of that fact, and the danger of interruption, and all that, we tried to reduce everything to what I used to call political shorthand, my own term, namely, to make everything as concise as possible, and the phrase "to consider a man as Communist" came to me that he was an authority as a Communist and that we should regard him as such.

That is a distinction from other phrases, like "treat him as a Communist," or things like that.

Mr. Morris. What does that mean?

Mr. Budenz. That he is part of the Communist conspiracy. These things had to be divided because of interruptions by staff members of conversations of this character.

Mr. Sourwine. Do you mean that when a man had been referred to by the phrase "consider him as a Communist" that he was to be regarded as speaking with authority on matters of Communist ideology; that he was an interpreter of the line with the party back of him?

Mr. Budenz. That's correct.

Mr. Sourwine. And if a person was inclined in their own mind to differ with what such a man had said that he had better take notice that there was something wrong with their thinking because he was right?

Mr. Budenz. That is correct.

You must understand in the case of Mr. Lattimore this was only said at that time with regard to his functioning in the Wallace mission.

Mr. Morris. I did not understand whether you were trying to "treat" or "consider" Mr. Lattimore as a Communist.

Mr. Budenz. Consider him a Communist.

Mr. Morris. I thought you used the word "treat" in your testimony a while ago.

Mr. Budenz. I say that that was also a phrase used.

Mr. Sourwine. You mean that in connection with the Wallace mission the word was passed by the use of the phrase "consider him as a Communist," that with respect to that mission Mr. Lattimore might not be setting the line; he was giving the line, and he was interpreting that mission in Communist terms?

Mr. Budenz. That's correct. He was a representative of the party in the Wallace mission.

Senator Smith. He was sort of a VIP in the movement?

Mr. Budenz. That's right.

Mr. Morris. Would a man like that be allowed to make a statement, to voice a criticism of the Soviet Union, which would not be consistent with the official Communist Party line?

Mr. Budenz. In order to explain that, I think we have to understand the Communist position, the position of the Communist conspiracy.

Mr. Morris. As best you can answer the question, though, Mr. Budenz.

Mr. Budenz. He would be granted an exemption if the burden of his work was such as to rebound to the line of the party in that field to which he was assigned.

Mr. Morris. Do you know of any such exemptions that were granted to people?

Mr. Budenz. Yes, I do.

Mr. Morris. Would you explain that?

Mr. Budenz. There was a noted Hollywood actor who was certainly a devoted Communist. As a matter of fact, he wept every time there was any thought that he might not be a Communist, although he couldn't publicly proclaim it. He was granted an exemption to contribute to the Finnish relief because it was said in the political bureau by V. J. Jerome that, "What are a few cents to Finland compared to the place he occupies in Hollywood for the party? There is no scandal in the party. No one knows he is a Communist."

An open Communist couldn't do that without being expelled, but a concealed Communist is permitted these exemptions.

In another case a college professor who has done very yeoman work for the party, particularly in Communist fronts—he always comes back to the Communist fronts, no matter whatl ine is being pursued—was given an exemption to say a kind word about Trotsky. Of course, Trotsky was thoroughly dead at that time, but he was given permission to say a kind word about him in order to distinguish him from the Communists because the burden of his activities in Communist fronts, to which I say he constantly returned, was much greater from the party viewpoint from this casual reference to the fact that he wasn't known publicly as a Communist and there would be no scandal in the party. That is a phrase used.

Mr. Morris. Can you tell us of any other episodes that indicated to you that Lattimore was a Communist?

Mr. Budenz. Incidentally, in this respect, I might bring this out in another way in order that it be understood and not cause confusion, and that is that just recently when a number of Communists who were heads of trade-unions signed affidavits that they had all suddenly had a common inspiration to resign from the Communist Party, the Daily Worker ran an explanation that their function and the way they should act would be different from that of the rank and file. The rank-and-file Communist must continue because he is expected to assert openly that he is a Communist at all costs, but these leaders, because they have responsibilities to great masses, organizations, funds, and the like, may properly, while continuing their fraternal relation with the Communist Party, swear that they are not Communists.

In other words, right there is a note. I could bring in many other examples. I want to show that there is an open example there in the pages of the Daily Worker that here is a leader of a trade-union who is a Communist. Ben Gold is an example, among others.

Suddenly one day he says he has resigned from the Communist Party and he can take the affidavit with the National Labor Relations Board. The Communists in the Daily Worker had to explain that because that did create some difficulty, and so they said that the rank-and-file Communist must continue to assert his open communism. He has no responsibility to large institutions, funds, and to the welfare of masses, but those who have responsibility, while maintaining their fraternal relations with the party, may repudiate the party openly in this way, so they went to the extent of repudiating the party in that case.

Mr. MORRIS. Would you tell us the next episode, Mr. Budenz?

Mr. BUDENZ. The next episode is a brief one, but a rather important one, and that was during the Amerasia incident, which occurred very rapidly and it is not as sharp, even though later, in my memory as some others, but nevertheless in the Amerasia case in 1945 there were many hurried meetings in the Politburo and segments of the Politburo, and in that connection Lattimore's name was mentioned several times; that is, that he should be appealed to for help, and, finally, Jack Stachel did report that Lattimore had been of considerable assistance in the Amerasia case.

The nature of the assistance I could not say.

Senator O'CONOR. Could you state, Mr. Budenz, by whom Lattimore's name was mentioned? You said it was mentioned by several.

Mr. BUDENZ. By Jack Stachel specifically mentioning that he had been of great assistance to the defendants in the Amerasia case.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Budenz, will you describe for us the role of Jack Stachel and your relationship to him at this time?

Mr. BUDENZ. Jack Stachel, who is among those who were convicted in the trial on Foley Square, has been for years the most important Communist in the United States for all-around activity. He was one of the small commission of five which was in constant touch with Moscow.

Mr. BUDENZ. He also was the one who brought the line very frequently to the political bureau from this contact with Moscow representatives. When I say "in touch with Moscow," that doesn't always mean with the Soviet Embassy or Consulate; it means through intermediaries.

He was the one who was in touch with Gerhart Eisler.

In other words, he was the most important cog in the Communist machine linking up the legal party, the open party in this country, with the illegal Stalinite representatives from abroad.

Mr. MORRIS. Would you say that he monitored your work in the Daily Worker?

Mr. BUDENZ. In addition to that he became a representative of the political bureau of the Daily Worker. That was a custom, though, for years, different personnel being involved on that.

When I first went with the Daily Worker, Alexander Bittelman of the party was the chief even though Hathaway was supposed to be editor-in-chief. He met every day with the editorial staff of the Daily Worker. He could meet because he knew the line that he had received from Communist International representatives.

Mr. Morris. Was Jack Stachel your superior?

Mr. Budenz. Just a moment. Even Bittelman was succeeded by others like William Z. Foster and others and Stachel for a long time during a large part of my being managing editor was a representative of the Politburo. He therefore was my direct and immediate superior in the conspiracy.

Mr. Morris. Was there another episode involving Owen Lattimore that you can testify about, Mr. Budenz, connected with his Japanese activities?

Mr. Budenz. Oh, yes. That leads us, of course, into another field and I wasn't thinking along that line at the moment.

As the war against Japan approached the climax the Communist conspiracy proceeded to emphasize the necessity of a hard peace in Japan. They had in mind a Morgenthau plan for Japan and anyone who was against that, who would treat the Japanese people in any reasonable terms, was denounced as a Facist and an agent of the Zaibatsu. That is a Japanese term, as I understand it, meaning the industrialists of Japan.

That was the Communist position which you could find very extremely emphasized in the Daily Worker and other Communist publications of that period.

They wanted to have a hard peace for Japan, just as they emphasized the necessity of a hard peace for Germany. This was clearly told us in order to alienate these countries from the United States.

In this connection a very valuable Lattimorian contribution was made. Just in the middle of the Communist campaign Lattimore gave an interview to the United Press attacking the Zaibatsu and declaring that the democratic element should be brought forward. That's what the Communists were saying, the democratic element from the Communist viewpoint being themselves.

Now, this statement by Mr. Lattimore in that period was considered so important that extra copies of the Daily Worker were published and distributed throughout the country and the party was advised in a private directive—they get out many of these private directives—well, they advocated that Guenther Stein's books be published in that manner and Harrison Forman's books, and the like.

In one of these directives they emphasized that Lattimore's interviews, just as it appeared in the Daily Worker, should be given the widest distribution in trade-unions, youth groups, and the like; in communities, in other words.

Senator Smith. What year was that?

Mr. Budenz. 1945.

Mr. Sourwine. Doesn't Zaibatsu mean a little more than industrialist? Doesn't it mean the larger merchants? Does it not carry a connotation of blood-sucking oppression?

Mr. Budenz. That is correct. It was the use by the Communists of an attack upon a group who perhaps needed criticism, but the Communists used that to identify themselves with all of the anti-Zaibatsu elements and to make themselves the sole democratic group.

In the midst of this campaign Mr. Lattimore's statement served Communist purposes well. I cannot say that that was the arrangement of the Communist Party in this instance—I don't know that—but I know that we were instructed to use it because it was so effective.

Mr. Sourwine. You think it might have been rather timely?

Mr. BUDENZ. It was certainly considered timely by the Communists. It was right in line with their campaign.

Mr. MORRIS. You mentioned Guenther Stein and Harry Forman as having books published by the Communist Party. Were they both Communists?

Mr. BUDENZ. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORRIS. You know that from your official position with the Communist Party?

Mr. BUDENZ. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, we have here numerous exhibits bearing on the testimony of Mr. Budenz on Communist Party policy on Japan, as well as the UP release at that time, the interview at that time which Mr. Lattimore gave. I prefer to introduce those into the record immediately after lunch. The witness seems to be tired, and I suggest that we adjourn until 2 o'clock.

Senator SMITH. I have one question I would like to ask you if you can tell us now.

I thought I heard you say that the purpose of the movement for a coalition government in China was to destroy somebody or some movement.

Mr. BUDENZ. Destroy Chiang Kai-shek and establish Communist China.

As a matter of fact, Senator, if time will permit later, I can refer you to statements by the Chinese leaders to that effect right at the moment they were advocating a coalition government.

Senator SMITH. Was that before, after, or about the time that Lattimore became the confidential adviser of Chiang Kai-shek?

Mr. BUDENZ. That was after.

Senator SMITH. Do you regard Lattimore's connection or appointment as a confidential adviser to Chiang Kai-shek a part of that plan to have a coalition government to destroy Chiang Kai-shek?

Mr. BUDENZ. That I could not testify to. I have my opinion, but I cannot testify with absolute knowledge, of my own knowledge.

You see, during that period partly I was out in the Middle West, and after taking over the duties of the Daily Worker, and I couldn't say that of my own knowledge.

Senator SMITH. You did know that Lattimore turned up as an adviser to Chiang Kai-shek?

Mr. BUDENZ. That is correct. And I know that the Communist political bureau was not ill-served by that function. That he was deliberately put there for that purpose, I cannot say.

Senator SMITH. You do not know who put him there, or how that came about?

Mr. BUDENZ. No, sir.

Senator O'CONOR. If there are no further questions the committee will take a recess until 2:30.

(Thereupon, at 12:30 p. m., the hearing recessed, to reconvene at 2:30 p. m., same day.)

AFTERNOON SESSION

(The committee reconvened at 2:30 p. m. upon the expiration of the recess.)

Senator O'CONOR. The hearing will please be in order.

TESTIMONY OF LOUIS FRANCIS BUDENZ, CRESTWOOD, N. Y.—Resumed

Senator O'Conor. Mr. Budenz, just before the noon recess there were certain matters referred to concerning Owen Lattimore about which I should like to ask you a few questions. You had recounted the several episodes starting in 1937 and then up to 1943 and 1944, which, in your opinion, referred to Owen Lattimore's activities. I would like to ask you whether throughout that period you met Owen Lattimore.

Mr. Budenz. No, sir; I did not meet Mr. Lattimore at any time until at the hearing in Washington.

Senator O'Conor. My next question is whether it is significant, and inasmuch as you say you were yourself active in the affairs of the Communist Party and you attribute to Mr. Lattimore certain interests in furtherance of Communist purposes, whether it is significant that you did not meet him or know him.

Mr. Budenz. It is significant. It is significant in the sense that many men of Mr. Lattimore's functioning were directed—I don't know that he was directed—but many men of Mr. Lattimore's functioning were directed specifically to avoid all contacts with official Communist organs that would commit them in any way in the public eye. As a matter of fact, there is quite a difference of responsibility among members of the Communist Party, Mr. Chairman.

I don't know whether you want me to pursue that or not.

Senator O'Conor. I think it would be of very great interest to have you do so at this time.

Mr. Budenz. We have what I call the Communist spectrum. The spectrum of Communist allegiance; that is a term I used while I was still a Communist and to some extent was adopted by other people who discussed this in the Politburo. That is to say, we will take the spy.

Anyone engaged in espionage like Judith Coplon, and there are a number of those people trained for espionage alone, must not give any indication of any association with Communists. As a matter of fact, they are not even permitted to approach Communist branch meetings; they are ordered not to do so. They cannot have any contact with known Communists.

That of course is quite obvious why that would be. The infiltrator of government is somewhat in a similar position and is not supposed to have any vestige of Communist membership on him and to avoid any public relationship with Communists. Beyond that he is also permitted of course within limitations to make such statements critical of the Communist Party as will assure his non-Communist standing so that he may put the burden—I use that word "burden" of his activity in the Communist cause because that was the way it was used—the weight of his activities in the Communist cause.

Then there is the infiltrator of other organizations. They likewise have the same responsibilities, though they are not so much protected as anyone in the Government. I mean protected by the Communist Party. They likewise can misrepresent.

You take, for example, during the one month that I was supposedly a non-Communist, though a Communist, in August 1935, I was specifically directed by Stachel again to criticize the party to non-Communists but to do it lightly and to put the burden of my arguments in favor of cooperation with the Communists, although I was a fully admitted Communist Party member working as a non-Communist until they could decide what my function should be.

We have also the case of even Ben Gold, the open Communist, and this was worked out while I was still in the party, though it didn't come to fruition until the next CIO convention, who as an open Communist signed a report denouncing Communist infiltration in the CIO. That was in order to ameliorate the feelings of Philip Murray.

These special exemptions are granted by the district leader functioning as a non-Communist in infiltrating into other organizations in order that his infiltration may be effective.

Next in the category are the members of the Communist fronts who have still another set of responsibilities, to follow out the fronts, to respond when called upon, but who again deny they are Communists, and of course in denying it have to express occasionally why they are not Communists. You just can't say, "I am not a Communist," you have to explain why. They are permitted to do that, although 95 percent of the Communist fronts, according to my knowledge, are members of the Communist Party.

When I say members of the Communist Party I do not mean necessarily card-carrying Communists because most Communists do not carry cards but are subject to Communist allegiance.

Then there are the open party members, the expendables as they have been called, the rank-an-file Communists, the picket-line Communists who are supposed to be open, and they are not permitted to deviate from the line of the party because they represent the reputation of the party.

Likewise with the bureaucrat or functionary. The word "bureaucrat" is not used in the party. Although Lenin said our party is bureaucratic, they don't like to use that. They are functionaries. They, of course, have a deep responsibility and they cannot deviate from the party at all. Anyone who is a section organizer or district organizer of the party or the like in his person is the party because the leadership principle is very strong.

Among the bureaucrats, though, there are variations again. There are those illegal agents sent in here by Stalin who direct the party, who are largely underground; there are the open party representatives like William Z. Foster, today, and Browder when I was there, and the like; and then there are, of course, certain functionaries who for one reason or another, from time to time, become concealed.

Now each one of these, at the time that they perform these different functions, have different responsibilities in regard to how much they will assert their Communist integrity. The great question that was always put in the Politburo and at State committee meetings, and I have attended a number of State committee meetings where this question came up for lesser people in the party, those people who were concerned, the question always was how far they could go in order that they could carry on their deceit of others, what scandal it will create in the party.

According to the answer to that question were they granted a certain immunity from being quite regular from the party line or party regulations.

Senator O'Conor. Mr. Budenz, therefore did you consider it exceptional or extraordinary or unusual that Owen Lattimore was not known to you or seen by you during this period?

Mr. Budenz. No, sir; that could be said of a number of other people, some of whom later on were divulged to be Communists. That would be true of Dr. Norman Bethune, a noted Canadian surgeon who also was very active in the Communist Party in the United States and for various reasons was not known to me. I never saw him. He was supposed always to be a non-Communist. He asserted strenuously, he was not a Communist, but after he died in China, helping the Chinese Reds, Earl Browder announced at a public meeting that the wish of Bethune when he went to China was that he be publicly acknowledged to be a member of the Communist Party for many years.

Now Dr. Bethune was not known to me. I just mention him because his case was rather outstanding.

Senator O'Conor. All right, Mr. Morris, will you proceed then?

Mr. Morris. Mr. Chairman, we had gotten as far as Mr. Budenz' testimony on a certain press interview given by Mr. Owen Lattimore. I would like to introduce that into the record at this time.

Mr. Mandel, will you identify this photostat you have just given me?

Mr. Mandel. I have had this photostat made of the Daily Worker of September 5, 1945, page 8, of an article by Gwen Morgan entitled, "'Allies Must Break Japanese Monopolists' Grip,' says Lattimore."

Mr. Morris. Mr. Budenz, do you recognize that article?

Mr. Budenz. Yes, sir.

Mr. Morris. Were you editor of the Daily Worker when that was published?

Mr. Budenz. I was indeed; yes, sir.

Mr. Morris. Was that part of the Communist program to impose a hard peace on Japan?

Mr. Budenz. That is correct. You will find that this is accompanied in the Daily Worker by demands of a similar character though expressed sometimes in different language. Just at this time the campaign of the Communists was for a hard peace in Japan, and this hard peace was to be directed against the Zaibatzu.

That is in accordance with Communists calling other people Fascists or saying they are against monopoly and saying they are the only democratic elements. This campaign was to be carried on in that manner.

As a matter of fact, I believe we shall see an interesting development of this in the effort to destroy anyone connected with the Government who opposed a hard peace for Japan.

Mr. Morris. You mean people in our State Department?

Mr. Budenz. That is correct. That was the Communist program, but that would have to be developed further.

Mr. Morris. Now is there any particular thing in that article that you would like to comment further on, Mr. Budenz?

Mr. Budenz. I think not. The article more or less speaks for itself and it accompanies the campaign of the Daily Worker, which upon investigation would have been found to be along the same line. The emphasis of both the Daily Worker and of Mr. Lattimore was that the democratic elements in Japan should be brought forward, but when you examine who the democratic elements in Japan were, Mr. Lattimore doesn't examine them except very superficially, and the Daily Worker did, we will find them to be those represented by the Communists.

The importance of this article so far as I am concerned and so far as my knowledge is concerned is this: (1) That it was quite in line with the headline reading, " 'Allies must break Japanese monopolists' grip which was what the Communists were driving for at that time; (2) that it was used so widely by the Communist Party to my own knowledge—that is, among non-Communist groups.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, this photostat of the Daily Worker article, the Daily Worker of Wednesday, September 5, 1945, page 8, with the headline reading, " 'Allies must break Japanese monopolists' grip,' says Lattimore," I would like to have this introduced into the record and marked as the next consecutive exhibit.

Senator O'CONOR. It will be admitted and will be given the next consecutive number.

"ALLIES MUST BREAK JAPANESE MONOPOLISTS' GRIP" SAYS LATTIMORE

(By Gwen Morgan)

BALTIMORE, September 4 (UP).—Owen Lattimore, former adviser to Chiang Kai-shek, said today that the Allies must free Japan of the "Zaibatsu's" grip before democracy can develop there. He declared that the Zaibatsu—or industrialists—merged completely with the militarists in controlling Japan for aggression and that the primary control always was civilian.

"Together," he said, "they are like a small octopus with huge tentacles which holds everything in its power. Their tool and front was the Emperor, owner of vast shares and estates, and he still is—although now they are loudly disclaiming the militarists."

Lattimore said in an interview at Johns Hopkins University, where he is director of the Walter Hines Page School of International Relations, that preserving the Emperor and the Zaibatsu means preserving the "entire machinery that made Japan an aggressive country."

The biggest misconception about Japan, he said, is that the interests of the industrialists, the militarists and the Emperor differ.

"The only difference is that the civilians or industrialists are the go-slow crowd about aggression," he said. "The militarists are the go-fast. The Emperor belongs to both of them."

The Emperor's holdings alone, he said, amount to thousands of shares in banking, railroad, sugar, utilities, paper, and shipping companies, as well as hundreds of thousands of acres of land.

Lattimore said breaking the stranglehold of the Zaibatsu would make possible the development of a "genuine spontaneous and thoroughly Japanese movement which would substitute for the Emperor a real republic."

He declared that if this were permitted, supported, and encouraged by American policy it would take the form of middle-of-the-road democracy, and there would be no "danger" of communism.

"The only danger of communism would arise if American policy were to choke off the development of democracy, leaving communism as the only alternative to reactionary Japanese forces supported by the victorious powers," he said.

Lattimore said a democratic potential does exist in Japan, composed of thousands of small, independent businessmen who were not brought completely under the Zaibatsu until the war period and now would like to regain their independence; laborers who have been shorn of rights and poorly paid, and peasants whose cooperatives have been subject to monopoly control and who have been dominated by landlords, the most powerful of whom are related to the Zaibatsu and military families.

MONOPOLISTS' PROGRAM

Lattimore said the Zaibatsu were better prepared for defeat than the United States for victory.

"They already have put their collaborationist team on the field to capitalize on the United States belief that the Emperor controls them while, in fact, they control him," he said.

He predicted this would be their line of action:

1. To stimulate disorder and conflict in China.
2. To work up antagonism between Russia and the other Allies.
3. To be awfully good boys with the Americans and carry out their wishes. If any uprisings occur in the name of democracy, the Japanese authorities would run to the Allies and report it as subversive activity.

Mr. MORRIS. Are you acquainted with a publication called the United Nations World, whose editor is Louis Dolivet?

Senator O'CONNOR. I note that it is dated Baltimore, September 4. What is the year?

Mr. MORRIS. 1945.

Senator O'CONNOR. Thank you.

Mr. MORRIS. Are you acquainted with the United Nations World, the editor of which in 1950 was Louis Dolivet?

Mr. BUDENZ. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORRIS. What do you know of Louis Dolivet?

Mr. BUDENZ. Louis Dolivet was officially stated to me by Earl Browder to be a Communist.

Mr. MORRIS. Are you acquainted with an article appearing in the United Nations——

Mr. BUDENZ. May I explain how that arose?

Mr. MORRIS. Yes.

Mr. BUDENZ. It may take your time.

Mr. MORRIS. That is all right.

Mr. BUDENZ. There was a predecessor to this paper which was independent, we didn't have the United Nations. It was Free World or something like that.

Mr. MORRIS. Yes.

Mr. BUDENZ. As chairman of the publications commission of the party I organized for the penetration of the Free World and even had arranged for a secretary to be in Louis Dolivet's office, which was a very common method of Communist penetration to get information. I first consulted because this was partially an international matter, I consulted Mr. Browder. He told me not to do this, that Mr. Dolivet was with us, that he had technically resigned in order to come to the United States, but that he was a Communist in good standing so far as the party was concerned.

Mr. MORRIS. That is the same Louis Dolivet who became editor of United Nations World?

Mr. BUDENZ. That is the same man.

Mr. MORRIS. Now I have a copy of the United Nation World dated March 1950, the masthead of which shows that Louis Dolivet was the editor. On page 22 there is an article, Asia Reconquers Asia, by Owen Lattimore. I ask you if you have read that article, Mr. Budenz.

Mr. BUDENZ. Yes, sir; I have.

Mr. MORRIS. Would you comment on it for us, please?

Mr. BUDENZ. This article carries out very skillfully the Asia for the Asiatics campaign of the Communists. Of course, this is after my being in the party, but it carries forward exactly what the idea was.

Mr. MORRIS. You learned what the Communist policy was from your experience in the Communist movement?

Mr. BUDENZ. That is correct. It begins with this statement:

> It is clear that the change of power in China cannot properly be described as primarily a victory of Communist armies or of Communist ideas. The chief phenomenon has been the moral and political bankruptcy of the National Government of China, whose "ability" to collapse greatly exceeded the ability of the Communists to push it over.

Well, we could go forward, but there is another paragraph here that might be of some pertinence.

> The shift of power which took place in spite of a formidable American intervention and in the absence of any ponderable Russian intervention means that China for the first time for a hundred years is beyond the control of the most powerful of the western nations. There are a number of reasons for believing that the power of control by intervention which has fallen from the hands of the west has not passed into the hands of Soviet Russia. It may well be that Russia also will not be able to "move in on" China and take over control within China.

Well, Mr. Lattimore must certainly have been advised when he wrote that article of the many official declarations of the Chinese Communists not only of adherence to Stalin but of adoration of him. I have scores of such statements in my own library. To state that there was no Russian intervention in China and to picture the whole thing as just a revolt against the west is typically in line with the Communist position to those who were not Communists.

Mr. MORRIS. Would you tell us the date of that article, Mr. Budenz?

Mr. BUDENZ. The date is March 1950.

Senator O'CONOR. Will the hearing please be in order? Mr. Morris, will you kindly resume?

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Budenz, do you know Maxwell S. Stewart?

Mr. BUDENZ. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORRIS. Was Maxwell S. Stewart a Communist to your knowledge?

Mr. BUDENZ. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORRIS. Did you ever meet Maxwell S. Stewart under circumstances that would conclusively show to you that he was a member of the Communist Party?

Mr. BUDENZ. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you describe those circumstances to the committee, Mr. Budenz?

Mr. BUDENZ. It was in the early forties. The exact year I cannot remember as yet. The incident I remember very definitely.

There was a confidential matter connected with the party that I had to consult Mr. Stewart about. I had an appointment at the Nation with him. I went to Mr. Browder to consult with him, as the leader of the party, as to whether I could talk to Maxwell S. Stewart, and in what capacity.

Mr. Browder said, "You may speak to him as a Communist." So in the resultant conference, I disclosed to Mr. Stewart that I knew that he was under the same allegiance that I was.

Mr. MORRIS. You did meet with Mr. Stewart?

Mr. BUDENZ. Oh, yes, in the office of the Nation.

Mr. Morris. What was Mr. Stewart's position in the Nation at that time?

Mr. Budenz. He was one of the editors, I believe.

Mr. Morris. Do you have any other reason to believe that Maxwell S. Stewart was a Communist?

Mr. Budenz. Many reasons.

Mr. Morris. Would you describe them, please, Mr. Budenz?

Mr. Budenz. Maxwell S. Stewart has been one of the most active members of the Communist fronts that exist in the United States. I cannot keep track of all of these Communist fronts.

In connection with these Communist fronts, over and over again Maxwell Stewart was discussed by the leaders of the party with me as either an initiator or sponsor or one who could be relied upon to see that others joined these Communist fronts.

In that connection, I learned repeatedly over the years from the early forties until I left the party in 1945, that Maxwell Stewart continued to be one of the reliables of the party—a phrase which was used in his regard by Mr. Browder.

Mr. Morris. Mr. Mandel, would you put something officially into the record to show that Mr. Stewart was the editor of the IPR Popular Pamphlet series?

Mr. Mandel. In the report entitled, "Windows on the Pacific, Biennial Report of American Council, Institute of Pacific Relations," 1944–46, page 11, we find this notation:

In Miriam Farley's absence, Maxwell S. Stewart, editor of the well-known Public Affairs Pamphlets, assumed the editorship of the IPR Popular Pamphlet series.

Mr. Morris. Mr. Chairman, I would like that excerpt read by Mr. Mandel to appear in the record and that exhibit be marked the next consecutive exhibit.

Senator O'Conor. It will be admitted and so marked.

(The document referred to was marked "Exhibit No. 140" and is as follows:)

Exhibit No. 140

[From Windows on the Pacific, Biennial Report of American Council, Institute of Pacific Relations, Inc., 1944–46 (p. 11)]

Maxwell S. Stewart

In Miriam Farley's absence, Maxwell S. Stewart, editor of the well-known Public Affairs Pamphlets, assumed the editorship of the IPR Popular Pamphlet series.

Mr. Morris. Mr. Mandel, will you take a sample pamphlet completely written by Mr. Stewart and call it to the attention of the committee, please?

Mr. Mandel. I have here a pamphlet entitled, "Wartime China."

Mr. Morris. Will you listen to what is read here, Mr. Budenz? We may ask for a characterization.

Mr. Mandel. (reading):

By Maxwell S. Stewart. IPR Pamphlets No. 10. American Council, Institute of Pacific Relations. Published in 1944.

I read from an excerpt on page 45.

As China is not like any other country, so Chinese communism has no parallel elsewhere. You can find in it resemblances to Communist movements in other countries and you can also find resemblances to the "grass-roots" Populist movements that have figured in American history. Because there is no other effective opposition party in China, the Communists have attracted the support of many progressive and patriotic Chinese who know little of the doctrines of Karl Marx or Stalin and care less. Raymond Gram Swing described Chinese Communists as "agrarian radicals trying to establish democratic practices."

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have that whole excerpt appear in our record and that pamphlet be introduced by reference as part of the record.

Senator O'CONOR. It will be so introduced and marked.

(The pamphlet referred to was marked "Exhibit No. 141" and filed for the record.)

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Budenz, have you any comment to make on that excerpt from Mr. Stewart's article?

Mr. BUDENZ. Yes, sir. This appeared while I was very active in the Communist Party. This is good illustration of the carrying out of the North Dakota Non-Partisan League formula.

This describes the Chinese Communists as the Populists. That is similar to the American Populist. It is a complete deceit on the American people because, at the same time, if I may be privileged to say so, Mr. Stewart and the Institute of Pacific Relations had at their disposal official statements by the Chinese Communists, such as they made in the opening of the Seventh Congress of the Communist International in 1935, that they were pledged to Soviet power throughout the world and to mounting the barricades in that pursuit.

In other words, the Chinese Communists by their official declarations had thoroughly established in the Communist world their own character as adherents of Moscow and completely devoted to Marxism Leninism.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Mandel, that was a pamphlet written by Mr. Stewart. Do you have an example of one edited by Maxwell Stewart?

Mr. MANDEL. We have a pamphlet entitled "Land of the Soviets," by Marguerite Ann Stewart, edited by Maxwell S. Stewart.

Mr. MORRIS. Is Marguerite Ann Stewart the wife of Maxwell S. Stewart?

Mr. MANDEL. Yes, sir. This is published as a cooperative project between American Council of the Institute of Pacific Relations and the Webster Publishing Co., St. Louis, Dallas, and Los Angeles.

I have selected some excerpts from that pamphlet to give the tone of the pamphlet. I now read a few of these excerpts.

Because these Soviets were the organ which represented the people most widely at that time, they grew rapidly in influence and respect during the troubled months of 1917 until, on November 7, they became the government.

But while the Russians are quick to condemn those who display ambition for personal power, they have no praise too high for the person who devotes himself conscientiously to the common good. An additional motive peculiar to the Russian system is the pride of ownership of the Soviet workers. They have a voice in running the factories.

Mr. MORRIS. Just one more, Mr. Mandel.

Mr. MANDEL. In reference to the Soviet purges:

The Soviet answer to those who thus broke the peace was swift and severe. It regarded such acts as violations against Socialist property and punished them accordingly. The culprits were forcibly removed from their villages. In some cases they were imprisoned, but more frequently their property was confiscated and they were sent to another part of the country to begin life again; in a few instances they were shot.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Budenz, do you have any comments to make on that?

Mr. BUDENZ. Well, if the Communist Party circulated that, it could not be better done as a Communist apologia. It is precisely what the Communists were saying. It is thoroughly a Communist point of view.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have such of the excerpts as extracted by Mr. Mandel from the pamphlet, Land of the Soviets, written by Marguerite Ann Stewart and edited by Maxwell S. Stewart introduced into the record and marked as the next consecutive exhibit.

Senator O'CONOR. It will be admitted and so marked.

(The document referred to was marked "Exhibit No. 142" and is as follows:)

LAND OF THE SOVIETS

(By Marguerite Ann Stewart, edited by Maxwell S. Stewart, cover by LaVerne Riess)

(A cooperative project between American Council, Institute of Pacific Relations and Webster Publishing Co., St. Louis, Dallas, Los Angeles)

* * * * * * *

Because these Soviets were the organ which represented the people most widely at that time, they grew rapidly in influence and respect during the troubled months of 1917 until, on November 7, they became the government (p. 3).

* * * As we know, under the capitalist system, property of all kinds may be owned by private individuals or commercial organizations, and all business is conducted primarily for the profit of the owner. * * * But, under a Socialist system, the factories and other types of business are socially owned, that is, they belong to the population as a whole and are operated by the government, not for the profit of any one person or group of individuals, but for the benefit of all the people. * * * And all industry—every single factory, office, bank, grocery, and department store, every theater, movie, bakery, and newspaper—is the property of the people as a whole and is operated by their government or by their organizations (p. 6).

* * * Ivan Petrovich Petrov might be considered a rather typical Russian city worker. Blonde, rosy-cheeked, and of medium height, he has a keen sense of humor; loves to dance, sing, and talk until late at night and to enjoy himself with his friends; admires things on a big scale and adores mechanical devices and machinery. * * * Ivan, a very responsible worker, was a member of the factory committee, elected by the workers to advise the director of the plant. Each day he and Anna took Sasha to the attractive nursery school maintained by the factory for the children of its employees (p. 17).

* * * Curious as it may seem to us, the person at the top of the social scale is the worker (p. 21).

* * * But while the Russians are quick to condemn those who display ambition for personal power, they have no praise too high for the person who devotes himself conscientiously to the comomn good. * * * An additional motive peculiar to the Russian system is the pride of ownership of the Soviet workers. They have a voice in running the factories. * * * (P. 26.)

Why did the Russians resort to revolution in 1917? Was such a complete overthrow necessary? And, why, after the revolution, did they set up a system so different from that of other governments? Why were they not satisfied with a republic, for example, like that of the United States? (P. 27.)

* * * On November 7 (October 25 by the old Russian calendar), the Red Guards were sent by the Soviets to surround the Winter Palace and all the Government buildings in the name of the Socialist revolution. All the provisional ministers were arrested except Kerensky, who had managed to escape. * * * Thus, at one stroke, the peasants attained the right to more than 500 million additional acres which had heretofore belonged to the Crown, the nobility, and the church. Industry likewise was taken over as the property of the people (p. 37).

Probably the greatest surprise of Hitler's life lay in the fact that the Russian peasants, particularly in the Ukraine, did not hail his approach in 1941 as a signal to revolt against the Soviet Government. * * * (P. 53.)

* * * The Soviet answer to those who thus broke the peace was swift and severe. It regarded such acts as violations against Socialist property and punished them accordingly. The culprits were forcibly removed from their villages. In some cases they were imprisoned, but more frequently their property was confiscated and they were sent to another part of the country to begin life again; in a few instances they were shot. * * * (P. 60).

* * * Communists are expected to be an example to others (p. 66).

* * * Each of these has its own village soviet, chosen at a village meeting not unlike our New England town meeting. * * * City soviets are also elected directly by the people (p. 68).

* * * The 1936 constitution also introduced into the Soviet Union many of the elements of democracy as we know them in this country. It introduced the secret ballot (p. 69).

Mr. BUDENZ. Incidentally, I did not say that rashly. These phrases can be found almost in the same order in official Communist documents.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Budenz, do you know that Ben Kizer is a member of the Communist Party?

Mr. BUDENZ. Yes, sir; I do.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you describe how you know that, Mr. Budenz?

Mr. BUDENZ. I know this through official information given me by Jack Stachel, and also by the district leader of the party in Washington, Henry Huff.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Budenz, at that point, if you do not mind, I think, for the same reason that the chairman commented today, it might be well at this juncture to identify Ben Kizer.

Mr. BUDENZ. Oh, yes. I would be glad to do it. He is a rather well known and, as a matter of fact, distinguished lawyer in the State of Washington and has quite a wide circle of acquaintances.

He has been rather active on the Pacific coast advancing the Soviet idea of the Far East, that is, those Soviet ideas which could be put forth under a non-Communist cover.

Mr. Kizer has been mentioned to me—I cannot give you exactly the occasions, but on a number of occasions—and in reports to the national committee on one or two occasions was praised by the district leader of the Communist Party in Washington.

Mr. MORRIS. What was the name, Mr. Budenz, of the leader of the Communist Party in Washington?

Mr. BUDENZ. Henry Huff.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Mandel, do you have something to show that Mr. Kizer is presently on the board of trustees of the Institute of Pacific Relations?

Mr. MANDEL. I have here a letterhead, a 1951 letterhead of the American Institute of Pacific Relations, showing Benjamin H. Kizer as a member of the board of trustees.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like this letterhead identified by Mr. Mandel introduced into the record and marked as the next consecutive exhibit.

Mr. MORRIS. Do you have any information on the activities on the part of Mr. Kizer?

Mr. MANDEL. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you identify them and read them into the record, Mr. Mandel?

Mr. MANDEL. I have here a letter addressed to Mr. Miller Freeman, from Charles W. Eliot, Director of the Executive Office of the President, National Resources Planning Board, Washington, D. C. It is dated May 1, 1943.

We have delayed replying to your letter of March 30 inquiring about Mr. Benjamin H. Kizer's, The Northern Pacific International Planning Project, as reproduced by the Institute of Pacific Relations, because this statement as mimeographed in a confidential edition by the institute was being cleared by the Office of Censorship in Washington and by the United States Army. Those two agencies have completed examination of the document and related maps and have given their approval to general publication of the material with some modification.

The confidential mimeographed edition was not reproduced by this agency and we assume that it was kept confidential, because it was realized by the institute that some of the statements might be objected to by military authorities and it was for this reason that the document was submitted to the censor and to the Army for clearance.

Sincerely yours,

CHARLES W. ELIOT, Director.

This comes from the files of the Institute of Pacific Relations.

Then we have here a letter to Benjamin Kizer from Owen Lattimore, dated January 27, 1939, which is taken from the files of the Institute of Pacific Relations.

I read parts of the letter.

I have just been reading with great appreciation an advance copy of your article to come out in Amerasia. This article will do a lot of good, I think. It is one of the best statesmanlike discussions of the whole subject that I have seen.

Mr. MORRIS. Is this Mr. Lattimore writing?

Mr. MANDEL. This is Mr. Lattimore writing.

Is it in time, however? Aren't we all of us too late? One of the most shocking things about the present atmosphere of crisis is that at the very time when the Gallup poll has tabulated the fact which most of us know already—that the majority of people in this country are in favor of Loyalist Spain and disgusted with the Spanish embargo—nothing has been done about it, and Barcelona has been allowed to fall.

Mr. MORRIS. Do you have any comment on that, Mr. Budenz, to the extent that you heard it read?

Mr. BUDENZ. No, except that it followed the Communist position at that time.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have these two letters introduced into the record and marked as consecutive exhibits.

Senator O'CONOR. The Chair has brought up the question because of our possible doubt as to the propriety of introducing a letter dated May 1 from one Charles W. Eliot to Mr. Miller Freeman.

Mr. Morris, would you indicate why you think it is relevant?

Mr. MORRIS. The purpose of introducing that letter was to show that Benjamin H. Kizer's book, The Northern Pacific International Planning Project, was reproduced by the Institute of Pacific Relations, and that it was being cleared by the Office of Censorship in Washington and by the United States Army. It is being introduced simply for those two facts, without any implication whatsoever with respect to the addressee or the sender.

Senator O'CONOR. Yes. With regard to those two matters, it also is not indicated whether it was reproduced with or without the authorization—I do think if it is introduced for that limited purpose, without there being any inference upon the sender or the addressee, it would be permissible.

Mr. MORRIS. That is right. When Senator McCarran had the chair, he issued a caveat at one time that these letters being introduced carry no implication broader than the mere fact of the letters themselves. There is no implication by the mere association of either the addressee or the people mentioned in the body, or the senders of the letters.

Senator SMITH. Was this found in the files of the Institute of Pacific Relations?

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Mandel testified that it was extracted from the files.

Senator O'CONOR. Senator Smith, I had no difficulty about it being applicable to the IPR. I did think it might have some unfortunate connotations in regard to the sender or the addressee. But with the stipulation that has been made——

Senator SMITH. The question occurred to me whether or not it was reproduced by or with the consent and the approval of any of these men. I do not know.

Mr. MORRIS. Senator, on that point, the letter says it was reproduced by the Institute of Pacific Relations, and that letter was in the files of the institute. It was for that purpose that we are showing Mr. Kizer's association with the institute.

Senator SMITH. That is the only purpose of it?

Mr. MORRIS. Yes, sir.

Senator O'CONOR. With that limited purpose, it will be admitted.

DEAR MR. KIZER: I have just been reading with great appreciation an advance copy of your article to come out in Amerasia. This article will do a lot of good, I think. It is one of the most statesmanlike discussions of the whole subject that I have seen.

Is it in time, however? Aren't we all of us too late? One of the most shocking things about the present atmosphere of crisis is that at the very time when the Gallup poll has tabulated the fact which most of us knew already—that the majority of people in this country are in favor of Loyalist Spain and disgusted with the Spanish embargo—nothing has been done about it, and Barcelona has been allowed to fall. Is this purely inertia? Is it just a lag between the forming of the popular will and the expression of that will through political action by the Government? Not just that, I am afraid. The effect of the natural inertia or lag has been very much aggravated by the lobbying and string-pulling of those who "view with alarm" just that very thing—the expression of the popular will.

Are we going to be as far behind the run of the play in Asia as we have in Europe? Maybe we have a slight edge, because, as you have pointed out, the key to the whole situation is the fact that Japan is the angle of the Fascist triangle. The Japanese don't need to be defeated outright. If they are just properly stalled, it will nullify the gain in Europe made by Italy and Germany.

We have just met here your friends, the Hazelton Spensers, and are enjoying them very much. I had dinner there the other night with Archibald MacLeish. He has been giving a series of lectures here on modern poetry. Very brilliant, and some penetrating analyses. I think he is dead right in saying that in our times, the atmosphere of our generation, the genuinely poetic mood is bound to be political.

With warm regards from both my wife and myself.

Yours very sincerely,

OWEN LATTIMORE.

Mr. MANDEL. I have a list of positions held in the IPR by Mr. Benjamin H. Kizer, as taken from the official publication of the IPR, which I wish to place in the record.

The positions include vice chairman, American Council, IPR; member of the international secretariat, and other positions.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to introduce into the record Mr. Mandel's compilation of the positions held by Mr. Benjamin H. Kizer in its entirety in the record and have it marked as the next consecutive exhibit.

Mr. MANDEL. I have here a letter on the letterhead of Benjamin H. Kizer, dated August 23, 1937, and addressed to Frederick V. Field of the Institute of Pacific Relations. I would like to read the letter. [Reading:]

Now that dramatic and bloody events in the Far East are so rapidly making history of the sort that we have come to regard as inevitable, no matter how evil the consequences, I have taken occasion to reread, in the quiet of Sunday afternoon, your article "The Far East and American Foreign Policy," reprinted from The Annals.

Even more than in my first reading, I am deeply impressed with the insight into those tangled relations that it discloses. It calls to my mind a characteristic sentence of Judge Holmes: "The final gift is, I think, insight." Your article has that "final gift" in its best form.

You take up the question of American foreign policy in the Far East where the rest of us who recently contributed in Amerasia left off and give us a relatively complete picture, not merely of that policy but of its probable consequences. It is the world's tragedy that, although such insight as yours exists, the world is incapable of making use of it while nations stumble along blindfolded by their want of insight, with consequences that play havoc with human happiness and human destiny.

More than ever your article makes me eager to hear you on the neutrality topic at Victoria next month.

Yours faithfully,

B. H. KIZER.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Budenz, this letter was written on August 23, 1937. At that time did you know that Frederick V. Field was a member of the Communist Party?

Mr. BUDENZ. Yes, sir. I had not yet met him, but I knew from official statements that he was a member.

Mr. MORRIS. Your earlier testimony was that you attended a meeting with him in 1937.

Mr. BUDENZ. That is right. That was approximately in October.

Mr. MORRIS. I see. This was in October. Do you think it is possible that Mr. Field could have assumed such an important position in the Communist Party in the ensuing 2 months?

Mr. BUDENZ. No. He had come to my attention before as a Communist.

Mr. MORRIS. So, at the time Mr. Kizer wrote this letter praising Mr. Field's writing on the Far East, you know that Frederick V. Field was a member of the Communist Party?

Mr. BUDENZ. That is right. I had not met him, however, until approximately October, as far as I recall. I may have met him earlier.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have that introduced and marked as the next consecutive exhibit.

Senator O'CONOR. It will be introduced and marked.

MY DEAR FRED: Now that dramatic and bloody events in the Far East are so rapidly making history of the sort that we have come to regard as inevitable, no matter how evil the consequences, I have taken occasion to reread, in the quiet of Sunday afternoon, your article "The Far East and American Foreign Policy," reprinted from The Annals.

Mr. MANDEL. I have here a letter on the letterhead of the National Resources Planning Board, field office, Portland, Oreg. It is dated December 1, 1942. It is addressed to Mr. W. W. Lockwood, and it is signed by George Sundborg, senior planning technician, region X.

DEAR MR. LOCKWOOD: We have just received from the Military Intelligence Service of the Army a request that it be furnished with four copies of your American Council Paper No. 2, which as I understand it is Mr. Kizer's paper on the North Pacific planning project, prepared for presentation at Mont Tremblant. The copies are needed for distribution within the Army.

Can you take care of this request? The address is:

North American Group,
Military Intelligence Service,
War Department,
Washington, D. C.
Attention: Lt. J. S. Culbertson.

Sincerely yours,

GEORGE SUNDBORG,
Senior Planning Technician, Region X.

Mr. MORRIS. The purpose for introducing this letter into the record is to show that Mr. Kizer's papers were being distributed and taken up by the Army Intelligence on December 1, 1941. With that limited purpose, I introduce this letter into the record and ask that it be marked the next consecutive exhibit.

Senator O'CONOR. Are we to understand that it was found in the records of IPR?

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Mandel did so testify.

Senator O'CONOR. It will be then introduced at this time for that limited purpose.

Mr. MANDEL. I have here a footnote dated November 5, 1948, taken from the files of the Institute of Pacific Relations.

"C. L. from E. C. C." "C. L." may be Corliss Lamont, and "E. C. C." may be E. C. Carter.

The letter reads as follows:

I don't know whether you ever met Ben Kizer who for years has been one of our stanchest board members from anywhere in the country. He believes profoundly in the institute and has the broadest kind of international outlook. It will pay you to keep very closely in touch with him and whenever you do decide to go to the Northwest, you should spend at least a full day with him in Spokane and let him arrange for a visit at least to nearby Pullman. The above is occasioned by this letter which I wish you would return.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have that introduced into the record and marked as the next consecutive exhibit.

Senator O'Conor. It will be so introduced.

[Handwritten] I'd also like to see them.—W. L. H.

Mr. Morris. One reason for mentioning this is to show that Ben Kizer was for many years associated with the Institute of Pacific Relations as a board member. It is also introduced for the other comments contained therein.

Mr. Mandel. Next is a letter dated November 2, 1948. It is from Benjamin H. Kizer to Mr. Edward C. Carter. It was taken from the files of the Institute of Pacific Relations.

Dear Ned: Responsive to your good letter of the 29th instant, I have concluded, for this year only, to add $100 to my contribution, and make it $150. This, in spite of the fact that the drains on me for this year are exceptionally heavy. I do this solely because I do want to support you as fully as I can in this year. I have a deep loyalty, admiration, and affection for you, and for the generous, self-abnegating way in which you have so richly spent your life in the cause of international relations, now of primary importance to us all.

I will send the remittance within a month. Just now, I am accumulating pennies for the final installment of income tax, which I want to have behind me before remitting.

With friendliest greetings, as always,
Yours faithfully,

Benjamin H. Kizer.

Mr. Morris. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have that introduced into the record and marked as the next consecutive exhibit.

Senator O'Conor. It will be admitted.

B. H. K.

Mr. MANDEL. I have here a small note dated August 16, 1942, which is headed "W. W. L. from R. W. B."

We presume "W. W. L." to be William William Lockwood, and "R. W. B." to be Robert W. Barnett.

The letter reads as follows. This is also taken from the files of the Institute of Pacific Relations:

W. W. L. from R. W. B.

Your letter of July 23 to Kizer is most interesting and very sound. I don't see Julean Arnold maneuvering public opinion and congressional pressure groups with the finesse required. He is essentially sentimental about China. Lattimore has pointed out what damage sentiment might do. Would it be desirable for Schwellenbach, now, to take the lead in initial soundings and have Arnold and Walsh et al. attach themselves to him? I would like to talk to you about this.

Senator SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I would like to make an inquiry.

Senator O'CONOR. Senator Smith.

Senator SMITH. For whom did you say the initials "R. W. B." stood?

Mr. MANDEL. Robert Warren Barnett. The initials "W. W. L." stood for William W. Lockwood.

Senator SMITH. What is the basis for your assumption?

Mr. MANDEL. We have numerous correspondence with those initials and those names.

Senator SMITH. The reason I ask this, Mr. Chairman, I do know this gentleman Barnett. I know he went to school in my State, our State university. About 40 or 45 years ago, I knew his father. I was interested when you called out his name.

Mr. MANDEL. He is the secretary of the Washington IPR and there is a great deal of correspondence from him with his name written out.

Senator SMITH. There is no question about his identity?

Mr. MANDEL. No.

Senator SMITH. If there was any question, I wanted to raise the propriety of introducing something that carried an assumption.

Mr. SOURWINE. The situation is this, Mr. Senator. These particular initials are found with great frequency in the files.

The gentleman concerning whom Mr. Mandel said the initials presumably referred to is the only person with those initials who we know is closely connected with the institute. He was connected, as Mr. Mandel testified.

Senator SMITH. I did not know.

Senator O'CONOR. I might ask Mr. Mandel if he can give us assurance that as of this time, August 16, 1942, or at or about that time, those parties were so connected.

Mr. MANDEL. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. This morning, was there not another name mentioned—Robert Somebody? Who was that mentioned this morning?

Mr. MANDEL. Nobody else.

Senator SMITH. There was something said about a Robert Somebody this morning. I do not recall now. I just wanted to be sure.

Mr. MORRIS. May I make an observation, Mr. Chairman, on that?

Senator O'Conor. Yes, sir.

Mr. Morris. I notice from my perusal of the files in the Institute of Pacific Relations, the people did not make any reference by initials only to staff members; that is, by their own staff members, and in their own offices. Robert Barnett is the only staff member or officer who does have those initials.

Senator Smith. I did not know whether he was a member or not. I was just trying to be guarded lest we might attach some implication to some initials here that is not warranted. What you say puts a different light on the subject.

Mr. Morris. I, myself, understand that Mr. Robert W. Barnett was the secretary of the Washington, D. C., chapter of the Institute of Pacific Relations.

Senator Smith. That is something I had not heard of before.

Mr. Morris. I would like to have that introduced into the record.

Mr. Mandel. The next exhibit is that of a photostat of a round-table proceedings of August 26, 1936; obviously connected with the Yosemite IPR Conference which occurred at that time.

This give the comments of the various participants. I want to read only the comments of Kizer, who is listed here as representing the United States:

> We may begin with the illuminating point of Mr. Dafoe that between 1922 and the present time the emergence of the powers Russia and China has made a fundamental alteration in the balance in the Pacific.
>
> We have discovered that the United States and other powers are now more or less powerless so that the Washington Treaty is correspondingly out of date. There has been a tendency in the discussions to emphasize political questions at the expense of economic ones. The emergence of Russia as a Pacific power has been due to her emphasis on internal economic development and the same is true of China with her emphasis on the reconstruction policy. Nations emphasizing their internal economic policy are thereby making a contribution to the settlement of problems around the Pacific.
> We should study the possibility of adjustments of strains by each nation trying to adjust its own internal problems so that it does not need to export goods or labor and so disturb other economies.

Senator O'Conor. Mr. Morris, before going into that, if we can go back for just a brief moment to the previous exhibit, which is a note from W. W. L. to R. W. B.

A reference is made to one Julean Arnold. Is there any further information that bears on that individual that might indicate or identify him?

Mr. Morris. Mr. Mandel, will you introduce that excerpt from the Department of State?

Mr. Mandel. This is taken from the Register of the Department of State. It is dated April 1, 1950.

Julean Arnold, Jr., is listed here. I will just read his last position in the Department of State. "P–4, May 3, 1946, as a country specialist." This is his full biographical record.

Senator O'Conor. This register, I note, is as of April 1, 1950.

Mr. Mandel. Yes, sir.

Mr. Morris. Reference to him is purely incidental. There is no implication in any way.

Senator O'Conor. I wanted to be certain that he was identified so that it would not reflect on anyone else.

All right. That will be introduced.

EXHIBIT No. 152

ROUND TABLE C. AUGUST 26, 1936

(Recorder, C. B. Fahs)

(Chairman (Motylev) opened discussion on the first three questions of subtopic A in the agenda.)

KIZER (United States). We may begin with the illuminating point of Mr. Dafoe that between 1922 and the present time the emergence of the powers Russia and China has made a fundamental alteration in the balance in the Pacific. We have discovered that the United States and other powers are now more or less powerless so that the Washington Treaty is correspondingly out of date. There has been a tendency in the discussions to emphasize political questions at the expense of economic ones. The emergence of Russia as a Pacific power has been due to her emphasis on internal economic development and the same is true of China with her emphasis on the reconstruction policy. Nations emphasizing their internal economic policy are thereby making a contribution to the settlement of problems around the Pacific. We should study the possibility of adjustments of strains by each nation trying to adjust its own internal problems so that it does not need to export goods or labor and so disturb other economies.

SCHILLINGLAW (United States). To what extent does Mr. Kizer imply isolation?

KIZER. Not in least. The policy of voluntary association will develop better when the nations adjust their internal stresses so that the question of cooperation with other nations is really a voluntary one.

MOTYLEV. We should pay attention to military as well as political questions. For example, the problem of navies and the denunciation of the Washington Treaty. Also changes in the economic strength of various nations and their political effects.

BELSHAW (New Zealand). It seems that the emphasis of question (3) is on maladjustment but behind that problem is the actual increase in economic power, e.g., of Japan and the U.S.S.R. Japan's increase in armaments is both motivated by and made possible by her increasing economic strength. On the other hand the preoccupation of the United States and Great Britain with domestic problems has made more difficult the maintenance of a positive interest in the Far East and so removed an obstacle to Japanese expansion. The question involves the possibilities of agreement between the great powers as to what policy should be in the east. I have an idea that agreement between two parties is easier when they are approximately equal in strength. When there is a wide disparity in strength the possibility of agreement is less. In the east it is now virtually impossible for the United States or Great Britain to take effective action and therefore it is much more difficult to agree on policy. Changes in relative power are also influenced by the political situation in Europe. In Australia and New Zealand there is a growing feeling that we can no longer rely on defense by the British Navy. Therefore there is an emphasis on internal defense, e.g., by development of air force. The fear is not of occupation but of the changing balance. I should like to see a discussion of the increase in productive capacity and the resulting maladjustment.

TAKAHASHI (translated by Nagakura). The greatest factor in the change of economic conditions is that the principle of freedom of trade has been wiped out. This is the fundamental reason for various disputes of a political nature.

HAMANO. Re Takahashi's statement I should like to add that recent changes must be traced back to the World War which caused a great price rise and a reduction of exports from England. As a result far eastern countries became more or less self-sufficient. India which before the war imported three-fourths of its cotton piece goods now only imports one tenth or one fifth. This tendency was accentuated by the depression of 1929—also a result of the war—which decreased the price and market for the agricultural products of the east (and so reduced the exchange resources available for imports). We must consider the internal production changes in each country. Takahashi says free trade was forbidden but why? The cause is the self-sufficient tendency growing out of the high prices of the World War.

HOPPER. (United States). Question 1 implies a shift of power in the east, the decline of western states and the increase of the U. S. S. R. and Japan. Could we not list the changes meant in order to avoid confusion?

LATTIMORE (United States). If we are to discuss changes in the distribution of power we must get common idea of the nature of power. The present period may be considered the period of breakdown of Washington treaties. The treaties were surely the expression of a sigh of relief of the countries dominant after the war who thought they could establish a stable state of affairs in the Pacific. The great omission of the Washington treaties was the Soviet Union. No one foresaw the rapid rise of the Soviet Union and the vindication of its principles. I said sometime ago that the shift in balance of power in the Far East was from a maritime to a land basis. Soviet critics challenged me, prophesying that Japan would demand a larger rather than a smaller navy in connection with its land expansion. They were right and I wrong. It is not simply a geographical question of distribution of land and sea power. The rise of the Soviet Union has vindicated the efficiency in practice of an economic system quite different from that of the other powers. We must be very careful when speaking of nations and national policies. Motive powers are frequently interests not nations themselves. The question implies a change in the nature of power and a challenge to the western system of a new system challenging it in efficiency. The tendency of China in the past was to gravitate to the stronger power and to adopt capitalism. The rise of the U. S. S. R. not only changed the balance but raised the question of relative efficiency and China now shows a conflict of tendencies—half to the west, half to the U. S. S. R. This influence of the Soviet Union must not be confused with propaganda.

KIZER. Has not Lattimore too easily given up his point that the center of gravity was bound to shift from sea to land? Was not the denunciation of the Washington treaty by Japan part of its program to establish power on the continent?

LATTIMORE. I still think the theory is sound as far as it goes but it does not go far enough. Must also consider balance of efficiencies between social and economic systems.

MOTYLEV. The discussion has brought us to the question of navies. What is the economic and political significance of the denunciation of the Wahs. [sic] naval treaty? What are the prospects of a naval race?

ROSE (Great Britain). Suggest invite Admiral Taylor who is a naval expert.

MOTYLEV. All right but question not only a military one. Has economic and political significance as well.

VAN MOOK. The question especially concerns countries in the tropical sphere of the Pacific. As China, Japan, and the U. S. S. R. have developed economic stability they have developed a certain amount of self-sufficiency which has decreased foreign trade. As Motylev has pointed out the 5-year plan was intended to supply the home market. Japan has also sought to develop markets and sources of material within her control. Nevertheless there have been increased Japanese exports to the Dutch East Indies. If this were not balanced by Dutch East Indies trade to the United States we would have the contradiction of Asiatic countries forcing exports to be limiting exports from the Dutch East Indies.

Another consideration is that if the United States should withdraw from the Pacific the Philippine Islands would enter this unhappy family of nations and conditions would be worse than now. The policy of self-sufficiency can be followed by countries of great area and economic resources but is difficult for small countries with limited resources. As long as economic nationalism predominates it tends to dislocate trade in the less favored countries.

MOTYLEV. Called on Admiral Taylor for a statement on the naval issue and on the influence of the development of air forces.

TAYLOR (Great Britain). Air power may have important effects in certain limited regions but not on the general question of sea power in the Pacific because of the great distances concerned. Aircraft are an important auxiliary to naval forces but their influence by themselves on sea power is slight. They cannot carry stores or troops in large quantities. If these are carried by ships they must be defended by ships except perhaps at the terminals.

In regard to sea power. In our estimate the settlement at Washington of naval ration plus status quo agreements gave everyone a fair degree of security. It gave Japan a greater degree of security than the British Empire can ever possess.

HOPPER. Asked Taylor whether view should not be directed to broad Pacific area. Wasn't it shown in the Mediterranean that the air force dictated settlement? Could this not be applied to the China coast?

TAYLOR. I was in the Mediteranean and did not think air power a deciding factor. Of course there are certain areas where air power will have to very great effect but in the Pacific the distances are too great. Hongkong to Japan is 1,500 miles. It is possible but not a "military operation." It would be possible for purposes of frightfulness but that is ineffective policy.

HOPPER. The distances in the north are less. Vladivostok to Tokyo is only 700 miles.

TAYLOR. The distance is still very great.

SCHILLINGLAW. What will be the effect of denunciation of the treaties on policies and strengths in the next few years.

TAYLOR. General answer impossible. Depends on circumstances in Pacific and elsewhere. We all hope that although Japan has not signed she will not depart from the 1936 agreements to such an extent as to cause any other power to have to increase armaments beyond the present ratios and that there will be no need for change re agreement armaments status quo in the Pacific.

WRIGHT (Great Britain). Do the Japanese agree that the Washington treaties give Japan a greater measure of security.

TAMURA (Japan). The reason for denunciation was the desire on the Japanese Government to recover autonomy of national defense. The 5–5–3 ratio was accepted reluctantly by the Japanese people and led to many tragedies, such as the assassination of the Premier. We do not intend to have the same strength as Great Britain and the United States, but psychologically want equality of status. It is a question of national pride. Japan is satisfied with the release from the restrictions of the treaty and has no intention to increase naval power and engage in a naval race with United States or Great Britain.

WRIGHT. Does this mean that Japan would be opposed to a collective system or to all-around disarmament?

TAMURA. That is another question. For 15 years Japan was a loyal member of the League of Nations. Difficulty was that Japan's two great neighbors, the United States and U. S. S. R., were not members. For example, in the case of the North Manchuria Railway dispute of 1929 between the U. S. S. R. and China, when hostilities broke out, Japan cooperated with the United States in refusing to interfere along with other League powers. Another difficulty in collective agreements is that the rise of Russia has changed the conditions under which the so-called Nine-Power Treaty was signed. The U. S. S. R. is not a party. The treaty guarantees the integrity of China, but Outer Mongolia would seem not to be a territory of China.

China's territorial integrity has been violated by a nonsigner of the Nine-Power Treaty. A great power nonparty to the treaty has penetrated Outer Mongolia and Outer Mongolia has been alienated from China. This is a serious problem to us, because we are direct neighbors. The United States and Great Britain are far off, interested only in trade and not concerned, but for Japan it becomes a question of self-defense.

MOTYLEV. Is the Nine-Power Treaty still recognized or not?

TAMURA. Of course.

DAFOE. The unofficial opinion in the United States seems to be that it has lapsed.

SCHILLINGLAW. The statements of Secretary Stimson and Hull indicate that it is still effective.

VAN MOOK. Would the accession of the U. S. S. R. to the Nine-Power Treaty change the view of Japan?

TAMURA. I cannot answer. Would the U. S. S. R. join the treaty?

MOTYLEV. That is a conditional question, and I need not answer. Can we turn to the question of the influence of reconstruction in China on the changing balance of power?

LEE (China). A full answer is impossible. Reconstruction in China exercises a stabilizing influence on peace in the Far East, provided that it does not induce aggression on part of other powers. Reconstruction efforts have centered on the development of unity—for example, through road building, a nation-wide radio network, and so forth—and this unity should be a stabilizing influence.

HAMANO. Recently American air companies have extended lines in the interior of China. Are these paying lines or not?

LEE. Are Japanese airlines paying? Most airlines are not. In any case the control of these lines is solely in Chinese hands.

HOPPER. The United States has taken no action in regard to the Nine-Power Treaty, but I believe it is the opinion of the State Department that the three Washington agreements fall together.

DAFOE. It is a nice question of international law.

MOTYLEV. The problem of the balance of power requires attention to tendencies of development. From this viewpoint, it is much more complicated. It is necessary to pay attention to the real economic strength and the strength of the social order, to the influence of real economic possibilities on future development, to possible American naval and air expansion, and to the significance to the Pacific of the European balance of power. We cannot hope to answer the whole question, because the round-table is more or less limited to questions of economies and access to raw materials. But clarification requires understanding not only of facts but also of tendencies.

Mr. MORRIS. Do you have any comment on that exhibit, Mr. Budenz?

Mr. BUDENZ. The date is important. Yes; I do. This follows exactly the line laid down by Eisler: that the Pacific Ocean was to become a Soviet lake.

It is well known through the Communist Party. It is in line with the agreement with the Communist Parties of China, the Philippines, the United States, and Japan—under the guidance of Moscow—to get American "imperialism" out of the Pacific, because they declared that America is powerless in the Pacific and should turn to its own internal development.

Mr. MORRIS. That is your interpretation of the article to the extent that you heard it?

Mr. BUDENZ. That is correct. Insofar as you would express it in non-Communist expressions.

Mr. MORRIS. Thank you, Mr. Budenz.

Mr. Chairman, the next name we have on the list here is a person who is now dead. Again, as the chairman has counseled at the outset, we do not introduce this name to introduce evidence about that particular person.

Our interest is his associations in the past with people now living. It is for that purpose that we introduce the following evidence on Evans F. Carlson.

Mr. Budenz, do you know that he was a member of the Communist Party?

Mr. BUDENZ. Yes, sir. General Carlson was a member of the Communist Party.

Mr. MORRIS. Did you meet him, Mr. Budenz?

Mr. BUDENZ. I met him on one occasion in the middle forties.

Mr. MORRIS. Were his Communist activities extensive?

Mr. BUDENZ. Yes, sir. He has been a Communist for a long time according to the official reports made in the Politbureau and to me. I met him at Fred Field's house. He was not a general then. I think at that time he was for the moment retired. But he returned to the Army again.

I saw him for only a moment because I had to go back to the Daily Worker. I met him along with Marian Bachrach.

Mr. MORRIS. Along with official party circumstances?

Mr. BUDENZ. It would have been a party meeting. Then, again, General Carlson was very widely discussed just before I left the party as the man who would lead the movement for a Red China in the United States.

Mr. MORRIS. Was he—I am sorry.

Mr. BUDENZ. That developed later in the organization, I understand. This was being discussed very definitely. His consent had already been received according to statements in the Politbureau when I left the party.

Mr. MORRIS. What organization did that become?

Mr. BUDENZ. I just cannot recall its name. If you can recall it to my——

Mr. MORRIS. The Committee for a Democratic Far Eastern Policy?

Mr. BUDENZ. That is right.

Mr. MORRIS. While you were in the party, you heard that organization being formed?

Mr. BUDENZ. Yes; that is correct.

Mr. MORRIS. And you heard that Evans Carlson was to be the head of that organization?

Mr. BUDENZ. That is correct.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Mandel, will you read from the——

Senator O'CONOR. Can you amplify, or give us any further information as to its objective or purpose other than that which you have given in such a general way?

Mr. BUDENZ. Yes, sir. This organization was to be a new organization which would declare that the United States would completely withdraw any interest in China and should allow the Chinese Communists to develop their activities there.

Of course, it had many ramifications; but that was the general idea: Within the United States to drive for the United States' abandoning Nationalist China completely.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Mandel, do you know if you have a listing that that organization is listed as a subversive organization by the Attorney General?

Mr. MANDEL. It was cited as a subversive organization by the Attorney General—Attorney General Tom Clark on April 27, 1949.

Senator FERGUSON. What did you say the name was?

Mr. MANDEL. The Committee for a Democratic Far Eastern Policy.

Mr. MORRIS. You have no doubt that Carlson was a member of the Communist Party?

Mr. BUDENZ. No, sir. That was brought to my official attention on many occasions and over a number of years.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Mandel, will you introduce or read the exhibits showing Evans Carlson's association with the Institute of Pacific Relations?

Mr. MANDEL. I wish to introduce a list of books and articles officially published under the auspices of the Institute of Pacific Relations and written by Evans Fordyce Carlson.

Quoting from his book, if I may, an authorized biography of Evans F. Carlson, entitled "The Big Yankee." I read from page 257, a letter from Carlson to United States Ambassador Nelson T. Johnson in answer to the latter's question as to the nature of the Chinese Communists:

> Their political doctrines are representative democracy; their economic doctrines are the cooperative theory, and only in their social application are they Communists, for they place a great deal of emphasis on social equality. * * * They want democracy in China, free speech, free press, and the rest.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Budenz, would you recognize that as Communist propaganda?

Mr. BUDENZ. Yes. I also would recognize the author of General Carlson's biography as a Communist—Michael Blankfort. He is well known to myself as a Communist. He had many consultations with me as such.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Mandel, were you going to read the list of books written by Evans Carlson and put out by the IPR?

Mr. MANDEL. Yes, sir. Author of The Chinese Army. Author of Strategy of the Sino-Japanese War, Far Eastern Survey, May 19, 1941, page 99. Author of The Chinese Mongol Front in Suiyan, Pacific Affairs, 1939, pages 279–284, and the writer of Letters Regarding the Guerrilla War in China, in Pacific Affairs, June 1939, pages 183–184.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have that excerpt made by Mr. Mandel introduced into the record in its entirety and marked as the next consecutive exhibit.

Senator O'CONOR. It will be so introduced and marked by the reporter.

Writer of Letters Regarding the Guerrilla War in China, in Pacific Affairs, June 1939, pages 183–184.

Mr. MORRIS. Do you have any letters showing Carlson's activities within the Institute of Pacific Relations, Mr. Mandel?

Mr. MANDEL. We have here several letters from the files of the Institute of Pacific Relations.

One is dated March 27, 1939, which is a letter addressed to Mr. E. C. Carter, from Owen Lattimore. I will read the letter:

> Thanks for sending me the copy of the letter from Carlson. If I had known about this before, I should have risked impertinence by writing to urge him not to resign. As an officer in the Marine Corps, known to have a favorable view of China's prospects in the war, and known to be restrained from giving full expression to his views by Navy Department policy, Carlson had quite a potent effect. As an officer who has resigned his commission in order to speak out, he will have a momentary sensational effect, but is in danger of soon being disparaged as more sentimental than realistic. I hope very much that he has the ability to earn his way by writing and speaking, but there is no evidence to go on. As I did not see him on his brief trip east, I have no recent impressions by which to gage his possible usefulness as a "friend of China."
> I expect I shall be hearing from him direct before long and if so I shall write you again.
>
> Yours very sincerely,
>
> OWEN LATTIMORE.

Mr. MORRIS. Is that "Friend of China," in quotes, Mr. Mandel?

Mr. MANDEL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman.

Senator O'CONOR. Senator Ferguson.

Senator FERGUSON. I was just wondering why the words "Friend of China" were in quotes. Would that mean anything?

Mr. BUDENZ. Where?

Senator FERGUSON. Right at the bottom of the letter there.

Mr. BUDENZ. It in itself does not mean anything. No, I would not put any particular interpretation on it, except, of course, for one who had Mr. Lattimore's allegiance as a "Friend of China" and——

Mr. MORRIS. Was that the same allegiance that Evans Carlson had?

Mr. BUDENZ. That is correct.

Mr. MORRIS. Do you have any other comments to make on that incident, Mr. Budenz? Did you hear about that within the Communist Party—the resignation of Carlson?

Mr. BUDENZ. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORRIS. Could you tell what you recall about it?

Mr. BUDENZ. Well, in reference to his resignation, I know it was partly due to the fact that he had such a strong feeling for the Chinese Communists, that he felt he could serve better by being outside the Army, where he could express his opinion.

He had come into contact with them, and had formed a very strong alliance with them, or, at least, a friendship with them, and wished to speak out on the subject.

Senator FERGUSON. Does that letter indicate to you that Mr. Lattimore thought it would be better for him as a "Friend of China" to remain in the services and act in the services rather than quit and go out?

Mr. BUDENZ. Oh, most decidedly. That was the way the advice was given to Carlson. I was not there. I was not present. That was the advice the party gave to General Carlson, and he used the first opportunity to take advantage of it when the war came along.

Senator FERGUSON. What was his rank; do you know?

Mr. BUDENZ. He was a colonel most of the time. My understanding is they made him a general. I do not know the exact specifications.

We referred to him as colonel Carlson, but he has been referred to in recent years as general.

Senator FERGUSON. It is the same man?

Mr. BUDENZ. Oh, yes. It is the same man.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to introduce into the record this document and have it marked as the next consecutive exhibit.

Senator O'CONOR. It will be so introduced and admitted.

(The document referred to was marked "Exhibit No. 154" and filed for the record.)

EXHIBIT No. 154

BALTIMORE, MD., March 27, 1939.

Mr. E. C. CARTER,
Institute of Pacific Relations, New York City.

DEAR CARTER: Thanks for sending me the copy of the letter from Carlson. If I had known about this before, I should have risked impertinence by writing to urge him not to resign. As an officer in the Marine Corps, known to have a favorable view of China's prospects in the war, and known to be restrained from giving full expression to his views by Navy Department policy, Carlson had quite a potent effect. As an officer who has resigned his commission in order to speak out he will have a momentary sensational effect, but is in danger of soon being disparaged as more sentimental than realistic. I hope very much that he has the ability to earn his way by writing and speaking, but there is no evidence to go on. As I did not see him on his brief trip east I have no recent impressions by which to gauge his possible usefulness as a "Friend of China."

I expect I shall be hearing from him direct before long and if so I shall write you again.

Yours very sincerely,

OWEN LATTIMORE.

Mr. MANDEL. The next letter from the files of the institute is dated June 6, 1940. It is addressed to Mr. John H. Oakie. The sender is Mr. Frederick V. Field. I shall read the letter:

DEAR JACK: I wonder if you know that Maj. Evans Carlson is going to be in Berkeley for a few weeks in connection with the Mills summer institute, and that he will then proceed to China? You doubtless do have this information but I want to urge you to try and arrange a meeting at which Carlson can speak perhaps more frankly and openly than he could at Mills for he has direct contacts with our administration people from the top down and has a pretty good first-hand picture of the way things are moving. One interesting point, for instance, is that our whole naval strategy is in process of rapid transition which if it goes through will withdraw approximately half of the fleet from the Pacific for operations in Latin American waters. This, as you can obviously see, has broad implications with regard to the possibility of our taking any action—even short of military action—in the Far East.

Sincerely yours,

FREDERICK V. FIELD.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Budenz, do you know that on June 6, 1940, Frederick V. Field was a member of the Communist Party?

Mr. BUDENZ. He certainly was. He not only was a member of the Communist Party, but he was openly an enemy of President Roosevelt as the head of the Nation and of the United States Government.

Mr. MORRIS. Do you have any comment to make on that letter, Mr. Budenz?

Mr. BUDENZ. I think it speaks for itself.

Senator SMITH. I would like to ask a question.

Senator O'Conor. Senator Smith.

Senator Smith. I notice the word "Administration" is capitalized. Whom do you think they were referring to—the national administration or the administration of some other activity?

Mr. Budenz. No. He means the national administration.

Mr. Morris. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have that introduced into evidence and marked the next consecutive exhibit.

Senator O'Conor. It will be admitted.

Sincerely yours,

Frederick V. Field.

Senator Ferguson. I do not know that I know who John H. Oakie is.

Mr. Budenz. I do not either.

Senator Ferguson. You do not know?

Mr. Budenz. Not offhand.

Mr. Morris. Senator Ferguson, he was an officer of the Institute of Pacific Relations.

Senator Ferguson. I know.

Mr. Morris. We are not going to introduce any evidence about it at this time.

Senator Ferguson. It would seem from this letter, as I read it, then, that Field thought that Carlson had some information in relation to our Navy that could be given to Oakie and other men.

Mr. Morris. He was a Marine officer.

Senator Ferguson. Carlson was?

Mr. Morris. Yes, sir.

Senator Ferguson. This Mills Summer Institute; what was that?

Mr. Mandel. Mills College. It is a women's college on the west coast.

Next is a letter dated June 15, 1943, addressed to Lauchlin Currie, and it is from Edward C. Carter. It is taken from the files of the Institute of Pacific Relations:

Dear Currie: Sweet, of UCR, has compiled the enclosed list of foreign personnel that might be of use in relief and rehabilitation positions in China. If there is anything of use to you in it will you make a copy for your files and return this copy to me in due course.

"Col. Evans Carlson, as you doubtless know, is back from the Pacific with new and characteristically valuable experiences behind him. He leaves tonight for Washington and will be at the Army and Navy Club for the next 2 days in case you want to see him. I assume he will be seeing the President.

Sincerely yours,

EDWARD C. CARTER.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to introduce that into the record and have it marked as the next consecutive exhibit.

Senator O'CONOR. It will be admitted, and so marked.

The White House, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CURRIE: Sweet, of UCR, has compiled the enclosed list of foreign personnel that might be of use in relief and rehabilitation positions in China. If there is anything of use to you in it will you make a copy for your files and return this copy to me in due course.

Col. Evans Carlson, as you doubtless know, is back from the Pacific with new and characteristic valuable experience behind him. He leaves tonight for Washington and will be at the Army and Navy Club for the next 2 days in case you want to see him. I assume he will be seeing the President.

Sincerely yours.

EDWARD C. CARTER.

Mr. MORRIS. That letter, Mr. Chairman, seems to imply that Mr. Carlson had access to the President.

Senator O'CONOR. It is noted.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you know Lauchlin Currie, Mr. Budenz?

Mr. BUDENZ. By official reports; yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. When he was in the White House?

Mr. BUDENZ. The Executive Administrator, or whatever his position was; yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. What did you know about him?

Mr. MORRIS. Senator Ferguson, we have an episode concerning Lauchlin Currie that we are going to develop tomorrow in better sequence.

I think it would be more appropriate to wait until tomorrow, if you do not mind.

Senator FERGUSON. I will withhold my question.

Mr. MORRIS. If that is satisfactory with you, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. The reason I think it should be brought up—two reasons; one, Currie's connection with the institute, and Currie's present position.

As I understand it, while it could not be classified as officially with the United States Government, it is in connection with money that is loaned by the United States Government or financed by the United States Government.

Mr. MORRIS. Senator, the episode that I relate to, and suggest that we take up at another time, involves many exhibits, and we are not quite ready for it.

Senator FERGUSON. I will withdraw it.

Mr. MORRIS. It should be interesting to find out.

Senator FERGUSON. I think he ought to be given an opportunity to come in here and explain some of these associations and things that happened here in the file.

Mr. MANDEL. Next is a letter dated August 26, 1939. This is from the files of the Institute of Pacific Relations. It is addressed to Mr. Edward C. Carter. It is from Evans F. Carlson.

I will read excerpts from the letter.

DEAR MR. CARTER: Thank you for your letter of the 15th, in which you enclosed the comment from Colonel Faymonville. I agree with Colonel Faymonville that " * * * the politics, economics, and military power of the Soviet Union constitute an important background for any event which happens in Asia * * *." I did not consider that an extended discussion of the relations of the Soviet Union to China formed a part of the subject under discussion. If you consider it desirable I can prepare four or five hundred words on that angle.

The nature of the concessions which China has had to make to gain Russian assistance is debatable. It is certain that such assistance has been used to induce the generalissimo to make certain concessions regarding the mobilization of the people and the ethical indoctrination of the army. I know from my conversations with Russian military men that these two doctrines are regarded as important potential military weapons.

I plan to depart for New York on Monday, the 28th. My plan is to move toward China by way of Europe. I would like to go via the Soviet Union if I can negotiate the necessary credentials.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to introduce that letter in its entirety into the record and ask it be marked as the next consecutive exhibit.

Senator O'CONOR. It will be admitted and so marked.

EXHIBIT NO. 157

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF., August 26, 1939.

Mr. EDWARD C. CARTER,
Secretary General, Institute of Pacific Relations,
New York, N. Y.

DEAR MR. CARTER: Thank you for your letter of the 15th, in which you enclosed the comment from Colonel Faymonville.

I agree with Colonel Faymonville that "* * * the politics, economics, and military power of the Soviet Union constitute an important background for any event which happens in Asia * * *." I did not consider that an extended discussion of the relations of the Soviet Union to China formed a part of the subject under discussion. If you consider it desirable I can prepare four or five hundred words on that angle.

The Relation of Russia to the Sino-Japanese conflict can be argued from various points of view. If approached from the point of view of international politics, i. e., based on the self-interest of nations, it must be obvious that Russia's interest in China's independence is predominant. I have felt since this conflict began that Russia could not permit China to succumb to Japan. She has been providing assistance in an unofficial manner since September 1937. If China should reach the point where she could not carry on, even with the sub-rosa assistance, I believe that Russia would engage Japan openly and officially in order to assure China's independence.

The nature of the concessions which China has had to make to gain Russian assistance is debatable. It is certain that such assistance has been used to induce the generalissimo to make certain concessions regarding the mobilization of the people and the ethical indoctrination of the army. I know from my conversations with Russian military men that these two doctrines are regarded as important potential military weapons.

I plan to depart for New York on Monday, the 28th. My plan is to move toward China by way of Europe. I would like to go via the Soviet Union if I can negotiate the necessary credentials.

I hope to see you in New York. If possible, I would like to make the modifications in the manuscript which may be indicated.

With kind personal regards, I am,

Sincerely,

EVANS F. CARLSON.

Ian Pruitt is en route east.

Mr. MANDEL. Finally, there is a reference to exhibit No. 20. This is from the files of the Institute of Pacific Relations. It is dated August 30, 1939.

The note is marked "F. V. F. from E. C. C." Presumably "F. V. F." is Frederick Field, and "E. C C." is Edward C. Carter. The note reads as follows:

You will be interested in this letter from Major Carlson. I will endeavor to furnish Carlson with the necessary Soviet credentials.

Senator SMITH. This is from whom?

Mr. MANDEL. From Carter to Field.

Mr. MORRIS. I would like to have that introduced into the record and marked as the next consecutive exhibit.

Senator O'CONOR. It will be introduced.

(The document referred to was marked "Exhibit No. 158" and is as follows:)

EXHIBIT No. 158

F. V. F. from E. C. C.

AUGUST 30, 1939.

You will be interested in this letter from Major Carlson. I will endeavor to furnish Carlson with the necessary Soviet credentials.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, the purpose for introducing that correspondence and that testimony about Mr. Carlson was relevant to present associations with people now living.

Mr. Budenz, do you know Talitha Gerlach?

Mr. BUDENZ. She is an active Communist-front member, and engaged in educational activities. She has been known to me personally. She was at several committee meetings in the Communist Party.

Mr. MORRIS. You have no doubt that she was, when you knew her, a member of the Communist Party?

Mr. BUDENZ. Oh, yes.

Mr. MORRIS. You have no doubt?

Mr. BUDENZ. I have no doubt at all. Not only from those occasions, but from repeated references to her in the State committee of New York and in many other official——

Mr. SOURWINE. Mr. Budenz, you spoke of her as an active Communist-front member. Does that characterization have a particular meaning in Communist parlance, or did you merely mean to generalize that she was a member of perhaps many and various Communist fronts?

Mr. BUDENZ. No, they do not use the expression "Communist fronts." They distinguish them between captive organizations and those which the Communists create. Those which the Communists create are Communists fronts. This woman has been a member of many Communist fronts.

Mr. SOURWINE. Your characterization of her as an active Communist-front member was interesting. I believe it was the first time you referred to anyone that way. I was wondering specifically why she came to your mind that way, since you have almost in the same breath testified that she was an active Communist—that is, a member of the Communist Party.

Mr. BUDENZ. I was endeavoring to identify her to some extent. Her name appears on a number of Communist-front lists.

Mr. SOURWINE. You mean she is a person more active than the usual Communist in connection with Communist-front matters?

Mr. BUDENZ. That is correct.

Senator SMITH. In other words, there were some Communists who were full-fledged Communists, you might say and who were also members of groups that were referred to as Communist-front organizations?

Mr. BUDENZ. As I have said, to my knowledge 95 percent of the members of the Communist-front organizations are actually Communists, and the other 10 percent are thrown in there to give that appearance or that uncertainty of connection with the Communist movement.

Mr. SOURWINE. Pardon me, Mr. Budenz. You have 105 percent. Will you settle for 90 and 10?

Mr. BUDENZ. I would say it was 5 and 95 percent.

Mr. MORRIS. Do you have anything to show Miss Gerlach's relations with the IPR?

Mr. MANDEL. I have two letters from the files of the Institute of Pacific Relations.

One letter is addressed to Miss Gerlach and sent to Edward C. Carter.

DEAR MISS GERLACH: As you know, I recently heard that Miss Cholmeley would like an invitation from the IPR to come to the United States for a short-time appointment. I cabled her an invitation some time ago. Today I received from Kweilin the following cable:

"Temporarily delayed owing Stevens State Department requesting assistance here.

"ELSIE CHOLMELEY."

Doubtless, I will have in due season further particulars by mail, but I thought you would want to know that she is not likely to turn up in the near future.

I am glad that she has a temporary appointment with a State Department official, because that should simplify her problem of getting the necessary visas to come here when she wants.

Sincerely yours,

EDWARD C. CARTER.

The other is a letter dated February 6, 1943, and marked "Private and confidential."

DEAR MISS GERLACH: Interestingly enough Miss Cholmeley, who, as you know, is a 200 percent Indusco fan, is working for Mackenzie Stevens, of Maryland University, who was sent out by the State Department for 3 months to aid in reorganizing CIC. Unless Stevens is a miracle man, I doubt if Indusco has much to fear from Stevens, now that he is apparently in Miss Cholmeley's hands.

Sincerely yours,

EDWARD C. CARTER.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to introduce that into evidence for the simple reason of showing the influence on the part of Miss Cholmeley without any comment whatever with respect to Mr. Stevens.

Mr. Mandel, will you identify Miss Cholmeley for us, please?

Mr. MANDEL. Elsie Fairfax Cholmeley is the wife of Israel Epstein, whose record we have previously testified about.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Mandel, as I recall, Senator Ferguson the other day asked for the immigration record on Israel Epstein.

Senator FERGUSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you read that record, Mr. Mandel?

Mr. MANDEL. I have here a letter from the United States Department of Justice, Immigration and Naturalization Service, Washington, D. C., dated July 20, 1951:

DEAR SENATOR MCCARRAN: This will acknowledge receipt of your letter of June 28, 1951, concerning Israel Epstein and his wife Mary Epstein, also known as Elsie Fairfax Cholmeley.

Your communication under reference advised that it was your understanding that both these aliens were subjects of investigation by this Service, and requested that you be informed regarding the disposition of these cases. In response thereto, I wish to inform you that Israel Epstein and his wife Mary Epstein were under investigation by this Service to determine whether or not they were deportable from the United States. However, prior to the completion of investigations, both aliens departed from the United States.

The records of this Service disclose that Mary Epstein departed on the steamship Liberte on November 11, 1950, destined for Plymouth, England. Israel Epstein departed on the steamship Batory on March 3, 1951. It may be of interest to you to know that prior to his departure from the United States, Mr. Epstein executed a document for the Service wherein he abandoned his domicile in the United States.

Upon the departure of these two aliens from the United States, this Service issued lookout notices throughout the United States in order to prevent the possible reentry of these aliens into this country at some future time.

Sincerely yours,

B. JOHN HABBERTON, Commissioner.

Mr. MORRIS. Senator, does that answer your question?

Senator FERGUSON. That covers the matter.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Budenz, did you know that Israel Epstein was a Communist?

Mr. BUDENZ. I knew that he was a Communist by official information, and from J. Peters, that he was engaged in Communist underground activities of an espionage character.

Mr. MORRIS. Did you know his wife?

Mr. BUDENZ. I just heard her name. I did not hear any reports—that is, that I can remember.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to call your attention to a document we introduced into the record the other day. It is from Edward C. Carter to Miss Anne Ford, publicity director, Little, Brown & Co.

It is dated June 12, 1947, wherein Mr. Carter endorsed the book by Epstein, The Unfinished Revolution in China.

I would like to make reference to it again at this time.

Senator O'CONOR. Very well.

Mr. MORRIS. I would like to introduce into the record the correspondence on Miss Talitha Gerlach, as well as the letter from the Immigration and Naturalization Service on Israel Epstein and his wife, Elsie Fairfax Cholmeley.

Senator O'CONOR. That will be admitted.

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCARRAN: This will acknowledge receipt of your letter of June 28, 1951, concerning Israel Epstein and his wife Mary Epstein, also known as Elsie Fairfax Cholmeley.

Your communication under reference advised that it was your understanding that both these aliens were subjects of investigation by this Service, and requested that you be informed regarding the disposition of these cases. In response thereto, I wish to inform you that Israel Epstein and his wife Mary Epstein were under investigation by this Service to determine whether or not they were deportable from the United States. However, prior to the completion of investigations, both aliens departed from the United States.

The records of this Service disclose that Mary Epstein departed on the Steamship Liberte on November 11, 1950, destined for Plymouth, England. Israel Epstein departed on the Steamship Batory on March 3, 1951. It may be of interest to you to know that prior to his departure from the United States, Mr. Epstein executed a document for the Service wherein he abandoned his domicile in the United States.

Upon the departure of these two aliens from the United States, this Service issued lookout notices throughout the United States in order to prevent the possible reentry of these aliens into this country at some future time.

Sincerely yours,

BENJ. G. HABBERTON,
Acting Commissioner.

Senator O'CONOR. It had been agreed that we would suspend at this time because of certain commitments. So at this time the committee will adjourn until tomorrow morning at 10 a. m.

(Whereupon, at 4:30 p. m., the hearing was adjourned until Thursday, August 23, 1951, at 10 a. m.)

INSTITUTE OF PACIFIC RELATIONS

THURSDAY, AUGUST 23, 1951

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE TO INVESTIGATE THE ADMINISTRATION
OF THE INTERNAL SECURITY ACT AND OTHER INTERNAL SECURITY LAWS OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
Washington, D. C.

The subcommittee met at 10 a. m., pursuant to recess, in room 424 Senate Office Building, Senator Pat McCarran (chairman) presiding.

Present: Senators McCarran, O'Conor, Smith, Ferguson, and Watkins.

Also present: Representative Kersten; J. G. Sourwine, committee counsel; Robert Morris, subcommittee counsel; Benjamin Mandel, research director.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will come to order.

Mr. Morris, you may proceed.

TESTIMONY OF LOUIS FRANCIS BUDENZ, CRESTWOOD, N. Y.—Resumed

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, Mr. Budenz at the termination of yesterday's session was identifying people associated with the Institute of Pacific Relations who were Communists. I would like to interrupt that process today and ask Mr. Budenz to discuss at some length the extent to which the Communists were able to influence our foreign policy, and we will commence our hearing today with that aspect.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well, you may proceed.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Budenz, during the time that you were editor of the Daily Worker and a member of the national committee of the Communist Party, did you Communists endeavor to influence the Far East policy of the United States?

Mr. BUDENZ. Yes, sir; that was one of our main assignments from the international Communist organization.

Mr. MORRIS. Did you succeed in influencing the policy of the United States?

Mr. BUDENZ. Successes were reported on a number of occasions.

Mr. MORRIS. Now, would you tell us how you were able to influence the foreign policy of the United States?

Mr. BUDENZ. Through personal contacts here in Washington which had been laid over a series of years, through organizations like the Institute of Pacific Relations, which Browder had designated as an umbrella for Communist operations in this respect, and through other channels.

Mr. MORRIS. I wonder if you could give us some specific details.

Mr. BUDENZ. There is an incident in 1942 which stands out.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you describe what happened at that incident, Mr. Budenz?

Mr. BUDENZ. In the fall of 1942—it was sometime ahead of October 2, and I will tell you why I recall that date later—but sometime ahead of October 2 Earl Browder called me to his office and asked me to look over a rough draft of an attack upon the State Department.

This was an attack upon the anti-Soviet clique in the State Department, more specifically. I looked it over and made a few changes, which were not supposed to be changes in content but in editing, and returned it to him. Thereupon very shortly thereafter he gave me this document for setting up, for printing, in the Sunday Worker.

He was to deliver this message at a meeting, if I recall correctly, of the Young Communist League on October 2, 1942. In that message or speech or document he attacked very sharply the reactionary clique in the State Department which was favoring Chiang Kai-shek and injuring the Chinese Communists.

I do not mean by that to give the inference that there was aid given in a military fashion; I don't mean by troops, but otherwise.

Mr. MORRIS. You mean Mr. Browder came to you with this article which had been prepared already, and the substance of the article was that it was an attack on the people in the State Department who favored Chiang Kai-shek and were against the Chinese Communists?

Mr. BUDENZ. It was directed to those who were opposed to the Soviet policy in the Far East. He stated incidentally that this document had been worked out by arrangement with Lauchlin Currie.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you amplify on that a little bit, Mr. Budenz?

Mr. BUDENZ. I can only quote his precise words. He didn't say how an arrangement had been made. He said that this had been prepared by arrangement with Lauchlin Currie in order to smoke out the anti-Soviet elements in the State Department. The reason that he mentioned that was to emphasize to me the importance of the document, even asking me to read the material both before it went into the paper—that is, into type—and also after it was in type.

That is why he gave it to me sometime in advance.

Mr. MORRIS. I offer you a photostatic copy of the Daily Worker of October 4, 1942, and I ask you if that is the article to which you have testified?

Mr. BUDENZ. Yes, sir; that is the article.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Mandel, will you identify this article for us, please?

Mr. MANDEL. This is a photostat of the Worker of October 4, 1942, pages 1 and 5, prepared at my direction.

Mr. MORRIS. And you say this is the article that you saw in advance of its being printed in the Daily Worker?

Mr. BUDENZ. That is correct.

Mr. MORRIS. You say that article had been worked out by Mr. Browder and, according to Mr. Browder, had been worked out in conjunction with Mr. Currie?

Mr. BUDENZ. That the article had been prepared through arrangements with Lauchlin Currie to smoke out the people who were opposed to Soviet policy in the Far East in the State Department.

The CHAIRMAN. Let us dwell on that for just a moment. You say the article had been arranged by Mr. Browder through arrangements with Lauchlin Currie; is that right?

Mr. BUDENZ. That is what he said.

The CHAIRMAN. That is what Mr. Browder told you?

Mr. BUDENZ. That is correct. He was emphasizing its importance and that I should be careful to see that there were no words that would give a distortion to the article.

Mr. MORRIS. What happened after that, Mr. Budenz?

Mr. BUDENZ. Well, later on I saw Mr. Browder either in connection with the publication of a further statement on this matter or shortly afterward, but it was a discussion of the statement which appeared after Mr. Browder made a trip to Washington to see Mr. Sumner Welles.

Mr. MORRIS. Now, sometime after that is it your testimony, Mr. Budenz, that Browder then did go down to the State Department?

Mr. BUDENZ. Yes, sir; he went down to the State Department with Robert Minor.

Mr. MORRIS. Could you tell us what happened at that meeting?

The CHAIRMAN. He went down to the State Department with Robert Minor?

Mr. BUDENZ. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you identify Robert Minor?

Mr. BUDENZ. Robert Minor then, I think, was assistant secretary of the party. At least he was technically second in command to Browder. I say "technically" because Jack Stachel was an important person, and we have to always remember that.

Mr. MORRIS. Was this visit to the State Department connected with the original statement which you have already testified about?

Mr. BUDENZ. Yes, sir. There was much discussion of this matter. I just can't recall all of the discussion, but at any rate it was definitely in connection with this first article.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, inasmuch as you have a number of articles before you, Mr. Morris, I suggest that the first one to which you have referred and which was identified by the witness here be identified and inserted in the record or otherwise identified.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to introduce into the record the photostatic copy of the article in the Daily Worker of October 4, 1942, which was authenticated by Mr. Mandel.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be received and so designated.

EXHIBIT No. 161

[From the Worker, New York, October 4, 1942]

BROWDER ACCUSES STATE DEPARTMENT CLIQUE—IT HAMPERS OUR WAR IN PACIFIC, EUROPE

(By Earl Browder)

Almost 10 months after the United States is fully committed to the war against the Axis we are being told that "the United States is losing the war, period."

Loss of this war means destruction of our Nation and slavery for our people. Yet we are told that we are losing this war. That would seem to be a matter to get excited about, something to call for action.

We are losing this war before we have well begun to fight.

Would it not be more accurate to say that we are losing this war because we have not yet begun to fight?

What is the matter? Whence comes this seeming paralysis which keeps our tremendous military potential idle at the moment our fate and the fate of the world is being decided?

Roy Howard, Hearst, and the Patterson-McCormicks, the chief newspaper spokesmen for the modern Copperheads, give the double-barreled answer that the people are not behind this war and that the President is bungling it. But they are liars, any they spread the lies that please Hitler. The people are behind this war to the end; they are ready for every necessary sacrifice; they are impatient to go ahead. The President is doing the best he can with advisers who keep jogging his elbow and holding back his arm; he can only be criticized for hesitating to sweep these mischief makers out of his councils, and for failing to crack down on the defeatist newspapers.

Let us frankly face the facts, however, that the defeatist poison penetrates and tends to paralyze the war policies of our Government in Washington. We must learn how to locate the seats of this poison, in order to eliminate them.

Look first of all at the Pacific front. Our Armed Forces in the Pacific have already demonstrated that they have a fighting spirit fit for any task given them. But what about the policies which direct that fighting spirit? They are not yet serious fighting war policies.

I charge that powerful appeasement forces in the State Department in Washington are deliberately withholding 1,000,000 of the most effective soldiers in Asia, keeping them out of the fight against the Japanese, and thereby releasing that many Japanese soldiers for action against our boys in the South Pacific.

I charge that it is on the advice of reactionary officials in the State Department that Chiang Kai-shek is keeping his best armies out of the war. The army under General Hu Chung-han, with 440,000 troops, is engaged not in fighting the Japanese but in blockading the Chinese Eighth Route Army in the north and northwest, and hampering that army in its fight against the Japanese; the army under General Tang En-po, with 500,000 troops, is engaged not in fighting the Japanese but in blocking the Chinese New Fourth Army in central and eastern China, and hampering that army in its fight against the Japanese.

These two Chinese armies, the best equipped and trained in all China, totaling almost a million men, are being confined to blockading the Chinese Communist armies and territories, because the State Department in Washington has informed Chungking's representatives that our Government would be displeased if complete unity was established in China between the Kuomintang and the Communists. These officials continue the old policy of "war against the Communists" in China; they tell Chungking it must continue to fight the Communists if it wishes United States friendship, and they thereby accept responsibility for withdrawing a million Chinese troops from the war against Japan, and keep China back from full unity in this war.

What suicidal nonsense is this, by which persons who speak for our own Government keep the best Chinese fighters out of the war and create a gap which must be filled by a million American boys?

This is not a way to fight a war of survival, this is a sure way to continue to lose the war.

Our attitude toward Europe is equally ambiguous. Our State Department continues to do business with Mannerheim Finland, Franco Spain, and Vichy France, three puppet regimes of Hitler, to feast the representatives of these Nazi agencies in the highest Washington society, to send vital materials to them, and to appease them in every way while they conduct active war against the United Nations.

This two-faced attitude of the State Department toward Europe finds its highest expression in the campaign being waged through the defeatist press against the opening of the second front in Western Europe. Of course it is impossible to carry on a policy of appeasement of Mannerheim, Franco, and Laval, and at the same time energetically prepare the immediate second front in Europe. Find those figures in our Government who push through this appeasement policy, and there you will find the high opponents of the second front. They are the men who keep our men, guns, planes, and tanks in idleness while our fate is being decided at Stalingrad where men, women, and children hold off the full might of a Nazi-occupied Europe without counting the cost to themselves.

The only way to stop losing this war is to begin seriously to fight it. And to fight it we must overcome the influence of Munichism, of appeasement, of defeatism, in the United States itself. This Munich influence is not among the people, and it does not proceed from our Commander in Chief; it is entrenched in some high officials of the State Department, some members of the Cabinet, in a disorganized Congress, dominated by a clique of Vanderbergs, Wheelers, Brookses, and Dieses, several powerful industrialists, and above all in the newspapers of Patterson-McCormick, Hearst, and Roy Howard, which poison the mind of the country with defeatism day after day. The people must be roused and organize in support of the President against this cabal of the Munichmen.

These days we are being shown the most astonishing depths of depravity to which the defeatist newspapers will descend in their fight against the second front. I wish to impose upon you for a few moments to turn the microscope upon an example of this moral and intellectual rottenness. I pick up Roy Howard's newspaper for September 29, where this defeatist speaks through his hired scribbler, William Philip Simms. At the moment of crisis of the battle of Stalingrad, the miserable voice finds it possible to whine that we "would appreciate a little more cooperation from the Russians." In that phrase we can see the spirit of a Laval or Doriot, the spirit that rotted out the heart of the French Republic and delivered that nation over to Hitlerite bondage.

"A little more cooperation from the Russians," cries Roy Howard through the pen of Mr. Simms. At such a sound, every decent American should vomit, in revulsion at the monstrous thought that this could be America's answer to Stalingrad. "A little more cooperation from the Russians," while certain gentlemen from high places in the United States and Britain carefully calculate the last and final buttons on the uniforms of our boys which will make it safe to throw them into the battle.

Nothing could be further from the spirit of America's youth, in and out of the Armed Forces, than the rotten defeatism, appeasement, and cowardice expressed in this slogan of Roy Howard.

The spirit of our boys in the Army, Navy, Marines, and Air Force, is expressed in opposite slogans:

"Let's give some fighting cooperation to our heroic Russian allies."

"When do we begin to fight?"

"Open up the second front in Europe now."

Let us not drop Roy Howard's man Simms, however, without looking deeper into the cesspool of his mind. What kind of cooperation does he want from the Russians that he is not getting in the most magnificent battle for freedom in all history? "Perhaps this may require explanation," remarks Mr. Simms. Indeed it does. And what is Mr. Simm's explanation? He explains that he wants the Russians to teach the Americans and British how to fight. "The one place really to learn war is in war," says Mr. Simm's and "Moscow still refuses" to permit Americans to learn how to make war in that "one place." That, says Mr. Simms, is why we have no second front. Our officers and soldiers don't know how to fight and the Russians refuse to teach them. Therefore there is nothing to do but wait until Timoshenko gets time and leisure to open up a school for us.

I wonder what American Army officers think of this kind of arguments? I think I know. I think the vast majority will "give the works" to anybody who tells them they cannot open up a second front because they do not know how to fight. The have already learned the great lesson the Russians have taught the world, that the way to fight is to fight, to push aside all the hesitators and appeasers and if necessary to shoot them, to go to battle and put everything you have into it, to engage the enemy, to kill him, to get into the battle without delay, to fight, fight, and fight again until the Hitler Axis is crushed.

Yes, it is true, the one place really to learn war is in war. But who is holding us back from learning war by making war? It is the Roy Howards, the Hearsts, the Patterson-McCormicks, and their fellow appeasers and one-time friends of Hitler, who now join together in their obscene outcries against the second front. The second front is the practical school in which British and American soldiers will learn how to smash Hitlerism. We are all learning and will learn from the mighty achievements of the Red army and the Soviet people, but we will not allow the worthy idea of learning from them to be used for the purpose of delaying our joint action with them in a two-front war.

Young people of America have no part or parcel of the appeasement conspiracies. Defeatism is the property of old and corrupt reactionaries and their hired men. No young person could possibly live in their stifling atmosphere. Young people are particularly immune to the counsels of cowardice and capitulation. A thousand times they prefer to risk their lives in combat with Hitler's hordes than to risk the living death of a Vichyfied America, the slavery of a Hitlerite world. Our young people are demanding the chance to fight. They are the front lines of the movement for a second front now. They will not permit their future and the future of the world to be gambled away by the Munichmen of appeasement and defeatism. They want to know: When do we begin to fight?

The Young Communist League, dedicating tonight its service flag, has as high a percentage of its members in the Armed Forces as any group of Americans. And this is not the first time the Young Communists have given their best members to the armed struggle against the Axis. Not less than one-third of the Lincoln Battalion composed of Americans who gave their lives to stop the Axis in Spain in 1936 to 1938 were from the Young Communist League. This first American expeditionary force against the Axis, defending the Spanish Republic from the Hitler assassins, gave their lives in order to prevent the present war; if their warnings and their example had been heeded and followed, the Axis would have been broken before it could challenge the entire world. But their blood was not spilled in vain. They left an imperishable and glorious tradition, fully in the spirit of the Stalingrad of today. They helped to hold the Axis hordes outside the gates of Madrid for 32 months. They were fully representative of the youth of America today, a youth which is ready and eager to strike Hitler's gangs now in Western Europe, and guarantee that they will not have to stop them on American soil later on.

There is no room for any issue in our country today except the issue of how most quickly and effectively to crush the Hitlerite Axis. There is no room for partisanship or special interests. There must be national unity of all men and women regardless of race, creed, or class, who are ready to subodrinate all else to victory. There must be international unity among all the United Nations, who, win or lose, stand or fall together. And at this moment all this is summed up in one issue, whether our country can meet the crisis of war with honor, whether we win through to freedom or go down into slavery, whether we have the quality of victors or whether we shall be shamefully defeated without even having fought—all this is summed up in the one issue of the immediate opening of the second front in Europe.

We ask our Commander in Chief: When are we going to fight?

(The above article is based on an address delivered by Earl Browder before a second front rally of the Young Communist League in New York on October 2.)

Mr. MORRIS. Will you tell us the upshot of the meeting in Washington? Who attended the meeting in Washington, Mr. Budenz?

Mr. BUDENZ. Mr. Browder stated to me, and so he published in the Daily Worker if my memory is correct, that the meeting was attended by Mr. Browder, Mr. Minor, Lauchlin Currie, and Mr. Welles.

Mr. MORRIS. What happened at that meeting?

Mr. BUDENZ. At that meeting an agreement was reached which was embodied in this statement.

Mr. MORRIS. When you say "this statement," will you identify that, Mr. Budenz?

Mr. BUDENZ. Yes. This is the statement printed in the Daily Worker of October 16, 1942, headed, "Welles states United States policy on China. After interview with Under Secretary of State, Browder retracts charges against State Department officials." That is the article.

The CHAIRMAN. That has not been identified?

Mr. MORRIS. No.

The CHAIRMAN. I think you should lay the foundation.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Mandel, will you authenticate this?

Mr. MANDEL. This is a photostat of the Daily Worker of October 16, 1942, pages 1 and 2, the photostat being prepared under my direction.

The CHAIRMAN. It ought to be identified by a number so that we can go along and keep these separate.

Mr. MORRIS. I would like to have that introduced as the second exhibit introduced this morning.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be identified by the proper number and inserted in the record.

EXHIBIT No. 162

[From the Daily Worker, New York, October 16, 1942]

WELLES STATES UNITED STATES POLICY ON CHINA—AFTER INTERVIEW WITH UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE, BROWDER RETRACTS CHARGES AGAINST STATE DEPARTMENT OFFICIALS

Earl Browder, general secretary of the Communist Party, at his office at 35 East Twelfth Street, New York City, made the following statement to the press yesterday:

"In the Worker of October 4, I made charges that persons whom I designated as 'reactionary officials in the State Department' were encouraging the maintenance of a situation in China harmful to the war effort of our country and its allies. I spoke of strained relations between Kuomintang and Communists, resulting in the immobilization of large numbers of the best troops of that country.

"Upon the invitation of Mr. Sumner Welles, the Under Secretary of State, I visited him in his office on October 12, in company with Mr. Robert Minor, and heard from him, and from Mr. Lauchlin Currie, administrative assistant to the President, a detailed refutation of my charges in this respect. The information received from Mr. Welles and Mr. Currie convinced me that my charges had been made on the basis of incomplete information. I believe it is established that no responsible official of the State Department is contributing to disunity in China, and that the policy of the United States Government is being exerted in the opposite direction.

"I am therefore more than happy to retract those charges without reservation.

"What I had thought of as a heavy door that needed pushing open proved to be but a curtain of lack of information. Since many persons in the United States and in China also are without that information which I lacked before visiting Mr. Welles, I believe our war effort will be benefited if I make public that portion of Mr. Welles' remarks which was given to me in written form."

Mr. Welles' memorandum follows:

"With regard to the specific 'charge that it is on the advice of reactionary officials in the State Department that Chiang Kai-shek is keeping his best armies out of the war, 'the simple fact is that the nearest approach to 'advice' given by any officials in the Department of State in this context has been an expression of an opinion that civil strife in China, at all times unfortunate, would be especially unfortunate at a time when China is engaged in a desperate struggle of self-defense against an armed invader. The implication of the expression of opinion was that the Chinese Government should try to maintain peace by processes of conciliation between and among all groups and factions in China. And, the course which Chiang Kai-shek has been pursuing is not 'keeping his best armies out of the war' Both the armies of the National Government and the 'Communist' armies are fighting the Japanese. No Chinese armies are actively engaged in large-scale offensive operations against the Japanese—for the reason, principally, that there is lacking to all Chinese armies types and amounts of equipment which are essential to such operations; but this situation is one which both the Chinese Government and the American Government are endeavoring to remedy as equipment becomes available.

"With regard to the specific charge that 'the State Department in Washington has informed Chungking's representatives that our Government would be displeased if complete unity was established in China between the Kuomintang and the Communists,' what this statement alleges is the exact opposite of the fact. The State Department in Washington has at all times taken the position, both in diplomatic contexts and publicly, that the United States favors 'complete unity' among the Chinese people and all groups or organizations thereof.

"With regard to the specific charge that 'these officials continue the old policy of "war against the Communists" in China, this Government has had no such policy, either 'old' or new. This Government has in fact viewed with skepticism many alarmist accounts of the 'serious menace' of 'Communism' in China. We have, for instance, as is publicly and well known, declined to be moved by Japanese contentions that presence and maintenance of Japanese armed forces in China were and would be desirable for the purpose of 'combatting communism.'

"With regard to the specific charge that officials of this Government 'tell Chungking it must continue to fight the Communists if it wishes United States friendship,' the simple fact is that no officials of this Government ever have told Chungking either that it must fight or that it must continue to fight the 'Communists'; this Government holds no such belief; this Government desires Chinese unity and deprecates civil strife in China; this Government treats the Government of China as an equal; it does not dictate to the Government of China; it does not make United States friendship contingent; it regards unity within China, unity within the United States, unity within each of the countries of the United Nations group, and unity among the United Nations as utterly desirable toward effectively carrying on war against the Axis Powers and toward creation and maintenance of conditions of just peace when the United Nations shall have gained the victory which is to be theirs."

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Budenz, will you take some of the highlights and discuss them with us inasmuch as you were the editor of the Daily Worker at that time, the significance of that statement? I do not think it is clear to the committee as to the purpose of that statement.

Mr. BUDENZ. Well, this statement says that upon invitation of Mr. Sumner Welles, the Under Secretary of State, "I visited him in his office on October 12 in company with Mr. Robert Minor and heard from him and from Mr. Lauchlin Currie, administrative assistant to the President, a detailed refutation of my charges in this respect."

In other words, in regard to China. The charges that he made were:

In the Worker of October 4 I made charges that persons whom I designated as "reactionary officials in the State Department" were encouraging the maintenance of a situation in China harmful to the war effort of our country and its allies.

Browder had spoken of strained relations between the Kuomintang and the Communists resulting in the immobilization of large numbers of the best troops of that country. The assurance given by Mr. Welles, to make this brief, was that the policy of the State Department was not against the Communists in China and that there was to be no distinction made between the Communists and Chiang Kai-shek.

That was the understanding which led Browder on his part to make what he called a retraction.

Senator O'CONOR. Could I interrupt you to ask whether or not any use was made of that by the Communists on that point?

Mr. BUDENZ. You can see in the first place how it is played up, and the Daily Worker gives directives to the Communists. It was used throughout the country as an indication that American policy was seeing eye to eye with Soviet policy in the Far East.

As a matter of fact, in a subsequent meeting of the Politburo which I attended, Browder said it was as important as an agreement between nations and that we should emphasize it throughout the country as something very fundamental, representing what he considered to be a great gain for the Communist cause.

Senator SMITH. Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Smith.

Senator SMITH. Mr. Budenz, as I understand the gist of what you have just said, plus what you said yesterday, that the Daily Worker took its line from the Politburo and then passed that on, and the Daily Worker was in effect the instruction sheet to Communist organizations all over America?

Mr. BUDENZ. That is exclusively what it is. It is, as I say, the telegraph agency of the conspiracy.

Senator SMITH. So that when the Communists read something in the Daily Worker indicating what line is being taken by the Daily Worker, that is the same as definite instructions to them to follow through on that line?

Mr. BUDENZ. Every time the Daily Worker arrives in the district office of the Communist Party it is read immediately by the district leader. He calls together his staff, and he assigns to them their tasks as a result of the Daily Worker articles and editorials.

Of course, that is supplemented by other things, mail sent out through mail drops and the like, but this is the constant source of directives.

Mr. SOURWINE. Mr. Budenz, do you know whether the conference that is referred to in that article of the 16th of October was simply the successful fruition of a plan which started with the blast that was carried in the issue of the 4th or whether blast and conference, cause and effect, were all part of a single prearranged plan?

Mr. BUDENZ. Well, I can only cite Mr. Browder's words. I wouldn't want to put my own interpretation into that, but very strongly the impression was given that this was all arranged, that this was the complete picture; that Mr. Browder when he went to Washington understood that he was going to gain.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well.

Mr. MORRIS. And you say, Mr. Budenz, that this statement, after it was promulgated by Mr. Welles, was used extensively by the Communist Party?

Mr. BUDENZ. Most extensively; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You say his statement, after it was promulgated by Mr. Welles. What statement do you refer to and what exhibit?

Mr. MORRIS. This is the statement in exhibit No. 162 that we have introduced this morning, "Welles States United States Policy on China."

Prior to that time, had there been any such statement on the part of the United States Government, Mr. Budenz?

Mr. BUDENZ. Not to my knowledge.

Mr. SOURWINE. Mr. Morris, you are not offering that exhibit as evidence that Mr. Welles made such a statement but only as evidence that the Daily Worker carried that story, that Mr. Browder attributed that story, statement, to Mr. Welles, are you not?

Mr. MORRIS. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Watkins?

Senator WATKINS. I was going to ask if we have available the statement issued by Mr. Welles, the actual statement. I came in late, so I do not know what has preceded this, but it seems to me in view of what Mr. Sourwine has said that there ought to be some follow-up as to the statement actually issued by Mr. Welles.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you a statement issued by Mr. Welles? The Senator is asking for it.

Senator WATKINS. The confirmation.

Mr. MORRIS. We have that, Senator, and we will bring it out in just a minute.

Senator SMITH. Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Smith.

Senator SMITH. Mr. Budenz, do you know whether or not copies of the Daily Worker were circulated among employees of the State Department that were likely to be brought to the attention of Mr. Welles?

Mr. BUDENZ. Well, I wouldn't have knowledge of that. The Daily Worker though is pretty well examined by governmental officials, and that is a matter of public knowledge.

Senator SMITH. Did you receive any protest from Mr. Welles about the publication of these statements?

Mr. BUDENZ. Oh, no, sir.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Budenz, was this statement, as it appears in the Daily Worker there, used as a basis for a campaign by the Communists to eliminate people who were anti-Communist from places of influence in the Government?

Mr. BUDENZ. Yes, sir; I intended to complete Senator O'Conor's question there along that line and had my thought interrupted, that is to say, the campaign began actually then against those who were considered to be against Soviet policy in the Far East. It began with an attack on Mr. Adolf Berle, who by the way was under fire from the Communists at that particular moment, very definitely and strenuously. It proceeded through the years until in 1944 or 1945 it broke out into an organized campaign.

I don't want to give an exact quote, but this is the essence of it, as the Communists express it, "To clean the State Department of all anti-Soviet elements."

Mr. MORRIS. You say that was a sustained Communist campaign all during the war period?

Mr. BUDENZ. Yes, sir. Of course, it had highlights, but it was sustained.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Budenz, I offer you a photostat of an article that appeared in the Daily Worker of October 4, 1942. Mr. Mandel, will you authenticate this, please?

Mr. MANDEL. This is a photostat of the Worker of October 4, 1942, page 5, the photostat being prepared at my direction.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like that introduced into the record and marked as the next consecutive exhibit.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be received and so designated. You are getting your exhibits a little confused, Mr. Morris, because your exhibits have been running along in a series from the beginning of the hearings, and now you are starting with a series of this date. I think it might be well to have it follow in sequence following your exhibits of former days.

Mr. MORRIS. That is true, Mr. Chairman. I just want to designate that as the third this morning so we will be able to distinguish.

[From the Worker, New York, October 4, 1942, p. 5]

THE SINISTER A. A. BERLE—CHAMPION OF MUNICH, ANTI-SOVIET INTRIGUER IN OUR STATE DEPARTMENT

(By Adam Lapin)

WASHINGTON, October 3.—A few days ago Adolph Augustus Berle, Jr., was discussing the Spanish situation with an intimate group. The slight, sallow-faced Assistant Secretary of State expressed gratification that Franco, the puppet of Hitler and Mussolini, had crushed the Spanish Republic.

He said that the world situation would have been infinitely worse if "communism" had triumphed in Spain and then spread over Europe.

This incident is typical of the thinking of Adolph Berle, whom many informed observers here consider the nearest thing to an American counterpart to George Bonnet, the corrupt French politician, who was one of the principal architects of Munich.

As the last few months have passed without the opening of a second front, the voices of the Munichmen in Washington have grown louder.

Not only in Congress, but in the State Department, the War Department, and the War Production Board the men of faint heart have begun to speak up, to intrigue against the Soviet Union, to spread anti-Soviet rumors. Even speculation about a negotiated peace is no longer a rarity.

Try to trace down the anti-second front and the anti-Soviet talk in Washington, and you will find that an exceptionally high percentage emanates from room 200½, off the dank second floor corridors of the musty State Department Building, from the office of Assistant Secretary Berle.

Berle is no longer the boy wonder who graduated Harvard at 18 and was an adviser on Russian affairs to President Wilson at Versailles when he was 23.

He is now a cynical, power-hungry man of 47. He is a brilliant and fluent phrase-maker, but beneath the flowery verbiage is the hard inner core of his dominant passion: A bitter, last-ditch hostility to the Soviet Union.

During the Munich crisis Berle wrote in a memorandum to the President that the United States should not be swung off base either by diplomacy or emotion.

The memorandum was quoted by Joseph Alsop and Robert Kintner, the Washington newspapermen, in the book which they wrote from a desk in Berle's office.

They saw Berle every day for several weeks, and they must know whereof they speak when they say that Berle pleaded "for the most hard-headed—even cold-hearted—approach to the Czechoslovak question."

Berle was an advocate of Munichism then. There is every reason to think that he still is.

He was one of the men who helped to strangle the Spanish Republic and today helps perpetuate the continued appeasement of Franco.

He was one of the most influential State Department officials to favor the shipment of war materials to Japan over several costly and long-to-be-regretted years.

He is an ardent advocate of appeasing Vichy France.

Around Berle gathered the more dangerous anti-Soviet element among the European emigrees now in the United States.

The Assistant Secretary of State confers frequently with Alexander Kerensky, who has never forgiven the Russian people for turning on his Government in favor of the Communists.

Tibor Eckhardt, the Hungarian Facist who claims that he is opposed to Hitler but is active in sponsoring anti-Soviet propaganda in this country, also sees Berle frequently.

Berle was active in trying to spike the conversations between former Soviet Ambassador Costantine Oumansky and Under Secretary of State Sumner Welles.

The newspapermen who saw Berle in those days would almost invariably leave his office with a juicy anti-Soviet story.

The Assistant Secretary of State is frequently present at Mrs. Evalyn Walsh McLean's parties. Last New Year's Eve he was photographed there chatting with Finnish Minister Hjalmar Procope, Senator Robert Taft, the notorious Ohio defeatist, and Ambassador Espil, of Argentina.

The CHAIRMAN. Proceed, Mr. Morris.

Mr. MORRIS. Can you identify this, Mr. Budenz?

Mr. BUDENZ. Yes, sir, we published this in the Daily Worker and the character of the article is indicated by the headline, "The Sinister A. A. Berle, champion of Munich, anti-Soviet intriguer in our State Department."

Mr. MORRIS. That is a sample of the campaign which was being sustained by the Communists at that time?

Mr. BUDENZ. That is the campaign that was carried into every part of the United States, not only among the Communists but the organizations which they were infiltrating.

Mr. MORRIS. Did this campaign extend to other officials in the State Department?

Mr. BUDENZ. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORRIS. Could you tell us who the other officials were?

Mr. BUDENZ. Joseph B. Grew, Under Secretary of State; Lt. Gen. Albert Wedemeyer, not technically with the State Department but connected at least diplomatically with State Department relations; Eugene C. Dooman, who was head of the Far Eastern Division, if I remember correctly, at least he was in control of the details of the far eastern policy; and Gen. Patrick Hurley, Ambassador to China, who particularly was under attack from the Communists.

Mr. MORRIS. Now, I think, Mr. Chairman, if we take these items one at a time it will be a lot clearer.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well.

Mr. MORRIS. In point of time, Mr. Budenz, which is the first one of these that we should discuss?

Mr. BUDENZ. Well, I think Under Secretary of State Grew is the first because as early as at least 1944 the Politburo laid plans against Mr. Grew, asking him questions, criticizing his policy, and the like.

Mr. MORRIS. Could you tell us the first episode that you can recall in point of time, Mr. Budenz?

Mr. BUDENZ. Well, there were episodes before this, but the ones that I can recall occurred in 1945 and are the most vivid. Mr. Grew was attacked on two grounds, one that he didn't have the right policy in China, and secondly, as we approached the question of what to do with Japan, that he favored a soft peace with Japan.

The Communists wanted a tough peace just as there was to be the Morgenthau plan in Germany. They didn't hesitate in their own discussions to show that this would tend to drive the Japanese into the hands of the Soviet Union.

Mr. MORRIS. How did you know they wanted a tough peace?

Mr. BUDENZ. They discussed it and planned it and discussed it in the Daily Worker.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, in aid of the testimony this morning I have here a folder full of exhibits which are extracts from the Daily Worker. By way of refreshing the recollection of the witness I would like to make those available to him while he is testifying to episodes that occurred in this campaign.

The CHAIRMAN. You may do so if he identifies them as articles published in the Daily Worker under his editorial supervision.

Mr. MORRIS. I would like to present them in chronological order.

The CHAIRMAN. If he can identify them as publications in the Daily Worker under his supervision.

Mr. MORRIS. As each one is pulled out we can identify them.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. I think that as the witness identifies it there should be an identifying mark on the exhibit to show what exhibit he is holding in his hand at the time. The clerk will see to that, please.

Mr. BUDENZ. The first exhibit is from the Daily Worker of June 4, 1945, page 4.

Mr. MORRIS. Now, Mr. Mandel, was this photostat prepared under your direction?

Mr. MANDEL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well.

Mr. BUDENZ. This is a reprint of the statement made by the national board of the Communist Political Association, that being the temporary name, as you recall, of the Communist Party during a certain period. This statement was made on the eve of changing back to the Communist Party.

In the course of their general program they outline a far-eastern policy which, to make it brief, includes:

One, rout and defeat the advocates of a compromise peace with the Japanese imperialists and war lords. Guarantee a free democratic Asia with the right of national independence for all colonial and dependent peoples. Curb those who seek American imperialist control in the Far East.

Three, press for a united and free China based upon the unity of the Communists and all other democratic and anti-Japanese forces so as to speed victory.

There are other items, but those are the outstanding ones.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like that introduced into the record and marked as the next consecutive exhibit.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be so designated and entered into the record.

THE PRESENT SITUATION AND NEXT TASKS—RESOLUTION OF THE NATIONAL BOARD, CPA, ADOPTED ON JUNE 2, 1945

This resolution is submitted as a draft for discussion and action by the national committee and the entire membership of the Communist Political Association.

The vote on the resolution in the national board was as follows:

For: Morris Childs, Benjamin Davis, Jr., Eugene Dennis, Elizabeth Gurley Flynn, James Ford, Wm. Z. Foster, Gilbert Green, Robert Minor, Robert Thompson, John Williamson.

Against: Earl Browder.

Abstained: Roy Hudson.

Absent: William Schneiderman.

PART 1

The military defeat of Nazi Germany is a great historic victory for world democracy, for all mankind. This epochal triumph was brought about by the concerted action of the Anglo-Soviet-American coalition—by the decisive blows of the Red Army, by the American-British offensives, and by the heroic struggle of the resistance movements. This victory opens the way for the complete destruction of fascism in Europe and weakens the forces of reaction and fascism everywhere. It has already brought forth a new antifascist unity of the peoples in Europe marked by the formation in a number of countries of democratic governments representative of the will of the people. It has also created the prerequisites for bringing about the speedy defeat of Japanese imperialism. Thus great possibilities have been opened up for realizing a durable peace.

However, a sharp and sustained struggle must still be conducted to secure the complete destruction of fascism in Europe and throughout the world and to guarantee that the possibilities which now exist for creating an enduring peace shall be realized. This is so because the economic and social roots of fascism in Europe have not yet been fully destroyed. This is so because the extremely powerful reactionary forces in the United States and England, which are centered in the trusts and cartels, are striving to reconstruct liberated Europe on a reactionary basis. Moreover, this is so because the most aggressive circles of American imperialism are endeavoring to secure for themselves political and economic domination in the world.

With the ending of the war against Nazi Germany, important groupings of American capital, which were opposed to German imperialist world domination, are joining hands with the most reactionary and profascist circles of monopoly capital—with the profascist du Pont clique in the leadership of the NAM. Now that Nazi Germany has been crushed, these big business circles which heretofore supported, though inconsistently, the war against Hitler, in order to eliminate their German imperialist rival are today frightened by the democratic consequences of that victory.

Like their British counterparts, they are alarmed at the strengthened positions of world labor, at the democratic advances in Europe and at the upsurge of the national liberation movements in the colonial and dependent countries. Therefore they seek to halt the march of democracy; to curb the strength of labor and the people. They want to save the remnants of fascism in Germany and in the rest of Europe. They are trying to organize a new cordon sanitaire against the Soviet Union which bore the main brunt of the war against the Nazis, and which is the stanchest champion of national freedom, democracy, and world peace.

This regrouping in the ranks of American capital, reacting to the defeat of Germany, has been reflected in many recent actions of the State Department. It is evidenced by the fact that the majority of the American delegation at San Francisco yielded on certain issues to the extreme reactionaries. In so doing they departed from Roosevelt's foreign policy of Big Three unity as worked out at Tehran and Yalta.

This regrouping in the ranks of capital explains why, on most basic questions, Stettinius and Connally were influenced to join hands with Vandenberg—the spokesman for Hoover and the most predatory sections of American finance capital. This explains the seating of Fascist Argentina and the British-American reluctance to live up to the Yalta accord on Poland and Germany. This is the reason why the American delegation at San Francisco refused to join with the Soviet Union to pledge the right of national independence for mandated territories and colonies, and refused to give official recognition to the representatives of the World Labor Conference who spoke for 60,000,000 organized workers.

This shift in the position of certain big business circles explains the reactionary intervention at Trieste and the threat of armed force against our Yugoslav ally. This development also explains why Washington and London are pursuing the dangerous policy of preventing a strong, united, and democratic China, and why they bolster up the reactionary, incompetent Chiang Kai-shek regime which is obstructing an all-out war against Japan. It accounts, too, for the new campaign of anti-Soviet slander and incitement calculated to undermine American-Soviet friendship and cooperation which was the cornerstone for victory over Hitler Germany and is the indispensable key to attain postwar peace and world security.

On the home front the camp of reaction is blocking the development of a satisfactory program to meet the human needs of reconversion with its accompanying economic dislocations and severe unemployment. Reactionary forces—especially the NAM and their representatives in Congress—are planning a new open-shop drive to weaken or smash the trade-unions. They are trying to prevent the adoption of governmental measures which must be enacted at once if our country is to avoid the most acute consequences of future economic crisis. Likewise they are vigorously preparing to win the crucial 1946 elections.

If these reactionary policies and forces are not checked and defeated, America and the world will be confronted with new aggressions and wars and the growth of reaction and fascism in the United States.

However, the conditions and forces exist to defeat this reactionary threat, and to enable our country to play a progressive role in world affairs in accord with the true national interests of the American people. For one thing, the military defeat of Nazi Germany has changed the relationship of world forces in favor of democracy. It has enhanced the role and influence of the land of socialism. It has strengthened those forces in our country and elsewhere which seek to maintain and consolidate the friendship and cooperation of the United States and the Soviet Union—a unity which must now be extended and reenforced. This is evidenced by the fact that the overwhelming majority of the American people, and in the first place labor, are opposed to reaction and fascism, support the foreign and domestic policies of President Roosevelt as embodied in the decisions of Tehran and Crimea, and in the second bill of rights.

This majority must now speak out and assert its collective strength and will. The united power of labor and of all democratic forces must express itself in a decisive fashion so as to influence the course of the Nation in a consistently progressive direction.

It is imperative that the American people resolutely support every effort of the Truman administration to carry forward Roosevelt's program for victory, peace, democracy, and 60,000,000 jobs. It is equally necessary that the people sharply criticize all hesitations to apply this policy, and vigorously oppose any concessions to the reactionaries. The camp of reaction must not be appeased—it must be isolated and routed.

Toward this end it is necessary, as never before, to decisively strengthen the democratic unity of the Nation. It is essential to weld together and consolidate the broadest national coalition of all anti-Fascist and democratic forces, including all supporters of Roosevelt's anti-Axis policies. To forge this democratic coalition most effectively and to enable it to exercise decisive influence upon the affairs of the Nation, it is essential that the working class—especially the progressive labor movement and the Communists—strengthen its independent role and activities and display far greater political and organizing initiative. It is imperative to develop the maximum unity of action between the CIO, the AFL, and the Railroad Brotherhoods and to achieve their full participation in the new World Federation of Trade Unions.

While cooperating with the patriotic and democratic forces from all walks of life, labor must, in the first place, strengthen its ties with the veterans, the toiling farmers, the Negro people, the youth, the women, professionals and small-business men, and with their democratic organizations.

To achieve the widest democratic coalition and the most effective anti-Fascist unity of the Nation, it is vital that labor vigorously champion a program of action that will promote the complete destruction of fascism, speed victory over Japanese imperialism, curb the powers of the trusts and monopolies—advance the economic welfare of the people and protect and extend American democracy.

In the opinion of the Communist Political Association, such a program should be based on the following slogans of action:

I. Hasten the defeat of Fascist-militarist Japan!

Rout and defeat the advocates of a compromise peace with the Japanese imperialists and warlords.

Guarantee a free, democratic Asia with the right of national independence for all colonial and dependent peoples. Curb those who seek American imperialist control in the Far East.

Press for a united and free China based upon the unity of the Communists and all other democratic and anti-Japanese forces so as to speed victory. Full military aid to the Chinese guerrillas led by the heroic Eighth and Fourth Armies.

Continue uninterrupted war production and uphold labor's no-strike pledge for the duration. Stop employer provocations.

II. Complete the destruction of fascism and build a durable peace.

Cement American-Soviet friendship and unity to guarantee the fulfillment of Tehran and Yalta accords for an enduring peace and a world free of fascism.

Carry out in full the decisions made by the Big Three at Crimea.

Punish the war guilty without further delay. Death to all Fascist war criminals. Make Germany pay full reparations in labor and in kind for the reconstruction of Europe.

Strengthen the World Labor Congress as the backbone of the unity of the peoples and the free nations.

Support the establishment of an effective international security organization based upon the Dumbarton Oaks plan and the Yalta agreement.

Guarantee to all peoples the right to determine freely their own destiny and to establish their own democratic form of government. Put an end to Anglo-American intervention against the peoples, such as in Greece, Belgium, and Italy.

Grant immediate national independence to Puerto Rico.

Break diplomatic relations with Franco Spain and Fascist Argentina.

Remove from the State Department all pro-Fascist and reactionary officials.

Help feed and reconstruct starving and war-torn Europe. Reject the Hoover program based on reactionary financial mortgages and political interference.

Pass the Bretton Woods proposals and other democratic measures designed to promote international economic cooperation and expanding world trade. Grant extensive long-term loans and credits, at low interest rates, for purposes of reconstruction and industrialization.

III. Meet the human needs of reconversion—Push the fight for 60 million jobs.

Make the right to work and the Roosevelt second Bill of Rights the law of the land.

Increase purchasing-power to promote maximum employment. No reduction in weekly take-home pay when overtime is eliminated.

For an immediate 20 percent wage increase to meet the rise in the cost of living. Establish an adequate minimum hourly wage on a national scale.

Establish the principle of the guaranteed annual wage.

For a shorter workweek without wage reductions, except where this would hamper war production.

Support Truman's proposals for emergency Federal legislation to extend and supplement present unemployment insurance benefits. Start unemployment insurance payments promptly upon loss of job and continue until new employment is found. Provide adequate severance pay for laid-off workers. Insure the retraining, education and reemployment of the young workers.

Prevent growing unemployment during the reconversion and post war period by starting large-scale Federal, State and municipal public works programs—slum clearance, low rental housing developments, rural electrification, the building of new schools, hospitals, roads, etc.

No scrapping of Government owned industrial plants. If private industry cannot operate these at full capacity for peacetime purposes the Government must.

Maintain and rigidly enforce rent and price control and rationing. Strengthen the law enforcement powers of the OPA. Smash the black market.

Utilize the Labor-Management Charter to press for the organization of the unorganized, to strengthen collective bargaining, to defend the trade-unions from all attacks by the open-shoppers, to raise living standards, and to promote the fight for 60 million jobs.

Prosecute the war profiteers. No reduction in corporate, excess profit and income taxes for the millionaires.

Pass the Wagner-Murray-Dingell social security bill.

Maintain equitable farm prices and assure adequate Federal and State aid to all needy farmers.

IV. Repay our debt to the men who fought for victory.

Guarantee jobs and security for all returning veterans regardless of race, creed or color.

Extend the scope and benefits of the GI bill of rights and eliminate all red tape from the Veterans' Administration. Guarantee adequate medical care to every veteran.

Press for the speedy enactment of legislation providing for substantial demobilization pay, based on length and character of service, and financed by taxes on higher personal and corporate incomes.

Insure full benefits of all veterans legislation to Negro veterans.

V. Safeguard and extend democracy.

Enforce equal rights for every American citizen regardless of race, color, creed, political affiliation or national origin.

End Jim Crow. Outlaw anti-Semitism. Eliminate all anti-Communist legislation. Pass a national FEPC. Abolish the poll tax and the white primary. End every form of discrimination in the Armed Forces.

Protect labor's rights, especially the right to organize and bargain collectively.

Outlaw and prohibit all fascist organizations and activities.

Curb the powers and policies of the monopolies and trusts which jeopardize the national welfare and world peace. Prosecute all violations of the antitrust laws, and all moves and acts to restore or continue the Anglo-German-American cartel system and practices. Protect and extend Federal aid to small business.

This program represents the most urgent interests of the American people and the Nation. It is not a program for socialism which alone can completely abolish insecurity, exploitation, oppression, and war. This is an immediate program of action around which all progressive Americans can unite today. It is a program of action which will advance the destruction of fascism, help realize a more stable peace.

CPA National Board Decides Upon Discussions on Resolution

The national board of the CPA, at its meeting of June 2, also adopted the following additional motions:

1. The national committee shall be convened within 2 weeks.

2. The discussion by the membership of the association on the resolution of the national board shall start immediately in the clubs and in other meetings of the association to be determined by each State committee. The discussion shall continue up to a date to be decided by the national committee, CPA.

3. For the period of the discussion, arrangements shall be made with the Daily Worker to publish a semiweekly discussion bulletin as a supplement to the paper. This bulletin shall be open to all members of the association.

4. State organizations may publish special discussion bulletins if they so desire.

5. During the entire period of the discussion, the policy and practical mass work of the association shall be governed by the resolution of the national board.

Mr. MORRIS. I might say that that exhibit is the fourth one we have introduced today.

Mr. BUDENZ. I am going by chronology rather than a rounded-out picture, but the picture will be given, Mr. Chairman.

The next one as far as I can see is dated June 26, 1945, page 9, headed, "One of Six Arrested Hits Clique in State Department."

The CHAIRMAN. That is of the issue of the Daily Worker of what date?

Mr. BUDENZ. June 26, 1945, page 9.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

Mr. BUDENZ. This refers to Andrew Roth, one of those arrested in the Amerasia case and the Daily Worker predicts:

Roth's forthcoming book, Dilemma in Japan, "dissects" the State Department's "past mistakes and current fallacies," in the author's words. It exposes Undersecretary of State Joseph Grew's predilection for Japanese Emperor Hirohito. Roth's arrest came after Little, Brown & Co. announced that the book would come out in September.

Mr. MORRIS. I would like to have that introduced into the record as the next consecutive exhibit.

The CHAIRMAN. That will be done and it will be received in the record.

ONE OF SIX ARRESTED HITS CLIQUE IN STATE DEPARTMENT

Andrew Roth, on inactive status as senior lieutenant in the United States Naval Reserve since his arrest June 6, declared yesterday that charges against him "reflect the hopes of a powerful conservative clique in the State Department."

In a copyrighted article in the New York Post Roth warned that, should this clique have its way, "the end result will almost certainly be a China wracked by civil war, a Japan in which the roots of aggression have been left intact, and a sharp clash of American and Soviet interests in the Far East."

Roth expressed confidence that he would be cleared of the accusation against himself and five others, of having been party to a conspiracy to transmit confidential information to unauthorized persons.

Roth's forthcoming book, Dilemma in Japan, "dissects" the State Department's "past mistakes and current fallacies," in the author's words. It exposes Under Secretary of State Joseph Grew's predilection for Japanese Emperor Hirohito. Roth's arrest came after Little, Brown & Co. announced that the book would come out in September.

Mr. SOURWINE. To save time, could Mr. Mandel be asked whether these photostats which have been handed to the witness are all photostats of the Daily Worker, photostats prepared under his direction?

Mr. MANDEL. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUDENZ. The next is an editorial in the Daily Worker of August 6, 1945, page 6, and reads:

It is for Under Secretary Grew to answer: Why are American guns being used to pursue civil war in China? What measures are being taken to halt such crimes and guarantee against their repetition?

This is an attack on Mr. Grew under the title, "Question to Mr. Grew."

Mr. MORRIS. I offer that into the record as the next consecutive exhibit.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be so received.

QUESTION TO MR. GREW

Far up in northern China, Chinese are fighting Chinese at this very moment—yet how is it possible that hardly a mention of this gets to the American people?

The Yenan radio has charged that American lend-lease guns are being used against the Chinese Communist guerillas by the armies of Gen. Hu Tsung-nan—yet the War Department and the State Department say nary a word.

We think this warfare in northern China is scandalous. And equally scandalous is the absence of any recognition by the State Department of American responsibility in this deadly serious affair.

For who gains when a Kuomintang soldier is ordered to attack a Chinese Communist guerilla? Only Japan, the common enemy.

And who profits by this silence from the United States? Only the Kuomintang dictatorship, which interprets silence as giving consent to its evil plans for the disunion of the Chinese nation.

The Yenan radio has twice appealed to Chiang Kai-shek, urging him to call off the attack of Kuomintang's Fifty-ninth Division. It is an appeal directed to Americans as well.

For the plain fact remains that American lives are being jeopardized if the Chungking regime is permitted to continue such policies.

And if such things can happen while the Kuomintang is supposedly liberalizing its dictatorship, while the Soong-Stalin discussions are about to be resumed—the American people can have no confidence whatsoever in the Chungking leaders and all their promises and plans.

It is for Undersecretary Grew to answer: Why are American guns being used to pursue civil war in China? What measures are being taken to halt such crimes and guarantee against their repetition?

Mr. BUDENZ. The next that I can find is the Daily Worker of August 13, 1945, page 5, headed "The Allied Reply and the Role of the Emperor," in which they state:

Our public knows, from a correct understanding of Japanese history, that the Emperor is the focus of the militarist-feudal-industrialist set-up in Japan responsible for the war and the oppression of Asia.

And they feel correctly that powerful capitalist forces, represented by such men as Under Secretary Joseph Grew and Ambassador Patrick J. Hurley, want to preserve this particular Emperor's powers and the royal institution as such. They want to preserve as much of Japanese fascism as they can.

That is an editorial.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to insert that as the next consecutive exhibit.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be inserted in the record.

THE ALLIED REPLY AND THE ROLE OF THE EMPEROR—AN EDITORIAL

Reprinted from late edition of Sunday Worker

The four great powers have given their answer to Japan's acceptance of the Potsdam surrender declaration, in which the Japanese rulers asked for clarification on the Emperor's role. The world awaits the next developments while the war itself is being pressed forward on all fronts.

Faced with the overwhelming power of the United Nations, the vast American air and naval power, the atom bomb, the Soviet Union's rapid advances in Manchuria and Korea, the Japanese rulers were forced to accept the Potsdam terms.

The great powers have elaborated these terms to the extent that the Emperor will have to subordinate himself entirely to the Allied Supreme Command. He will have to carry out the Supreme Command's orders in compelling the Japanese troops to lay down their arms. The institution of the monarchy itself will ultimately be decided by the Japanese people.

If we remember that the Potsdam declaration provided a good basis for eradicating Japanese fascism, eliminating the possibility of renewed aggression and opening the path for democratic development in Japan, it is clear that the United Nations stand on the eve of an immense victory. The tremendous fact is that fascism in Asia as well as in Europe has at last been forced to its knees.

We do not know, and cannot know, all the factors which entered into the Big Four's reply. Certainly, one of them is the necessity of intimate unity among the great powers. For without such unity a common program for ending the war, occupying the strategic areas of eastern Asia, and beginning the destruction of fascist-militarism would be endangered.

This should be remembered, even though on the role of the Emperor himself the American people are understandably disappointed. He is continuing on the throne, even though he is a war criminal, and the people rightly want to treat him as such. Our public knows, from a correct understanding of Japanese history, that the Emperor is the focus of the militarist-feudal-industrialist set-up in Japan responsible for the war and the oppression of Asia.

And they feel correctly that powerful capitalist forces represented by such men as Under Secretary Joseph Grew and Ambassador Patrick J. Hurley, want to preserve this particular Emperor's powers and the royal institution as such. They want to preserve as much of Japanese fascism as they can. The Vandenbergs and the Tafts unquestionably will attempt to use the royal house for desperate efforts to sabotage the impending United Nations victory.

That is why the American people must continue their vigilance—even though the war will undoubtedly end before the Japanese people have decided the ultimate fate of the royal house.

A great victory of epic dimensions is unfolding before the democratic world.

It is a victory well earned. It is a victory for which heavy sacrifices have been made. It is a victory which must lead to the complete eradication of fascism, and for this task—the precondition of a long and real peace—the unity of the great powers is decisive.

The advance of democracy in China, the full independence of the colonial peoples is equally decisive. It is on all these issues that continued vigilance and struggle will be required.

Mr. BUDENZ. This is August 15, 1945, an editorial in the Daily Worker, page 2, which means it was given particular prominence.

The CHAIRMAN. As regards this last one that you just identified, you said it was an editorial in the Daily Worker. Were you the editorial writer at that time?

Mr. BUDENZ. I was the managing editor of the Daily Worker. The writing of the editorials was assigned at each editorial board meeting to various editors on the board. This was very likely written by Joseph Starobin, although that wasn't always the case. It was written under the supervision of the editorial board.

This is entitled "Prevent Civil War in China," and at the conclusion states:

The State Department should be bombarded with messages demanding the recall of Ambassador Hurley and General Wedemeyer, and the immediate cleansing of the people in the Department responsible for this suicidal policy.

That is, the policy which they were condemning.

Mr. MORRIS. I would like to introduce that as the next consecutive exhibit in the record.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be given its proper number and will be received.

PREVENT CIVIL WAR IN CHINA—AN EDITORIAL

With Japan's surrender just around the corner, the danger of civil war in China assumes immediate and alarming proportions. During the last few days Chiang Kai-shek has clearly revealed his intention of launching the civil war immediately, using Central Government troops which have been held ready for this moment, as well as puppet troops which collaborated with the Japanese.

And especially disturbing to the American people, in the midst of their jubilation over the approaching end of the war, are the reports from Chungking that American airplanes, troops, and munitions may be placed at the disposal of the Fascist-feudal clique in Chungking.

The calamity of civil war in China must be prevented. For should it take place the peace for which we have fought a long and hard war would be seriously endangered. The American people, as well as our allies, must not be cheated of the fruits of the global victory. Much less can we permit the continuation of government policies which give aid to a reactionary, Fascist clique, a clique which has stood aloof from the war against Japan since 1938, which has connived with the collaborationist regime at Nanking against all the democratic forces of China and which now rushes to make open war against them.

CONFIRMATION IN UNITED STATES PRESS

The charges made by the Yenan radio against Chiang, accusing him of collusion with the puppet troops and of setting up a united front with the Nanking collaborationists for the immediate launching of the civil war, are fully confirmed by A. T. Steele's report to the New York Herald Tribune yesterday.

"It is no secret," writes Mr. Steele, "that many puppet officials and army officers are in league with Chungking and plan to declare allegiance to the Central Government when the time is ripe."

According to the same correspondent, Chiang "is counting on assistance from Chinese puppet troops in enemy-held areas." This was openly admitted by the Generalissimo when he forbade the Communist-led armies and guerrillas to disarm the enemy, and called upon the puppet armies to "maintain order."

In the tense and dangerous situation it is absolutely impermissible for Ambassador Hurley and General Wedemeyer to place American material and men at Chiang's disposal.

According to reports from Chungking, the two top American representatives have been conferring with Chiang for the purpose of planning the rapid occupation by Kuomintang troops of key ports and areas which have already been largely liberated by the Yenan armies. It is reported that American planes are ready to transport Chiang's troops into sectors already occupied or soon to be taken by the Communist-led and guerrilla forces.

WORLD PEACE ENDANGERED

For Chiang to attempt to possess these areas would mean to oust the liberation armies and declare war upon the people. We cannot be a party to such nefarious and dastardly plans. They would endanger the prospects of peace in the Pacific and in the world.

For Hurley and Wedemeyer to participate in this scheme is to place our Government policy entirely at the disposal of the most reactionary and imperialist forces in our country who want to prevent a united and democratic China, and will stop at nothing to achieve their end.

The American people, especially the labor movement, should intervene directly, and at this very moment when the end of the war is at hand.

We do not want the continuation of the war in another form, in the shape of a civil war in China.

We want peace in the Pacific and in the world, and that means a democratic and united China. It means that the Chinese collaborationists, the Nanking puppets, and their Kuomintang traitors should be held strictly to account and made to suffer for their treachery.

Not a single American gun, soldier, plane or other war equipment must be placed at the disposal of the Fascist clique in Chungking.

The Chinese liberation armies, including the eighth and fourth route armies which did the major land fighting against the enemy, should be fully represented in working out the allied occupation of Japan and liberated areas.

As with the other main problems of the peace, American-Soviet cooperation must be maintained and extended in the process of preventing civil war in China.

The State Department should be bombarded with messages demanding the recall of Ambassador Hurley and General Wedemeyer, and the immediate cleansing of the people in the Department responsible for this suicidal policy. We want a durable and democratic peace.

Mr. BUDENZ. Well, I have stepped out of the chronology, Mr. Chairman, unfortunately, but I will introduce this anyway.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well.

Mr. BUDENZ. This is the Daily Worker of July 24, 1945, an editorial, the chief editorial, "Mr. Grew Must Explain," in which they accuse the State Department under Mr. Grew's direction of playing up to the Japanese imperialists and appealing to them to surrender in time to save themselves.

Mr. MORRIS. I would like to introduce that for the record as the next consecutive exhibit.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be received and so designated.

EXHIBIT No. 169

[From the Daily Worker, July 24, 1945]

MR. GREW MUST EXPLAIN

There is something very strange, very rotten, and very alarming in the way American policy toward Japan is developing. It is time the entire Nation realized what is going on, and what is at stake.

Early last week, the Herald Tribune's Washington correspondent reported that plans were being made to modify the unconditional-surrender policy. Japan was going to be told that her Imperial Government might remain if only she would subordinate herself to the United States and submit to a peace which would not necessarily destroy her feudal-militarist structure. The Navy and State Department were reported favorable to such a plan. But it was all a matter for the future, to be decided by President Truman himself.

Now it is disclosed that a direct Navy Department representative, Capt. E. M. Zacharias, has been broadcasting to Japan for the OWI. On Friday night he openly appealed to the Japanese industrialists to surrender in time. He said that American patience was running short, that unless the Japanese leaders surrender now, the peace may be complicated by the pressure of China, Australia, and perhaps also by the Soviet Union. Japan, unlike Germany, would be well treated under the terms of the Atlantic Charter. In other words, an open appeal to negotiate a peace.

Under Secretary Joseph Grew last week did not deny the Herald Tribune reports; he merely said that no official peace offers had been received, which could be an invitation for them. And Elmer Davis now discloses that Captain Zacharias has already made 12 such broadcasts. Evidently, what was going to be a modification of policy in the future is already a fact—to this officer—and has been the basis of repeated broadcasts.

This is a scandalous situation. Both the Herald Tribune and the New York Times have in recent days devoted sharp editorials to it, which shows that while there is serious resistance to modification of the unconditional-surrender policy in the very highest circles, there is also plenty of fire to cause such smoke.

Both newspapers point out that this kind of thing is only prolonging the war. It is encouraging the Japanese to resist even more fiercely. Instead of shortening the war, this is literally costing American lives. The Tribune cites a commentator of the Japanese Broadcasting Co., Kuso Oya, who gleefully predicts an impending about-face by the United States, urging the Japanese to fight on until that happens. Of course, it is not only the fact that the war is being prolonged by such tactics. The very basis of a democratic Asia would be undermined if the State Department conception wins out.

Explanations to the American people are in order. The Navy Department should explain the case of Captain Zacharias. Mr. Grew should openly and frankly inform the American people whether and why the policy of unconditional surrender is being modified.

Mr. BUDENZ. The next two are from the Daily Worker of August 18, 1945, the first of them being on page 2 and being a news dispatch from Art Shields, the Daily Worker correspondent at that time in Washington. In the course of this article, which is headed "See danger of United States intervention for Chiang," it says:

Unfortunately America's declared policy, as laid down by Ambassador Patrick Hurley, is to help the Kuomintang and to isolate the popular resistance forces operating from Yenan. There is no evidence yet to show that Grew's designation means that the United States intends to follow the united policy urged by General Stilwell, before he was taken out of China at the request of Chiang.

That "designation" is a typographical error, it means "resignation" because they have just mentioned that Grew has resigned.

Mr. MORRIS. I would like to introduce that into the record as the next consecutive exhibit, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be received and so designated.

SEE DANGER OF UNITED STATES INTERVENTION FOR CHIANG

(By Art Shields)

WASHINGTON, August 17.—The resignation of Joseph C. Grew, long a foe of Chinese unity, from his strategic post as Under Secretary of State, might be seen as an encouraging token of American policy toward China if taken by itself. Unfortunately it cannot be taken by itself. And there is too little time to speculate hopefully on inconclusive data, while the danger of further American intervention in the civil war, which Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek is preparing, remains so obvious.

This intervention in the next few days may take a more active form than it has in recent months when the United States was merely equipping the Kuomintang armies, which were giving more attention to the blockade against the popular anti Japanese resistance forces, led by the Communist General Chu Teh, than to fighting the enemy.

The best informed authorities on China in Washington, in talks with the Daily Worker, yesterday foresaw certain types of American military and naval intervention to help the reactionary dictatorship, as distinct possibilities for the very near future.

Military intervention could come if General Wedemeyer, commander of American forces in China, carried out his reported promise to Chiang to carry airborne

Kuomintang troops to areas where the Japanese are surrendering. In most of those areas the Japanese and puppet troops would otherwise be forced to surrender to Chu Teh's armies, which are engaging more enemy forces than Chiang's armies are engaging.

Such action, if it takes place, would constitute American military intervention on behalf of the Chinese reactionaries, who are plotting civil war. It would involve the loss of American lives and a breach of faith with the Chinese people. It would jeopardize postwar peace in Asia and the world.

Chiang has already appealed to the Japanese not to surrender to the democratic forces, in other words to continue resisting them until he can take over with American help, thus encouraging the Japanese to continue the war in violation of the Allied orders for immediate and unconditional surrender. He also has told the puppet troops under Japanese command that he will hold them "responsible for maintaining local peace and order."

This means that Chiang is seeking an alliance with foreign enemies and Chinese traitors against the people. And it means, says a statement from the people's government at Yenan, that Chiang is seeking to get possession of enemy arms for the purpose of launching large-scale civil war against the heroic anti-Japanese guerilla fighters and the Eighth and Fourth Route Armies led by the Communists.

NAVAL INTERVENTION

The danger of naval as well as military intervention may come in port cities like Shanghai. The democratic, anti-Japanese armies, not Chiang's are advancing on Shanghai and most of the other large cities. The people, not the Kuomintang, will take these cities unless America intervenes.

Unfortunately America's declared policy, as laid down by Ambassador Patrick Hurley, is to help the Kuomintang and to isolate the popular resistance forces operating from Yenan. There is no evidence yet to show that Grew's designation means that the United States intends to follow the unity policy urged by General Stilwell before he was taken out of China at the request of Chiang.

Authoritative observers of the Chinese scene here also point out that Americans should not develop hasty illusions from Chiang's recent request to Mao Tse-tung, Communist political leader in Yenan, to confer with him in Chungking.

Conferences that are intended as more than gestures are not called in such vague fashion, they declare. There must first be preliminary meetings of representatives of the two groups to prepare the ground before the principals sit down together. There must be understandings regarding the specific issues to be discussed. Chiang's florid but brief invitation to Mao does not provide such understandings.

And, most important, the invitation must be accompanied by such measures of good faith as the cessation of civil war by the Kuomintang, the lifting of the blockade against the border region, the release of political prisoners, and the establishment of democratic civil liberties.

TERRORISTIC ATMOSPHERE

Chungking's present terroristic atmosphere is not conducive to the conference Chiang proposes.

America's first concern, however, is to tell our Government that there must be no intervention against the anti-Japanese fighters in China. No intervention on the side of a civil war plotter like Chiang, who, Yenan spokesmen have revealed, has set up a special Chinese brand of fascism—the brand called Compradore fascism, which is a reactionary dictatorship under the wings of foreign imperialism.

Mr. MORRIS. May I make it clear that we are reading these articles and editorials from the Daily Worker to show that the Communist Party, during this period, was carrying on an extensive campaign against the then Under Secretary of State Grew, because he was advocating a so-called soft peace for Japan?

Mr. BUDENZ. That is correct.

Mr. MORRIS. Is that the case?

Mr. BUDENZ. That is right.

Mr. MORRIS. What was the Communist policy for Japan?

Mr. BUDENZ. It was that of a tough peace for Japan.

Mr. MORRIS. And Mr. Grew was not carrying out that policy and therefore they were opposing him?

Mr. BUDENZ. That is correct.

We have here an editorial, Stop the Monkey Business, appearing on the same date, August 18, 1945, on the regular editorial page of the Daily Worker, page 6. This is the leading editorial, which concludes as follows:

> Americans today are in no mood to take any wooden nickels. The dilly-dallying with the Emperor in Japan must stop, and, incidentally, Joseph Grew must really be retired from public life and in no case appointed to any post dealing with far-eastern affairs.

Mr. MORRIS. Now was this campaign being carried on against anyone else in the Japanese Division of the State Department, Mr. Budenz?

Mr. BUDENZ. Yes, sir; it was carried on at the same time extensively by the party, much more than these articles in the Daily Worker indicate. They corroborate the campaign, but through communications of the Politburo it was also against Eugene C. Dooman, who I understand was then connected with the Far Eastern Division of the State Department.

Mr. MORRIS. Is there any reference to Mr. Dooman in those articles?

Mr. BUDENZ. There are references which I don't see in these articles, but there were many. There is an announcement here that the State Department "retires soft-peace advocate," but this is a United Press dispatch played up in the Daily Worker. This is dated September 6, 1945, page 2. It indicates that the campaign against Mr. Dooman was meeting with success.

Mr. MORRIS. The campaign against Mr. Dooman was meeting with success?

Mr. BUDENZ. That is right.

Mr. MORRIS. I would like to have these introduced into the record, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. They will be so received and so designated.

STOP THE MONKEY BUSINESS

The American people are watching the spectacle of Japan's delayed surrender with very suspicious eyes. And when you take into account the treacherous policies of Chiang Kai-shek, and the rip-roaring appeal to the reactionaries of the entire world by Winston Churchill—you get a very strange picture indeed. The American people are in no mood for monkey business. And that's what they fear is afoot.

For example, there is today's report of a Japanese airplane attack upon our bombers, who were peacefully photographing Tokyo. The Kwantung army is still fighting.

The behavior of the Japanese Emperor is very strange, and all his rescripts read as though Japan still thinks she can make war again at some future time. At least three war criminals, members of the old Cabinet, have been reappointed to the new one; and one of these ministers even has the portfolio for "Greater East Asia," as though to say that Japan still expects to exercise imperialist control over the peoples of Indochina, the Netherlands Indies, Malaya, and Burma, and Thailand.

The Japanese Government explains to its people that the war was won "spiritually"; the Tokyo radio breathes insidious suggestions of revenge; there is no mention of the war guilt of the former Japanese Cabinet whatsoever.

And the Emperor's emphasis on the atom bomb makes it appear that Japan lost the war because of some scientific freak and not because she was forced to her knees. This is exactly the kind of propaganda to prepare for sabotaging the Potsdam declaration. We cannot share President Truman's complacency about it.

SURRENDER DELAYED

But the main thing is that the cease-fire order is being delayed. Russians and Mongolians—our allies—are still dying. And our own soldiers face treachery at every point. No wonder the American people are suspicious. It is as though the American supreme command is just as worried about a social and political crack-up inside of Japan as the Emperor himself. It is as though our State Department is trying to help the Japanese feudalists and industrialists to weather their internal crisis. That is none of our business. Any leniency to the Japanese along those lines contains the prospect of rupturing the Allies and laying the basis for future wars.

And then there is the crisis in China. The facts are brutally plain. Chiang Kai-shek is trying to keep the Japanese armies intact and fully armed until his own troops can get to Shanghai and Nanking. In other words, Chiang Kai-shek is afraid of the Chinese people who have suffered so long under the Japanese heel; he prefers to keep them under that heel rather than allow them to liberate themselves.

What does it mean, after all, when the Japanese puppet at Nanking publicly offers to hold the city with quisling troops until Chiang Kai-shek gets there? This is simple treachery. If it had happened in Europe, the country would be crying "sellout" from the housetops.

But how can Chiang Kai-shek dare to fly his troops into Shanghai and Nanking? Only because the American general, Albert Wedemeyer offers to help him with the services of American planes. In blunt language, this is intervention in the affairs of the Chinese people. It is encouraging Chiang to make civil war on all Chinese democrats. It is a dastardly game, and neither our soldiers nor our people want any part of it.

And finally, there is the Herbert Hoover of Great Britain—Winston Churchill. His speech in Parliament was much more than a challenge to the British Labor Government, although it was that, too, and we hope the British people and their leaders will know how to answer it. The speech was also a call to American reactionaries, urging them to treat Japan and to handle China in such a way as to prevent the victory of the democratic forces.

His reference to communism in Eastern and Central Europe, and his defense of the poor Germans in eastern Prussia is dangerous in itself, but most important, it bears immediately on the issues in Asia.

Americans today are in no mood to take any wooden nickels. The dilly-dallying with the emperor in Japan must stop, and incidentally Joseph Grew must really be retired from public life and in no case appointed to any post dealing with far-eastern affairs.

The United States must disavow Chiang Kai-shek's plans for civil war in China and give no support whatsoever to such a project. Vigilance of the Nation is required today, a responsibility which falls particularly upon the labor movement.

STATE DEPARTMENT RETIRES "SOFT PEACE" ADVOCATE

WASHINGTON, September 5 (UP).—Secretary of State James F. Byrnes, shaping a stiff occupation policy toward Japan, today was replacing old-line Japanese policy-making officials in the State Department with experts on China.

Eugene Dooman, special assistant to the director of the Department's Far Eastern Division, retired on August 31, it was revealed today, after 33 years of diplomatic service in the Japanese department. He was born in Japan and has been criticized by liberal publications for a "soft" attitude toward Japan.

He had held a key spot in formulating occupation procedure for Japan as chairman of a joint State, Army, and Navy Department committee responsible for occupation policy.

John Carter Vincent, chief of the State Department's Division of Chinese Affairs, was recalled hurriedly from his vacation to fill Dooman's place on the committee. Vincent also retained his China post.

OTHERS MAY GO

Under Secretary of State Joseph C. Grew's recent resignation, and Dooman's retirement intensified speculation that Byrnes would replace other old liners in the Japanese section. Mentioned prominently were Ballantine and Erle R. Dickover, Chief of the Japanese Section.

Observers regarded it significant that Vincent was the second China specialist to be appointed to a vital Japanese policy-making post within the last few days.

Byrnes yesterday appointed United States Minister to Thialand George Atcheson to be acting political adviser to Gen. Douglas MacArthur. Both Vincent and Atcheson have spent years in China and have seen the effects of Japanese aggression. Atcheson was aboard the U. S. S. Panay when the Japanese bombed it on December 12, 1937.

At his press conference Byrnes made it clear that United States policy toward Japan was more stringent than had yet been disclosed.

Asked if he had seen reports that the Japanese did not believe they had lost the war, he said the terms of the occupation would soon be presented to the Japanese and if they didn't bring defeat home to them he didn't know what would.

Mr. BUDENZ. May I state, Mr. Chairman, that I have one more exhibit, which while I have taken it out of order is slightly different, it indicates the continuation of the campaign against Mr. Grew in order to drive him completely out of public life, as the editorial of August 18 stated, and this is a very large display article playing up with a great deal of praise John Stewart Service for having been vindicated after he had allegedly taken State Department documents and given them to Philip Jaffe.

After his vindication and reinstatement in the State Department this says—

"So sorry," says Grew; State Department reinstates man he called spy.

There is a very prominent picture of John Service, and it says—

Mr. Grew, late but unlamented Undersecretary of the State Department, popped off, too.

Then they go on to indicate that Grew was compelled personally to apologize to one of the victims of the witch hunt, John S. Service, who was reinstated to his State Department job.

So there was nothing that poor Mr. Grew could do but echo the American equivalent of the Japanese "so sorry" which he learned after a long sojourn in Tokyo.

This is written up by a special writer for the Daily Worker and plays up Mr. Service, and of course belittles Mr. Grew.

Senator O'CONOR. I would like to ask a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Go right ahead.

Senator O'CONOR. In view of your reference just made I am going to ask the question whether you considered Amerasia a Communist publication?

Mr. BUDENZ. Oh, yes. Amerasia was organized, according to official information given to me, under complete Communist auspices. As a matter of fact, the first copy of Amerasia when it first appeared was presented to me before it ever appeared to get my opinion. This was done, however, within the Communist apparatus and not by the Amerasia people.

After I passed on it it went back to the Politburo. They said it had been submitted to me first before publication.

Mr. MORRIS. You mean issue No. 1 of volume No. 1 was submitted to you for approval?

Mr. BUDENZ. For my comments as to whether it was going to perform its task.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to introduce the previous photostat we were discussing into the record as the next consecutive exhibit.

The CHAIRMAN. That will be done.

"SO SORRY," SAYS GREW; STATE DEPARTMENT REINSTATES MAN HE CALLED SPY

(By John Meldon)

Yes, sir; it was all quite a mistake—but you won't find acknowledgment in those newspapers which screamed "Spy ring" a short time back.

You recall the case: Five men and a woman were arrested and the Scripps-Howard press and Dirty Willie's Journal-American and Mirror, as well as the staid Times, ran the story in banner headlines. The six were accused—by the press and not the authorities—of constituting a "spy ring" with "connections" with those awful Communists.

For several days the newspapers raved and ranted, and Mr. Grew, late but unlamented Under Secretary of the State Department, popped off, too. He hinted darkly that the six accused—three employees of the State Department and several editors and writers for the magazine Amerasia—had done everything but back a Mack truck up to the State Department and expropriate all sorts of "confidential" documents relating to the China situation.

Payoff came yesterday when Mr. Grew personally apologized to one of the victims of the witchhunt—John S. Service—who was reinstated to his State Department job by Secretary Byrnes. In putting Service back on the job, Mr. Byrnes praised Service to the skies for his excellent 12-year record with the Department. So there was nothing that poor Mr. Grew could do but echo the American equivalent of the Japanese "so sorry" which he learned after a long sojourn in Tokyo.

But do you think the newspapers which went to town on the "spy ring" phony had anything to say yesterday? Of course not. For that matter when, on last August 10 only three of the original group accused were indicted—not as spies, mind you, but on the far less serious charge of removing documents without permission—the newspapers buried the fact in little one-column stories somewhere back among the want ads.

However, don't get the idea Mr. Howard or Mr. Dirty Willie are sorry. They accomplished what they set out to do. They planted a terrific lie and some of it stuck. You see, the whole thing behind the story is that the accused group were fed up with Mr. Grew's policies toward our Chinese allies. So Mr. Grew and the big-circulation press nailed them.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, we have had testimony previously that the first issue of Amerasia appeared in 1937.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well.

Mr. MORRIS. While the campaign against Mr. Grew and Mr. Dooman was proceeding with respect to policy for Japan, was there a policy in the Communist Party councils also being carried out with respect to certain officials concerning our China policy?

Mr. BUDENZ. Yes, sir; definitely. As we have indicated here it was against Lt. Gen. Albert Wedemeyer, against Ambassador and Gen. Patrick Hurley.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to follow the same procedure with respect to this folder. Mr. Mandel, will you testify as to the contents of that folder?

Mr. MANDEL. All copies from the Daily Worker appearing in this folder have been prepared at my direction.

The CHAIRMAN. Photostatic copies?

Mr. MANDEL. Some are photostated and a couple are typed.

Mr. MORRIS. I am forwarding this list to the witness, Mr. Chairman, so that it will refresh his recollection in testifying to the coming incidents.

Mr. BUDENZ. This first photostatic copy of the Daily Worker is linked up with the campaign on Grew to some extent in addition to the campaign on Hurley. It was engineered, to my knowledge, by the Communist Party—that is, by official reports that I have received. This was the statement by 21 prominent Americans urging President Truman to avert the serious danger of civil war in China.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt at this point to show that these 21 people who signed the statement, which according to the testimony of Mr. Budenz was signed to influence our foreign policy, that a great number of them were connected with the Institute of Pacific Relations. I would like to go through that list with this in mind. Mr. Budenz, have you a copy of the list?

Mr. BUDENZ. It appears here in the Daily Worker.

Mr. MORRIS. I wonder if we could linger here for a minute and I would like to ask you to read out the names.

Mr. BUDENZ. All of them?

Mr. MORRIS. Yes.

Mr. BUDENZ. Dr. Phyllis Ackerman; T. A. Bisson, writer——

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to point out that we have had testimony concerning Mr. Bisson's relations with the Institute of Pacific Relations.

Mr. BUDENZ. Mrs. Edward C. Carter.

Mr. MORRIS. Is she the wife of Edward C. Carter, the secretary general of the Institute of Pacific Relations?

Mr. BUDENZ. That is my understanding.

Mr. MORRIS. Continue, Mr. Budenz.

Mr. BUDENZ. Maurice P. Davidson, lawyer; Israel Epstein, correspondent.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to point out that we have had testimony that Israel Epstein was connected with the Institute of Pacific Relations.

Mr. BUDENZ. Frederick V. Field, member, executive committee, Institute of Pacific Relations.

Mr. MORRIS. I think that speaks for itself, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BUDENZ. Melvin J. Fox; Talitha Gerlach, Young Women's Christian Association——

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to point out that Talitha Gerlach, according to previous testimony, has been associated with the Institute of Pacific Relations.

Mr. BUDENZ. Freda Kirchwey, editor, the Nation; Lewis Merrill, president, United Office and Professional Workers of America;

Frederick N. Myers, vice president, National Maritime Union; Rev. Richard Morton, executive secretary, United Church Council for Democracy; Arthur Upham Pope, director, Iranian Institute; Martin Popper, executive secretary, National Lawyers Guild; Lawrence E. Salisbury, editor, Far Eastern Survey.

Mr. Morris. Mr. Chairman, I would like to point out that the Far Eastern Survey is the official publication of the Institute of Pacific Relations.

Senator Smith. May I ask a question?

The Chairman. Yes, sir.

Senator Smith. Mr. Budenz, do you know Mr. Martin Popper?

Mr. Budenz. I have talked to him on the phone and my impression is that I have met him.

Senator Smith. Do you know about his alleged trip to Russia in the spring of 1946?

Mr. Budenz. I don't recall that.

Senator Smith. Did you know about that?

Mr. Budenz. I couldn't recall it offhand. His relations with the Daily Worker were of the closest.

Senator Smith. I saw him in Europe myself, and it was alleged that he went from Nuremberg to Russia and I wondered if you knew about it.

Mr. Budenz. I do not.

Mr. Morris. I think that will be enough, Mr. Budenz.

The purpose of that, Mr. Chairman, was to show the high incidence of the members of the Institute of Pacific Relations which participated in that which Mr. Budenz described as a Communist maneuver.

The Chairman. This is a list on some document addressed to the President?

Mr. Budenz. Yes, sir.

Mr. Morris. Was it arranged by the Communist Party?

Mr. Budenz. Yes, sir.

Mr. Morris. What is the date of that?

Mr. Budenz. August 17, 1945.

Senator O'Conor. I do understand, Mr. Budenz, that you either are prepared to say or have said it that the telegram was signed by the individuals in their individual capacity? You did make reference to certain organizations such as the Young Women's Christian Association.

Mr. Budenz. Yes, sir.

Senator O'Conor. I do not think you wanted to give any impression that they were speaking for the organization?

Mr. Budenz. No; but this is a typical Communist procedure, putting the organization down and giving the impression that they are linked up in some way. I might say that they call themselves the Friends of Chinese Democracy. It was a committee called that, so it was under the cover of that committee.

Senator Smith. The same might be said with respect to the National Lawyers Guild, Mr. Martin Popper of the National Lawyers Guild?

Mr. Budenz. Yes, sir. I would prefer not to discuss the National Lawyers Guild today because I have to indict it and that would take quite a bit of time.

Mr. MORRIS. Is that all there is to this particular one?

Mr. BUDENZ. There is another name, Ilona Ralf Sues, writer.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like that introduced into the record and have it marked as the next consecutive exhibit.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be received and given the proper designation.

[From the Daily Worker, New York, Friday, August 17, 1945, p. 2]

AMERICANS IN PLEA TO TRUMAN ON CHINA

Twenty-one prominent Americans yesterday urged President Truman to avert the serious danger of civil war in China. They demanded immediate steps to prevent American planes and other military equipment from being turned over to the Chungking government.

Pointing out that Chiang Kai-shek has made a direct appeal to the Japanese troops "to retain their arms and equipment for the maintenance of public order," the telegram to Truman stated that "the only American policy which will avoid civil war is not to interfere with the surrender of Japanese troops to patriotic Chinese groups on the spot.

The message to President Truman noted that the Communist-led Eighth Route and new Fourth Armies which Chiang Kai-shek is preparing to attack "have borne the brunt of the Allied fight in North Central China.

SIGNERS

The telegram was signed by the following in their individual capacities (organizations listed for purpose of identification only):

Dr. Phylles Ackerman; T. A. Bisson, writer; Mrs. Edward C. Carter; Maurice P. Davidson, lawyer; Israel Epstein, correspondent; Frederick V. Field, member, executive committee, Institute of Pacific Relations; Melvin J. Fox; Talitha Gerlach, Young Women's Christian Association; Freda Kirchwey, editor, the Nation; Lewis Merrill, president, United Office and Professional Workers of America; Frederick N. Myers, vice president, National Maritime Union.

Rev. Richard Morton, executive secretary, United Church Council for Democracy; Arthur Upham Pope, director, Iranian Institute; Martin Popper, executive secretary, National Lawyers Guild; Lawrence E. Salisbury, editor, Far Eastern Survey; Vincent Sheean, writer, Mrs. Edgar Snow, writer; Ilona Ralf Sues, writer; Richard Watts, writer; Dr. Max Yergan, director, Council on African Affairs, and Reid Robinson, president, Mine, Mill, and Smelter Workers, CIO.

A committee called The Friends of Chinese Democracy, is being formed, the purpose of which will be to press for an American foreign policy designed to support all efforts of the Chinese people for unity and democratic government, it was announced yesterday.

The full text of the message to President Truman follows:

"We are alarmed at the news that the Chungking government is planning to use American planes and other military equipment made available to them by General Wedemeyer and Ambassador Hurley to combat the perfectly legitimate efforts of patriotic Chinese forces in north and central China engaged in disarming enemy troops and liberating areas in which they alone have fought throughout the war.

"If these plans are carried out it can only mean civil war in China instead of Chinese democratic unity on which the security of the Far East depends.

"We are particularly disturbed by Chiang Kai-shek's recent order to Chinese puppet troops who have been serving the Japanese enemy and who now apparently are to be used by the Chungking and American Governments against patriotic forces.

"The latter, despite never having received any assistance from the United States or Chungking, have borne the brunt of the Allied fight in north and central China, cooperated with American military personnel and rescued almost 100 American airmen forced down in the vicinity of Peiping, Taiyuan, Hankow, Shanghai, Canton, Hong Kong.

ENCOURAGES FOE

"Generalissimo Chiang, moreover, encourages continued resistance of the enemy by inviting them to police the areas which they hold at present, and by stating that they will be held "strictly accountable" for arms which they or their puppets "might surrender to any organization or party other than officers or men duly authorized by the Chinese (Central) Government."

If carried out, such a policy would violate the purposes of this war. It would seriously jeopardize the peace that has been won. Americans would not support a policy toward China similar to that of the British in Greece.

Under circumstances existing in China today we believe that the only American policy which will avoid civil war is not to interfere with the surrender to patriotic Chinese troops on the spot and simultaneously to encourage all Chinese efforts to a democratic government.

"Such action must be based on full agreement with Great Britain and the Soviet Union.

"In appealing to you, Mr. President, we reflect the views of thousands of Americans, including many of those serving in the Armed Forces in China."

Mr. MORRIS. Are there any other articles, Mr. Budenz, establishing the point that the Communists were then carrying on a policy such as you testified to?

Mr. BUDENZ. Yes, sir. Having disposed of Grew and Dooman, the campaign was laid before I left the party, and it was already under way, as you can see from these editorials to which I have referred, for attack on Ambassador Hurley, which was more prolonged than we have indicated here. I say, before I left the party because these copies of the Daily Worker are after I am out of the party.

Mr. MORRIS. I see.

Mr. BUDENZ. However, I recognize them as copies of the Daily Worker which I have read.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you continue your testimony on that point?

The CHAIRMAN. Just on that point, do you intend to follow up, Mr. Morris, as regards the attack on General Wedemeyer? If not I would like to ask a question or two. If you have it in the course of your presentation, all right.

Mr. MORRIS. Are you prepared to testify about the campaign against General Wedemeyer, Mr. Budenz?

Mr. BUDENZ. Not in great detail. I just know that this campaign in the Daily Worker was carried out to the various sections of the Communist Party and was made the order of business for the Communists in other organizations.

The CHAIRMAN. I am interested in that phase of the campaign which seems to have been pointed toward General Wedemeyer. Wedemeyer was at that time, or at some time either prior to or subsequently sent under the auspices of the State Department to China, as I recall?

Mr. BUDENZ. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. And was the representative of the State Department in China. Was it during that time that he was attacked by the Communists?

Mr. BUDENZ. That is my impression. As a matter of fact, the Communists viewed General Wedemeyer as the enemy of the Soviet interests in the Far East.

The CHAIRMAN. General Wedemeyer's report was a controversial thing here for a long time and was refused to congressional committees even under subpena when we issued subpenas for the presentation of General Wedemeyer's report on China and the Far East.

I am just wondering why the attack was directed against Wedemeyer, if you know.

Mr. BUDENZ. The attack was directed against Wedemeyer from the Communist viewpoint because they consider him to be an enemy of Soviet policy in the Far East. The policy of the Communists was to work out a coalition government in which they could strangle those who coalesced with them. That was the phrase used in the discussion so that I am not straining the question.

General Wedemeyer's tendencies—I can't go into them in detail, were in opposition to that course—that is, at least to the extent that the Communists viewed him as one who would not go along fully with their program.

Senator WATKINS. May I ask a question?

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

Senator WATKINS. With respect to General Wedemeyer, the public press reported him to have told about a time when he was appointed Ambassador to China and then his appointment was canceled because some intereststs in China objected. Do you know anything about that campaign about getting his appointment canceled?

Mr. BUDENZ. Not specifically. I know there was a general campaign against General Wedemeyer as one of those in our diplomatic service who was inimical to Soviet interests.

Senator WATKINS. Do you recall his testimony where he said he bought his clothing for that particular assignment?

Mr. BUDENZ. I read in the public press and that is the only knowledge I have.

Senator WATKINS. Were you connected with the party at that time? That goes back a number of years.

Mr. BUDENZ. That I am not sure of. I don't know the date of it, and I would want to be precise.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Smith?

Senator SMITH. When General Wedemeyer's report was held up, do you know, Mr. Budenz, enough about the influence of the Communists on anybody in State Department that tended to cause that report to be held up; and, if so, how was that worked out?

Mr. BUDENZ. Of my own knowledge I wouldn't know that. I wouldn't know everything about Communist activity. But I do know that the Communists relied very strongly on Service and John Carter Vincent in the campaign against Ambassador Hurley, for example.

Senator SMITH. Was a part of the campaign against General Wedemeyer to have his report suppressed, as it was indeed suppressed for several years?

Mr. MORRIS. Senator Smith, it may be that Mr. Budenz' experience in the Communist Party terminated in 1945. Was not General Wedemeyer's report issued subsequent to that time?

Mr. BUDENZ. That is my impression.

Senator SMITH. Thank you.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Budenz, you have been testifying up to this point with regard to the people that the Communists planned to eliminate from the State Department because they interfered with Communist policy. What people were you relying on to put over your policy?

The CHAIRMAN. The policy of elimination?

Mr. MORRIS. The policy of elimination. Let's take the Japanese situation first. Did the Communist Party make use of Owen Lattimore or Owen Lattimore's writings with respect to Japan?

Mr. BUDENZ. Oh, yes, we see that with respect to Japan policy and others.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you elaborate on that?

Mr. BUDENZ. His book, Solution in Asia, was it not?—was used by the Communists and other writings of his.

Mr. MORRIS. Did you not testify about a certain press release yesterday?

Mr. BUDENZ. That is what I referred to just now.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you amplify that, please?

Mr. BUDENZ. This press release we can see runs in line with the Communist charges here against everybody; that they are for the retention of vested interest in Japan.

The CHAIRMAN. To what press release do you refer when you say "this press release"?

Mr. BUDENZ. This was a press release which was introduced in evidence the other day issued in 1945. I don't say that I have any knowledge that Mr. Lattimore conferred with the Communists before making the statement. I do say that this statement was used extensively by the Communists to my knowledge, it was made a special order of business for the Communist Party to press it.

Mr. MORRIS. You say that supplemented the Communist campaign to eliminate Grew from the State Department?

Mr. BUDENZ. That is right.

Mr. MORRIS. And also in imposing a hard peace on Japan?

Mr. BUDENZ. That is correct.

Mr. MORRIS. Were any writings of Andrew Roth used for this purpose?

Mr. BUDENZ. Yes, sir. Dilemma in Japan was not only advanced by the Communists but it was submitted to the Politburo before publication.

Mr. MORRIS. Was Andrew Roth a Communist?

Mr. BUDENZ. Yes, sir, from many official reports he was a Communist. These came up particularly in the Amerasia case and definitely Mr. Roth was described as a Communist.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Budenz, is it your testimony that Andrew Roth's book was used to supplement this Communist campaign?

Mr. BUDENZ. Most decidedly.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Budenz, was John Carter Vincent a member of the Communist Party?

Mr. BUDENZ. From official reports that I have received, he was.

Mr. MORRIS. Did you know that he went to China with Henry Wallace and Owen Lattimore?

Mr. BUDENZ. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORRIS. Did you hear at that time in official Communist Party circles that John Carter Vincent and Owen Lattimore were members of the Communist Party traveling with Henry Wallace?

Mr. BUDENZ. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. I wish you would elaborate on that.

Mr. BUDENZ. As I have stated, the trip by Wallace to China was followed by the Communists with a great deal of interest in discussions in the Politburo. In those discussions it was pointed out that Mr. Wallace was more or less under good influences from the Communist viewpoint, that is to say, that he had on one hand Mr. Lattimore and on the other John Carter Vincent, both of whom were described as being in line with the Communist viewpoint, seeing eye to eye with it, and that they would guide Mr. Wallace largely along those paths.

The CHAIRMAN. To what are you referring, are you referring to publications or statements made in party conclave, or statements made by high officials of the Communist Party or to what are you referring when you say that it was stated that Mr. Wallace was under good influence?

Mr. BUDENZ. That was stated by Communist officials in the Politburo at that time, by Mr. Browder and Mr. Jack Stachel. This is also confirmed to some degree, not the Wallace business but the dependence on John Stewart Service and John Carter Vincent, that is confirmed by the Daily Worker's subsequent statement that they were responsible to a great degree for getting Mr. Hurley out of the State Department.

Senator O'CONOR. Mr. Budenz, at that point could I ask you if you knew what position John Carter Vincent held at that time?

Mr. BUDENZ. I could not. I know as yet he wasn't head of the Far Eastern Division of the State Department and that he was subsequently placed in that Division.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Budenz, is it your testimony that it was an official Communist Party secret shared by a few people that at that time John Carter Vincent was a member of the Communist Party?

Mr. BUDENZ. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH. Was one of the objectives of the Communists to put Mr. Vincent in the position he afterward acquired?

Mr. BUDENZ. The Communists were eager that Mr. Vincent advance and that he obtain a place in the State Department where he could get rid of Hurley and in addition to that could also influence policy.

Senator SMITH. Was that purpose achieved by his being put in the position that he was placed in?

Mr. BUDENZ. Yes, sir, Mr. Dooman was got out and he was put in his place.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Mandel, will you read extracts from Henry Wallace's book at that time which elaborates on Mr. Budenz' testimony?

The CHAIRMAN. What was the name of the book and when was it published?

Mr. MANDEL. I read from the book entitled "Soviet Asia Mission," by Henry A. Wallace, published by Reynal & Hitchcock, the following two paragraphs on page 172.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you the date of the publication?

Mr. MANDEL. It was 1944 or 1945.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

Mr. MORRIS. This is Henry Wallace's writing.

Mr. MANDEL (reading):

> We spent the night of July 4 at Chita. In the evening I had a long talk with Sergei Goglidze. He was curious about the Chinese situation. I replied in the spirit of the Chungking joint statement. Like other Russian officials Goglidze was concerned about the strength of the anti-Soviet elements in China. He was anxious that China remain united in the war against Japan and was conscious of the vital role the United States has in China's future. His feelings were revealed in telling incidents during our entire journey.
> One night at dinner the Russian airman, Mazuruk, proposed a toast: "To the modernization of China." Goglidze immediately suggested a logical modification: "May China remain in the war." Without victory over Japanese militarism,

China could hardly have the necessary freedom for modernization. At dinner, after our return from China, Goglidze offered a significant toast to "Owen Lattimore and John Carter Vincent, American experts on China, on whom rests great responsibility for China's future."

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Mandel, is there anything in the previous paragraph that identifies who Goglidze was?

Mr. MANDEL. Goglidze, according to the same book, was a Georgian, an intimate friend of Marshal Stalin, president of the executive committee of Khabarovsk Territory, under which this far northern area is governed.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like this introduced into the record as the next consecutive exhibit, this excerpt from Mr. Wallace's book. But I would like to ask Mr. Budenz a question on that last toast Mr. Goglidze proposed.

The CHAIRMAN. That will be inserted in the record and properly marked.

EXHIBIT No. 175

SOVIET ASIA MISSION

(By Henry A. Wallace—Regnal and Hitchcock)

I was assisted by expert interpreters who accompanied me. They were, in addition to Mr. Lattimore: Mr. John Hazard, Chief Liaison Officer, Division for Soviet Supply, Foreign Economic Administration of Chinese Affairs, State Department (p. 21).

* * * * * * *

We spent the night of July 4 at Chita. In the evening I had a long talk with Sergei Goglidze. He was curious about the Chinese situation. I replied in the spirit of the Chungking joint statement. Like other Russian officials Goglidze was concerned about the strength of the anti-Soviet elements in China. He was anxious that China remain united in the war against Japan and was conscious of the vital role the United States has in China's future. His feelings were revealed in telling incidents during our entire journey.

One night at dinner the Russian airman, Mazuruk, proposed a toast: "To the modernization of China." Goglidze immediately suggested a logical modification: "May China remain in the war." Without victory over Japanese militarism, China could hardly have the necessary freedom for modernization. At dinner, after our return from China, Goglidze offered a significant toast to "Owen Lattimore and John Carter Vincent, American experts on China, on whom rests great responsibility for China's future" (p. 172).

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Budenz, did you hear the toast that Goglidze proposed, "Owen Lattimore and John Carter Vincent, American experts on China, on whom rests great responsibility for China's future"? As an expert on the Communist movement, bearing in mind the fact that Mr. Goglidze was an intimate of Marshal Stalin and that he made that toast, would it have any significance to you?

Mr. BUDENZ. I think it speaks for itself. I think it speaks for itself that the Russians always make these toasts for political purposes. Of course, everybody they toast is not a Communist, but I think that they were definitely trying to establish the place of Owen Lattimore and John Carter Vincent in Mr. Wallace's mind for Mr. Wallace and also placing upon them the responsibility.

Mr. MORRIS. When Mr. Goglidze speaks of China's future he does it with what in view?

Mr. BUDENZ. Definitely he does it with the view of a Red China, that is no secret, that was told us long ago and was the whole program.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Mandel, have you any letters there showing John Carter Vincent's relations with the Institute of Pacific Relations?

Mr. MANDEL. John Carter Vincent——

The CHAIRMAN. What are you reading from?

Mr. MANDEL. I am reading from a list of attendance at the discussion conference held in Washington, D. C., of the American Council of the Institute of Pacific Relations held December 9 to 10, 1938, and Mr. John Carter Vincent attended that conference. He was also a conference member of the Hot Springs IPR conference held January 6 to 17, 1945, according to a volume called Security in the Pacific, a preliminary report of the Ninth Conference of the Institute of Pacific Relations, on page 159.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Mandel, is there anything showing when Mr. Vincent was a member of the board of trustees of the Institute of Pacific Relations?

Mr. MANDEL. No, I do not have that.

Mr. MORRIS. Will you make that a part of the record later today?

Mr. MANDEL. Yes.

DECEMBER 27, 1944.

Mr. JOHN CARTER VINCENT,
Department of State, Washington 25, D. C.

DEAR MR. VINCENT: This is just a last minute reminder to you about the conference. According to our records, you are expected during the following dates: January 9 through 17.

I would urge you to carefully observe the following suggestions:

1. There are no additional copies of data papers available. This means that you should bring your data papers with you or have them sent to you care of room 250, which is the headquarters of the American delegation. Any papers so sent should get out as soon as possible in order for them to arrive by January 5.

2. Additional data papers, not previously distributed, are being mailed direct to Hot Springs and will be distributed to you upon arrival.

3. Prior to January 4, please notify us of any change in your schedule by telegram to this office. After January 4, please notify us of any such change by wiring us at room 250, The Homestead, Hot Springs, Va.

The following is a listing we have for you in the conference who's who. If you have any changes, will you please let me know immediately:

"Chief, China Section, Office of Far Eastern Affairs, Department of State. Member, Board of Trustees, American Council, IPR."

I need not impress upon you again the importance of this meeting nor urge that you keep us informed of your plans.

Looking forward to seeing you at our sessions in Hot Springs, I am,

Very cordially yours,

RAYMOND DENNETT, Secretary.

Mr. MORRIS. Are there any letters, Mr. Mandel, that we can introduce at this time?

Mr. MANDEL. I have here a letter from the files of the Institute of Pacific Relations dated February 4, 1944. It is really a memorandum headed "W. L. H.," presumably William L. Holland, "from M. S. F.," presumably Miriam S. Farley. It says: "Copy to H. M." That might be Harriet Moore.

As you know, we have considered very carefully the possible effect of Max Stewart's pamphlet on IPR relations with China.

The Ms. has been read by John Fairbank and John Carter Vincent among others. Vincent said (in confidence), with a certain emphasis, that he thought it good and well worth publishing. Fairbank thought these things should be said but in a more subtle manner, and recommended rather extensive rewriting.

Without this he thought the pamphlet might impel the Chinese to leave the IPR. Both Fairbank and Vincent also made a number of helpful suggestions on points of detail.

That is an excerpt from the memorandum which is offered as an exhibit.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to introduce this into the record as the next consecutive exhibit and then I would like to ask Mr. Budenz a question.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be inserted in the record and properly marked.

(The document referred to was marked "Exhibit No. 176" and is as follows:)

EXHIBIT No. 176

FEBRUARY 4, 1944.

W. L. H. from M. S. F.
(Copy to H. M.)

As you know, we have considered very carefully the possible effect of Max Stewart's pamphlet on IPR relations with China.

The Ms. has been read by John Fairbank and John Carter Vincent among others. Vincent said (in confidence), and with a certain emphasis, that he thought it good and well worth publishing. Fairbank thought these things should be said but in a more subtle manner, and recommended rather extensive rewriting. Without this he thought the pamphlet might impel the Chinese to leave the IPR. Both Fairbank and Vincent also made a number of helpful suggestions on points of detail.

I am now editing the Ms. in the light of suggestions from Fairbank, Vincent and others. I have also to consider the author, who is not in favor of toning it down any more. Nevertheless I am making some changes along lines recommended by Fairbank, though not, likely, enough to satisfy him completely. My position is that I am willing, in fact, anxious, to go to any lengths to avoid offending Chinese sensibilities, provided this does not destroy the pamphlet's value for American readers. Our purpose in issuing it is to provide information for Americans, not to influence Chinese national policy. It would be useless for this purpose if it were written so subtly that ordinary Americans would not get anything out of it.

Personally I doubt that the China Council will leave the IPR because of this or anything else in similar vein. They have more to lose than the IPR by such action, though naturally they will use threats for what they are worth. I am inclined to agree with Max that they respect us more if we don't knuckle under to them.

The American Council is of course prepared to take full responsibility for this pamphlet and will quite understand if the Secretariat wishes to disown it. Nevertheless we should welcome your views. Perhaps I have assumed too much from the meagerness of your comments on the original Ms.; if so, please let me know. I shall be glad to show you the revised Ms. if you care to see it.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Budenz, have you previously testified that Maxwell Stewart is a Communist?

Mr. BUDENZ. Yes, sir; I have met him as such.

Mr. MORRIS. Do you know that John Fairbank is a Communist?

Mr. BUDENZ. Yes, sir; not by personally meeting him but by official reports, particularly in 1945.

Mr. MORRIS. You have already testified that John Carter Vincent was a Communist?

Mr. BUDENZ. That is correct.

Mr. MORRIS. Now I call your attention to the second paragraph in that letter, Mr. Budenz. Will you read that second paragraph? Mr. Budenz, the "Ms." stands for manuscript, I believe.

Mr. BUDENZ. "I am now editing the manuscript"——

Mr. MORRIS. The second paragraph.

Mr. BUDENZ. I beg your pardon.

The manuscript has been read by John Fairbank and John Carter Vincent among others. Vincent said, in confidence, with a certain emphasis, that he thought it good and well worth publishing. Fairbank thought these things should be said but in a more subtle manner, and recommended rather extensive rewriting. Without this he thought the pamphlet might impel the Chinese to leave the IPR. Both Fairbank and Vincent also made a number of helpful suggestions on points of detail.

Senator O'CONOR. Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. Senator O'Conor.

Senator O'CONOR. Mr. Budenz, I particularly note the parenthesis that John Vincent said in confidence and with a certain emphasis. Can you give any reason why any such statement should be made in confidence or just what significance that had?

Mr. BUDENZ. Yes, sir. It certainly was part of the Communist plan to protect, as I have said, those who were in key and delicate positions and therefore what he would give would be in confidence so that his name could not be used extensively but for immediate purposes involved among those in whom he had confidence.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Budenz, from your own experience was it a practice before a manuscript was issued that it be looked over by members of the Communist Party for perfection?

Mr. BUDENZ. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORRIS. Can you elaborate on that a bit for us?

Mr. BUDENZ. Of course, that doesn't prove this was looked over by Communists.

Mr. MORRIS. I understand.

Mr. BUDENZ. That was a practice; that is to say, frequently a pamphlet was referred to the Politburo or to someone immediately in charge of that particular work involved. He would then assign it to two or three people to look it over. I have looked over pamphlets and then people outside the immediate Communist apparatus would look over it for determination as to whether it stood up for the Marxist viewpoint, and to see whether it met the peculiar exigencies of the moment.

Mr. MORRIS. You do know with respect to this particular document, the author of which was Maxwell Stewart, read by John Carter Vincent and John Fairbank, that they were members of the Communist Party?

Mr. BUDENZ. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANDEL. I have here a brief slip taken from the files of the Institute of Pacific Relations that is undated, which is headed "E. C. C." and the name of Mortimer Graves is attached at the end. It reads as follows:

I have been asked by the Council of American-Soviet Friendship to call together a few people in Washington for discussion of a Washington Information Center on the U. S. S. R.. I can't spend any time on the matter myself but am quite willing to get a group together for lunch. Does this conflict in any way with Russian War Relief plans or anything of that sort? If so, of course, I won't participate. Hope to write something on the other matter tomorrow. Currie is waiting to see John Carter Vincent, just back from Chungking.

Mr. MORRIS. That is signed "Mortimer Graves"?

Mr. MANDEL. That is correct.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to introduce this into the record and have it marked as the next consecutive exhibit.

The CHAIRMAN. It may be so inserted and identified.

(The document referred to was marked "Exhibit No. 177" and is as follows:)

MORTIMER GRAVES.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Budenz, do you have any comments to make on that particular memorandum?

Mr. BUDENZ. I don't think so. I don't think so unless you want to ask me some question about it.

Mr. MORRIS. Was the Council of American-Soviet Friendship a Communist organization?

Mr. BUDENZ. That was a Communist front. That was a duplicate, if I may use the word duplicate here, because of many other organizations involved, founded by the Russian apparatus all over the world. They were first known as Friends of Soviet Russia and then became the Council of American-Soviet Friendship, completely controlled by the Communists, as it was created by them.

Mr. MORRIS. Was the staff of the Russian War Relief made up of Communists, Mr. Budenz, to your knowledge?

Mr. BUDENZ. Yes, sir; at least to my knowledge. I don't know that I can detail them at the moment.

Mr. MORRIS. Generally would you describe it?

Mr. BUDENZ. The Russian War Relief was organized by the Communists. It was organized under orders of the Soviet Embassy, at least from the statements made in the Politburo that they had received instruction to see that Russia War Relief was not only organized but made efficient and this matter was discussed on many occasions.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Budenz, will you continue with your going through those exhibits there with the view toward supplementing your testimony on the point that Communists were influencing our foreign policy with respect to China?

Mr. BUDENZ. These are Daily Workers published after I left the Communist Party, but I recognize them as copies of the Daily Worker I have read, as I continue to read the Daily Worker up to the present day. This one is dated November 28, 1945, page 3, Hurley Out as Envoy to China, Backs War Policy in Far East.

The paragraph to which I wish to direct your attention here, the one at least in my opinion that should be given attention, reads:

It is well known that liberal elements like John Carter Vincent and John S. Service in the State Department have opposed Hurley's reappointment. The former Ambassador continually sought to bypass them in his one-man rule of the Embassy in China.

It is a significant reflection of his mentality that all his critics are called Communists—

By the way, the Communists made particular point of attacking Hurley's mentality, representing him as a crude fellow. I could, if I had time, give you many examples, but they wouldn't be profitable.

It is a significant reflection of his mentality that all his critics are called Communists, and his main fire was centered on "the considerable section of our State Department which is endeavoring to support communism generally as well as specifically in China."

This article is significant beyond being an article in the Daily Worker because it is a specially written article by Joseph Starobin, foreign editor of the Daily Worker.

Mr. Morris. Were you managing editor of the Daily Worker at that time?

Mr. Budenz. I was not.

Mr. Morris. Can you describe the significance of the language there, "liberal elements like John Carter Vincent and John S. Service in the State Department"?

Mr. Budenz. That is generally used, liberal and progressive, for those who are Communist or pro-Communist. It doesn't necessarily mean that, however, but I think these speak for themselves.

Mr. Morris. What did you know about John Stewart Service, Mr. Budenz?

Mr. Budenz. I might add that those who are allies of the Communists, and some may be unconsciously, are designated as liberals Progressives are always identified as Communists, so when the Communists speak of liberals they mean those that go along with Communist policy either because of their own self-interest or because of being in line with the Communist views.

Mr. Morris. Now, in this case I notice they use the term "liberal" in connection with John Carter Vincent.

Mr. Budenz. That is correct.

Mr. Morris. Yet at the same time you knew that Vincent was a member of the Communist Party?

Mr. Budenz. Oh, yes; the stressing of Vincent and Service as "liberal" by Starobin the moment Hurley is thrown out is significant. They are being recommended as people who stand for the things that the Daily Worker stands for.

Mr. Morris. Mr. Chairman, I would like that introduced into evidence and marked as the next consecutive exhibit.

Mr. Sourwine. Mr. Morris, before you introduce that, did you want this one introduced?

Mr. Morris. That is the one I referred to.

The Chairman. That has been identified by the witness.

Mr. Sourwine. That is the one the witness referred to?

Mr. Morris. Yes.

The Chairman. It may be inserted in the record and properly designated.

(The document referred to was marked "Exhibit No. 178" and is as follows:)

Exhibit No. 178

[From the Daily Worker, New York, November 28, 1945, p. 3]

Hurley Out as Envoy to China, Backs War Policy in Far East

(By Joseph Starobin)

Maj. Gen. Patrick J. Hurley resigned yesterday from the post of Ambassador to Chungking with a statement indicating an all-out drive of the Hoover Republicans and American imperialists to encourage the Truman administration's headlong intervention in China.

Hurley's inflammatory 1,500-word statement was essentially the voice of those American imperialists who are openly anti-Soviet and call everything democratic in Europe and Asia a manifestation of "Communist imperialism."

At the same time, it was a criticism of American support for British imperialism in Asia in the sense that Hurley feels American capital should be getting more out of support for Britain than it is now getting.

The decision not to return as Ambassador in China came after weeks of a varied criticism of Hurley's policies from liberal experts on China, from the labor movement, from six progressive west coast Congressmen and even from the Republican independent paper, the New York Herald Tribune.

BLATANT POLICY SEEN

The White House immediately announced the appointment of Gen. George C. Marshall, who resigned last week as Chief of Staff.

This choice of a conservative military man gave no indication that American policy is today concerned with conciliation or peace in China.

Hurley, while criticizing the professional diplomats in the State Department—that is, the civilian pro-Roosevelt elements who have been increasingly worried by where our policy is going—nevertheless associated himself completely with President Truman and Secretary of State James F. Byrnes.

Major political interest was focused yesterday on the Hurley resignation, since it indicates the various personal, factional, and political conflicts within the administration. These in turn reflect the great popular alarm with the administration's course.

The way to take advantage of these conflicts, of course, is not to bank on their stopping the Truman-Byrnes policy, but to redouble pressure on all elements in the administration.

HOOVER LANGUAGE

Hurley used the characteristic language of the Hoover-Vandenberg crowd. He claimed to be favoring "democracy and free enterprise" against "imperialism and communism."

He was full of praise for the Atlantic Charter and was bitter at the "professional Foreign Service men," who, he said, were sympathetic to the "Communist armed party in China."

It is well known that liberal elements like John Carter Vincent and John S. Service in the State Department have opposed Hurley's reappointment. The former Ambassador continually sought to bypass them in his one-man rule of the Embassy in China.

It is a significant reflection of his mentality that all his critics are called Communists, and his main fire was centered on "the considerable section of our State Department which is endeavoring to support communism generally as well as specifically in China."

STEP UP "QUIT CHINA" FIGHT IN CONGRESS

(By Art Shields)

Washington, Nov. 27.—Ambassador Patrick Hurley's resignation, and his replacement by General Marshall, will not stop the congressional campaign to end America's intervention in China.

"Regardless of who is the ambassador to Chungking, we will press for the passage of our anti-intervention resolution until the Marines and GIs and transports are taken out of China," declared Representative Hugh DeLacy (Democrat, Washington), the leader of the group.

The stop-the-intervention drive will be pushed at two meetings on Capitol Hill tomorrow.

At 4:30 p. m., a number of congressmen are expected to meet in the Indian Affairs Room to press for action by the Foreign Affairs Committee.

DeLacy, Charles Savage, (Democrat, Washington), John M. Coffee (Democrat, Washington) and Ellis E. Paterson, Ned R. Healy and Helen Gahagan Douglas, California Democrats who sponsored the resolution, will be joined by others.

At 2 p. m. DeLacy is calling a meeting of representatives of the CIO, the AFL, Americans United, the Young Men's Christian Association and other groups.

Representative Savage told this reporter yesterday:

"Trade unions, farm organizations and many individuals are writing me daily against the intervention. We are getting more letters on the China issue than on anything else except army demobilization."

"We expect early action by the Foreign Affairs Committee. The pressure for such action will continue."

Hurley's leave taking must be followed by an exodous of Hurley's policies, said DeLacy today.

"The resignation of Ambassador Hurley," he said, "presents the Secretary of State with a great opportunity."

Mr. BUDENZ. We have here November 22, page 9, an article in the Daily Worker written by Helen Simon, who to my knowledge was a very important member of the staff of the Daily Worker and also engaged in Soviet underground international work through Mexico and other places.

The CHAIRMAN. November 22 of what year?

Mr. BUDENZ. 1945, excuse me, Senator, page 9.

This article deals with "Social Workers Get the Truth About China." It is carrying forward clearly the Communist campaign on this question.

Mr. MORRIS. May I see that, Mr. Budenz?

Mr. BUDENZ. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like the record to show that in this article the following people were mentioned and these people have been identified by this committee as Communists and as associating with the Institute of Pacific Relations. Paragraph 2 reads:
